THE ARGONAUT

Earthquake Edition.

SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1906

Price, 10 cents

With the destruction of San Francisco the entire publishing office, composing rooms and press rooms of the Argonaut were wiped out. Nothing was saved. But the Argonaut, after an existence of 30 years, will not die. It will be published in San Jose during the period of reconstruction. The aim of the publishers of the Argonaut is not to make money. It is to establish a headquarters for the people of this part of California, where they can be sure of finding reliable news direct from San Francisco, where they can, without expense, have inquiries printed which will be published in every camp of San Francisco and Oakland. Mail addressed in its care will be carefully handled and the editors wish it understood that this paper is issued as their contribution to the alleviation of the awful misery consequent on a terrible disaster. The Argonaut is trying to find for mothers their sons, for wives their husbands, and for everybody their loved ones.

VOL. LVIII. No. 1519.

JOHN FLEMING WILSON, Editor.

The Situation at Present.

In the present condition of bewilderment and apathy no prediction can be made with certainty what the citizens of San Francisco will do. It is already a topic of conversation in Oakland, Port Costa, Point Richmond and other cities whether the trade and population that until Wednesday was San Francisco's will remain so. Oakland citizens say openly that this catastrophe points to Oakland hereafter being the metropolis of California. But San Francisco has always been a truly American city. It has had push and energy. It has had great ability. It has already survived two great fires and two great earthquakes. It has gone through hard times and good times and at all times it has consistently gone forward.

Its men are the leaders in every movement in the West. Its wealthy men have interests all over the world. They love their city, and in every way have always taken every opportunity to display that affection in the advancement of San Francisco. Who can tell with what temper they will now, under the most awful circumstances, look toward the future? Being Americans, they will doubtless not view with equanimity leaving San Francisco a wilderness. Should the arguments advanced by Oakland and the other cities reach him, in loud enough tones to awaken them from their present bewilderment they doubtless will announce that they may have lost property, homes, families—everything, but they will not lose San Francisco.

Briefly, What Happened.

San Francisco has been totally destroyed by an earthquake which took place at 5:14 on the morning of Wednesday, April 18th, 1906, and a fire which started in the ruins and raged continuously until today. Of the once prosperous and beautiful city all that remains are few residences in the Western Addition. The loss of life cannot be estimated, and will never be fully known. The Federal troops, with the naval and revenue forces, have taken full charge of the city, and under their direction the municipal, county and state forces are working to the extent of their strength.

Immediately upon the occurrence of the first and most disastrous shock the people of San Francisco fled from their tumbling houses into the streets. It was just dawn, and when the cracking walls settled into motionlessness again on every hill could be seen clouds of dust rising from where buildings had fallen into ruins. Five minutes later these clouds of dust were added by flame. Within an hour great fires were raging on Mission street, Howard street, Sansome street and along the water front. Hundreds of alarms were sent to fire headquarters. But in the multiplicity of alarms there was nothing for the firemen to do but set to work on the nearest blaze or to search the nearest ruins for the injured.

The first shock demolished the big Central emergency Hospital and buried doctors, nurses and patients under a mass of stuff which buckled the beams of the ceilings and smothered those beneath it. Policeman Max Fenner was killed but Policeman Parquett of the City Hall Station started in and by his own efforts dug out Dr. McGinty, the nurses and all the patients, including the insane. These he took across the street to the Mechanics Pavilion, where a temporary hospital was immediately installed.

By six o'clock the wounded were pouring into this hospital. It being early in the morning when trucks and wagons were just starting out for the day, there were a great number of conveyances ready to carry the wounded immediately away.

The first shock damaged the city somewhat as follows:

Worst damage: Mission, Howard, Folsom and Bryant streets; Van Ness avenue to Union street and all Hayes Valley; the immediate vicinity of the City Hall.

Badly damaged: Lower San Francisco around the Hall of Justice to the water front.

Damaged: All the rest of the city, with the exception of a portion of the Latin Quarter, where only chimneys were knocked down.

Hotels suffered as follows:

Palace: Walls cracked and windows and furniture broken.

St. Francis: Front cracked and plaster thrown down.

Lick House: Top floor knocked down and ceilings cracked.

Occidental: Cornices, windows and ceilings cracked.

Russ: Badly damaged.

St. Dunstan's: Gables thrown down, cornices and ceilings cracked.

Marie Antoinette: Front wall swayed out and gables broken.

News Building Hotel: Two top floors gone.

Ainslee: Ceilings cracked.

Valencia: Totally destroyed.

St. Nicholas: Badly injured.

All these have since been totally destroyed.

At eight o'clock General Funston, on orders from Washington from President Roosevelt, took charge of the city, and by nine o'clock a heavy force of cavalry, light artillery and infantry occupied the principal streets. At this hour there were bad fires along Sansome street, East street and up Mission street. The San Mateo dam and the Spring Valley Water Company having been broken by the shock, the pressure dwindled rapidly and the engines were useless. Acting Chief Dougherty at this time discovered that Chief Sullivan, who lived at the California Hotel, had been badly injured by the fall of a turret, the same turret crushing Dr. J. C. Stinson in his bed and instantly killing him.

A general call was sent out for all the physicians in the city and the undertakers threw open their places as temporary morgues.

At ten o'clock on Wednesday the situation, while extremely bad, did not seem hopeless. There was no wind, and the various fires did not seem to be spreading. A great effort was made then to save valuable goods from the ruins of the down town district by means of trucks and conveyances of all kinds. By noon the situation had become acute and, as all the banks had agreed not to open, a rush was made on the safe deposit companies. These all refused to open the vaults, except to put valuables inside.

General Farley Injured.

Brigadier-General Farley, U. S. A. retired, the builder of the 16-inch gun and for forty years an ordinance officer, was seriously injured with his wife in the Colonnade Hotel.

The Argonaut.

In the earthquake the Argonaut publication building was but slightly damaged and hardly any damage done to the property, but in the fire of Wednesday night everything was lost completely, the employees of the paper being able to save absolutely nothing except a few of the books. As a consequence all those who had manuscripts or books or reviews or accounts with the Argonaut will have to forgive its total inability to make an accounting at present. All the contributors, in so far as we are able, we shall notify that their manuscripts are gone. All the advertising copy and matter was destroyed. The list of subscribers was saved and this copy of the Argonaut mailed to each one from San Jose may be taken as the reason for the nonappearance of the paper earlier. The Argonaut will resume its regular weekly publication as soon as there is any chance of its having an address. At present what the people of this country want is news, not literature. We shall confine ourselves now to news of the present situation.

The editors regret to state that there were several casualties among the members of its force, although in the present distracted state of affairs there can be no certainty as to the fate of a great many. We regret to state that Mr. Porter Garnett was seriously injured by the falling of a heavy vase during the earthquake and that the home of Mrs. Josephine Hart Phelps was totally destroyed by fire, as were the homes and offices of all of the staff who lives in San Francisco.

Contributions to Famine-Stricken.

The President signed the joint resolution of Congress appropriating $1,000,000 for San Francisco sufferers.

John D. Rockefeller has contributed $100,000.

Citizens of Oakland have subscribed $6,000.

Portland, Ore., has made up a fund of $100,000.

Seattle has raised $50,000.

Three thousand five hundred tents have been shipped from Philadelphia by the Quartermaster.

Sacramento has given $75,000.

Los Angeles has subscribed $200,000.

Stockton is loading steamers with provisions for Oakland and San Francisco.

The headquarters of the San Francisco Typographical Union have been removed to Oakland on Tenth street, near Webster. Printers reporting there will be directed and helped.

There have been no fatalities at Point Richmond, although considerable damage was done.

Elks Give Relief.

The relief committee of the Oakland Lodge of Elks has secured the Adams Point property on which it is now building a tented city for the refugees.

All the garages in San Francisco have been destroyed. Consequent on the difficulty of getting gasoline and water, the excellent automobile service maintained by the authorities is gradually being abandoned.

No one was injured at Mills College.

Many of the injured in San Francisco have been conveyed to Goat Island by special transport service.

Coming to San Jose.

Several trains have arrived from San Francisco to-day, each one bringing scores of refugees. The authorities in San Francisco through the Southern Pacific Company are granting free transportation south for all who can reach their station.

The Southern Pacific Company also has turned over all its ferry boats to the authorities and the refugees at Port Mason and the Presidio, as rapidly as possible, are being conveyed to Oakland, Alameda, Sausalito, and other places on the bay shore.

No fatalities have been reported at Gilroy, although the loss of property has been very heavy.

Death in the California.

The east turret of the California Hotel, in San Francisco fell at the first shock. In its fall it went through the ceiling of Fire Chief Dougherty's room, badly injuring him and in the next room instantly killed J. C. Stinson. The falling bricks of the turret wrecked the fire house next to the California Theatre.

All the libraries of San Francisco have been totally destroyed. There is not a book store or stationery store or news stand left, except the ferry stand at those on the outskirts of the city and on Devisadero street.

The Claus Spreckels place on Van Ness avenue was badly cracked and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, who was about to be confined, had to be removed to a sidewalk where she remained all that day.

The Hartland Law place "Viavi" on Van Ness avenue near Union street is a total wreck, the front of it having sunk over two feet below the surface of the street. The rumor that Dr. Law's mother died of the shock has not been confirmed.

The home of Miss Ina, on North, the California poet, on Russian Hill was burned and later removed to Fort Masco.

Latest List of Injured.

Following is a partial list of the injured cases received at the Presidio General Hospital up to 9 a. m. yesterday morning. One hundred forty cases had been received up to that time and about 300 more cases since that hour to 9:30 o'clock last night, but no list has yet been arranged of them.

Only one person, Alberta de Saegheer, had died there from injuries.

Fire Chief Sullivan, who was reported dead, was confined there seriously wounded, but will recover. The condition of Mrs. Sullivan, who was injured in the demolition of a California apartment house, is reported to be very serious.

Most of the injured are suffering from lacerations and fractures, but it is impossible at this time to list their various injuries.

The Presidio General Hospital also contains about fifty patients taken there from Lane hospital, which is burned.

From City in a Carriage.

On Thursday afternoon Mrs. Captain Maddox and a number of friends left San Francisco in a carriage and drove to San Bruno, where they got a train for San Jose. Her son, Mr. Knox Maddox, remained in San Francisco.

More Earthquakes.

Friday afternoon there was a slight tremor at about half past one and toward five o'clock there was a second slight shock.

Police Measures in the City.

Late yesterday afternoon the police broke open every saloon and corner grocery that was not destroyed by fire and poured all liquors found into the gutters.

Six hundred laborers of the Ocean Shore Railway were sent to San Francisco yesterday to look after the sewers to prevent an epidemic, and the United Railroads set to work to clean up some of the streets.

Mountain View is very thoroughly devastated as a result of the earthquake and in the loss of local tanks of the town waterworks has a rather serious problem to meet.

Will Rebuild.

Mr. Frank Sullivan, who arrived in San Jose Friday, stated that Mr. James D. Phelan and the Phelan estate would rebuild all of their improvements in San Jose which have been destroyed by either the earthquake or by fire.

Mr. Frank Sullivan has contributed $1,000 to the Relief Fund of San Jose. He will rebuild at once his interests here.

Send all offers of funds, places where people can sleep, food supplies, or anything to give relief, to Secretary Clark, at the relief headquarters, at Trinity Church.

A committee of plumbers, electricians, architects, and other mechanics was held yesterday afternoon in the office of Mayor Warshawick for the purpose of arranging some plan for the inspection of buildings which are damaged by the earthquake.

WARNING!

NOTICE IS GIVEN that any person found Pilfering, Stealing, Robbing, or committing any act of Lawless Violence will be summarily

HANGED.

Vigilance Committee.

A wagon load of dynamite exploded at Third and Mission Streets, in San Francisco, yesterday, destroying wagon, horses and driver.

The San Jose Building Trades' Council has taken action to prevent the raising of wages.

Bank Situation.

Owing to the fact that every bank in the Bay Counties has been more or less injured, to the fact that every reserve bank has been destroyed in San Francisco, that the coin and currency in their vaults will not be recoverable for several weeks, the citizens of San Francisco and northern California are quietly using bills of exchange, private checks, and ordinary notes as currency. This condition will probably continue for a long time, but it is a sign of the faith of Californians in the stability of their communities and their ultimate return to prosperity, that no complaint is made of the lack of cash.

Mrs. Corbett, her young child and her Japanese servant, all living at the corner of Jones and Jackson street, were instantly killed by the falling of a brick chimney into their bedrooms.

The Valencia Hotel on Valencia street with, it is supposed, two hundred roomers, was reduced to a heap of ruins at the first shock. The Joseph D. Grant house on Pacific Avenue was twisted on its foundations and will be a ruin.

When the Mechanics Pavillion burned 160 of the patients were taken to the Marine Hospital, but permission was refused to admit them until an hour later.

The residence of Mr. Will Tevis on Taylor street, where Mme. Emma Eames was staying, was very badly injured by the first shock and Mme. Eames with the Tevises went to a public square.

Thirty looters were shot and killed by the various patrols during the night of Wednesday. Over a thousand prisoners were taken from the various jails of the city Thursday morning at dawn and marched to Fort Mason where they were put into an immense bull-pen under guard. Among these prisoners was Attorney George D. Collins.

Along the water front on Thursday a great many dead children were to be seen lying in the grass. Parents fleeing from the flames finding it impossible to do more than save the live ones and food for the day.

Inquiries and Answers.

Hopper—Will Mrs. James Hopper, now at Boulder Creek, report to this office. If she is not alive will definite information be sent. James Hopper is uninjured.

Progress of Fire.

Mr. E. M. Knust who arrived on the 12 o'clock train from San Francisco reports that the fire in the Mission has reached Dolores to 30th street. Russian Hill is all gone; Tejezaph Hill is all gone; Latin Quarter is all gone. The fire is going on 30th street toward Twib Peaks and Gray Brothers' quarry.

Ex-Mayor Phelan Missing.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Sullivan, who arrived in San Jose early yesterday morning, reported that the flames jumped over an intervening space on Valencia street to the house of Mr. James D. Phelan on 18th and Valencia. Miss Phelan was rescued, but all efforts of the life savers failed to discover Mr. Phelan. The residence is burned to the ground, but it is hoped that Mr. Phelan escaped.

Bankers Meet.

A meeting of the bankers of San Francisco was held on Sutter street yesterday, and Mr. Lynch of the First National Bank reported that a committee had examined all the bank and safe deposit vaults in San Francisco and found them intact. It is also reported that the books and records of the San Francisco Hall of Records had escaped serious injury.

The Contra Costa Water Company, until further notice, will not collect any water rents.

It is thought that the vaults of the sub-treasury on Commercial street in San Francisco are safe.

Ferry Building Destroyed.

Early this morning the wind veered in San Francisco and the flames took their way toward the water front. They ran along the wharves from Bay street and from the channel to the ferry building, which was destroyed at 2 o'clock this morning. This means that all the immense graneries and warehouses which had been thought safe have been destroyed.

The city schools of San Jose will remain closed for 30 days, by order of the Board of Education.

The Situation To-day

The situation in San Francisco this morning is substantially as follows: 125,000 of the population have already succeeded in getting to some of the cities across the bay. Of the remainder a large number is on Pacific Heights and in that small part of the Western Addition which it is hoped may yet be saved. Fort Mason and the Presidio and the vacant lots along the western sea wall contain the rest of them. Food is being rushed from all points by boat and the distribution is being made by special police appointed by the Mayor and by the troops. A large quantity of milk was delivered this morning for the benefit of mothers and children. It is thought that by tonight the organization of relief will have made much progress. People are still leaving the city, although through the destruction of the ferry buildings and wharves the tide of emigration is being turned toward the south. The shooting of men trying to get provisions still goes on, it being practically impossible otherwise to prevent such a violent stampede as would result in the overthrow of order.

Also orders have been given under certain circumstances to shoot those fatally injured and in danger of being roasted alive. This has been done in several instances.

Over 150 inmates and some 40 attendants of the State Insane Asylum at Agnews are dead.

There were 1088 patients in the buildigs. Among the dead officials are Dr. Kelley, chief of the female department, and his wife, and Dr. Lillian Bell, nurses Miss A. M. Leete, Mrs. A. Thayne, Miss C. A. Walker, Miss M. Fuimell, John Lynch, Superintendent of the male ward, H. A. Braden, Miss L. M. Holmes, Miss C. Mason, Miss B. Burnett. Over two hundred of the lunatics escaped and are still at large. The buildings were a total loss.

Proclamation Issued by Mayor Worswick.

To the Citizens of San Jose;

It seems to be proper at this time to say a few words with reference to the conditions prevailing in our city.

First, we should all, at all times, remember that the patrolling of our streets under the present circumstances is necessary for the protection of life and property. This applies to us all—it means the protection of our families, our lives and our property.

Secondly, we should all remember that it is the part of good citizenship to yield a cheerful compliance with all reasonable regulations necessary for the effectiveness of such patrol. It is only fair to say that the great majority of our citizens have done so uncomplainingly.

Thirdly, we should all remember that any patrol, in order to effect its object, must be rigidly enforced and must result in keeping the streets of the patrolled district practically cleared of all pedestrians.

The privilege of passing through the lines must be given to some, but this privilege should be used and not abused. The earnest co-operation of all our people is invoked to prevent the necessity for the harsh treatment of any and all possibility of serious consequences.

When a citizen is challenged by the word "Halt!" he should instantly obey the command, whereupon he will be properly advanced and identified.

The pass is not intended to and will not exempt the holder of it from being stopped and identified, and is only given out under what is thought to be urgent necessity, and to be used only when absolutely necessary. There can be but one entrance through the line and that is at the corner of First and St. John Streets.

When you are halted, do not argue the point with the soldier on guard. Remember it is "theirs not to reason why." State your case to the officer in charge and do not insist on what, as a good citizen, you have no right to demand. In so doing remember all must yield something for the common good. And last of all, do not denounce our loyal citizen soldiery as "tin soldiers." It is unjust and will be unavailing, and does not show the mark of a thoughtful citizen. Captain Holtum and his officers and men have done nobly and will continue to do their full duty as soldiers. It only remains for the rest of us to do ours, as citizens.

Automobiling and other pleasure parties and sight-seers should remain out of the patrolled district. The streets of this section in the present condition of things must be given over to the business and working public in the work of reconstruction. Very respectfully,

G. D. WORSWICK, Mayor.

San Jose, Cal., April 20, 1906.

Wait for Inspectors.

All persons are ordered to refrain from having their chimneys rebuilt or recapped until they have been inspected by a contracting brick mason or plasterer.

By order of the Board of Fire and Police Commissioners.

The falling of the bricks of the Fair Hotel at the first shock killed six people in a house in the rear.

The headquarters of the authorities of San Francisco was removed five times during the twenty-four hours succeeding the first shock. The moves were from the City Hall to the Hall of Justice, from the Hall of Justice to the North End Station, from the North End Station to Franklin street and from Franklin Street to the Park Police Station.

Ex-Mayor Phelan Missing.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Sullivan, who arrived in San Jose early yesterday, report that the flames jumped over an intervening space on Valencia street to the house of Mr. James D. Phelan on 18th and Valencia. Miss Phelan was rescued, but all efforts of the life-savers failed to discover Mr. Phelan. The residence is burned to the ground, but it is hoped that Mr. Phelan escaped.

Mrs. W. L. Jackson, contusion on head caused by chimney falling on her.

Mrs. De Crow, seriously injured.

Seven injured in County Hospital.

Help from Portland.

Twenty-six cars of supplies left Portland last night and a car of nurses and doctors. Twenty-six more cars will be started tomorrow. Blankets and mattresses in Portland are being sent, and a trainload of provisions will leave each day.

Measures for Relief.

The Government officials took charge yesterday of every grocery store in that part of San Francisco still standing and gave out foodstuffs to those who were hungry. Bread lines were established at Fillmore and Turk streets, at Golden Gate Park and the Presidio. The line at Fillmore and Turk was four blocks long in the afternoon and those at the parks were even longer. A large supply of milk came over from Oakland and this was distributed to women and children wherever they were found in need. A great deal of this milk was used for the exhausted women who arrived at the ferry throughout the day and proved a great boon to them.

The bread lines at the parks furnished striking instances of absolute patience and fortitude. There was no disorder when the hungry thousands were told to form a line and receive their bread and canned goods. Silk-hatted men of affairs of the world followed good naturedly behind Chinese and took their loaf from the same hand.

Soup kitchens were established in the streets of the unburned section, no fires whatever allowed indoors and many hungry persons were fed by these individual efforts. Bread and such other foodstuffs as may be at hand will be distributed at the various stations twice a day.

Mrs. Emma Fames, the prima donna, escaped from San Francisco and is now at Gatos with Mr. Roble, her secretary.

General Funston has sent the following gram to the War Department. About 300 people homeless. Famine inevitable. Large supply stores burned. Most energetic efforts from outside only can prevent suffering.

E. H. Harriman will arrive on Sunday on special train from New York. He said in interview in Chicago that all the Harriman lines and all the steamship interests which controls will be placed at the service of San Francisco.

Orders have been issued by the War Department to purchase at Los Angeles immediately 200,000 rations and at Seattle 300,000 rations to be hurried to San Francisco.

Jerome Hart Interviewed on the Future of San Francisco

HIS VIEWS AS SET FORTH BY A REPRESENTATIVE OF THE SAN JOSE MERCURY

There Will Be a Redistribution of Wealth in San Francisco—San Jose and Other Bay Cities Have a Great Immediate Future.

BEYOND a measure of doubt, San Francisco will be rebuilt and as quickly as possible. If a man owns a 25-foot lot on Mission street he must build on it to make it pay. It will be a better city. Here is an important matter—Chinatown, which is one of the best parts of the city, is right in its very heart, well sheltered from the fog and wind. In the fifties and sixties it was occupied by the best families. The best homes were along Stockton and Dupont. That section has been gradually occupied by the Chinese.

"The old Tevis home was there, so was the Haggin home, the

W. T. Coleman home, the house formerly owned by Delmas, and the A. E. Head house. All these were right on the fringe of Chinatown. I knew them well, for I was born on Filbert near Dupont. These houses were built 50 years ago, and, like the Hearst house, where they used to live, they have all been demolished.

"They will be rebuilt, and I have not the least doubt the whole section will be well built, and will be what you might call a civic center, right outside the retail and business center."

"Some people were irrevocably ruined.

A REDISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH.

"At least I know there were some. Some wealthy people were subjected to a good deal of unexpected annoyance. For instance, Dr. Tevis was seen by one of my editors going along Octavia street propelling with his gentle hands a wheelbarrow containing his pajamas and a few other of his valuables.

"Yes; I would say it has ruined a lot of people. It is going to bring about a redistribution of wealth. Nowadays there is a good deal of talk on socialism. It is urged that a man who has a great deal of wealth ought to divide it up with those who have not. The men who have the wealth do not regard it in that way. However, God has got in and is doing some distribution Himself.

"For instance, the poor of San Francisco have always thought that the Phelans, the Floods, the Downey Harveys, the Macdonough heirs, the Fairs, the Sharons have had too much. Of course, they didn't think so.

"Now these rich people must do suddenly what we wanted them to do. Everyone of us—the hodcarrier, the steel and iron worker, the lumber handler, the carpenter, the laborer, skilled and unskilled—will get some of that wealth. It is true we must work for it. It is what you might call a peaceable economic distribution. And it will be done with much less waste of blood than is now being consumed nightly at the corner of Grant avenue where the socialists tell how it is to be done.

SAVINGS BANKS WILL BE PROSPEROUS.

"Another question that is agitating the minds of many is as to the savings banks. Will they open? Will they be crippled or injured? What is their future? Here is an idea: the savings banks have been loaded down with money. Never so much so before in their history. The working classes have been prosperous. And every month they have been bringing into the savings banks barrels of money. The banks could not loan it fast enough, because there was not enough opportunity to make loans for construction purposes. Building was good, but it did not keep pace with the savings of the people. The result was that there was a steady falling off of interest.

"Now, in San Francisco they are confronted with what will be the most remarkable building boom ever seen in this country. Chicago, with her remarkable building boom, could not compare with it. I saw in New York when they were building the Waldorf Astoria three shifts working eight hours each (night and day), but San Francisco will outdo this, will outdo the great building boom of thirty years ago.

"It is claimed that the city will be rebuilt in three years; some of the big construction companies in the East say two years. The building will go on rapidly. The people who have land will have to build. And they will have to borrow enormous sums of money. The savings banks have a lot of idle coin that they have not been able to loan.

"The Hibernia bank has United States bonds that don't pay $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent interest. The latest United States convertible loans don't pay net more than $1\frac{7}{8}$ per cent.

"If these institutions are under the dire necessity of loaning out at 6 per cent, looking at it from that view point, the saving banks are in no danger. They will, of course, shelter themselves behind all the regulations the law affords by fixing periods of 30, 60 or 100 days as they may determine. This would avoid a rush. They will protect themselves amply.

"So that it would seem the savings banks are confronted with an era of prosperity instead of distress.

OUTLINE OF NEW CITY.

"As to the question of the rebuilding of the city, and whether it will be rebuilt on different lines, there is a great deal of uncertainty. There have been many attempts made to lay it out on different or on new lines; such as to run the park down to Market street, to connect or lie between two great arteries of the city like Hyde Park in London between the Marble arch and Hyde Park Gate. They have found it difficult to accomplish this, owing to vested interests. The property owner would not sell except at exorbitant prices. So they were hindered from bringing about these improvements. Well, now they may do it, because many small property owners are confronted with the difficulties of clearing away the debris, etc., and if not able to rebuild for a year or so, they would probably sell. Therefore it may be possible to continue the park.

Son Jose Mercury Art Dept.

"But in regard to running boulevards, and widening the downtown narrow streets, I very much doubt they will bring this about, because owners of land, fearing that, will get to work so rapidly and build so soon that it will be difficult to do it. When you get a building on a place it is difficult to interfere with it, so that I believe there will be no change in this matter except on broad, general lines.

"One of the most notable features of the fire has been the warning in regard to cheap construction. That is to be noticed right here in San Jose as well as in San Francisco. Buildings that have been well built have stood the earthquake, while others which have been cheaply constructed, right beside them, have fallen flat. When I was a boy the Palace Hotel was being built. It was shortly after the big earthquake of forty years ago. The memories of the people were still vivid with recollections of toppling walls and ruined homes. So Ralston, who was a very stubborn man, said he would build the Palace so that it could be shaken up, but not shaken down. It was built very, very firmly, with heavy walls, with many brick walls throughout the building and with steel rods running right through it from side to side, and then enormous concrete anchors down in the bowels of the earth, through which other rods were run. Ralston spoke truthfully when he said they may shake it up but they cannot shake it down. The Palace stood the earthquake well and nearly stood the fire, and today they say they can use the walls.

"Correspondingly all the good buildings of modern steel construction have stood well. For example, the Chronicle, the Kohl, the Shreve, the Merchants' Exchange and a number of other buildings along Montgomery and Market streets of steel frame.

"On the other hand, cheap buildings have gone down like houses of cards and the other poor buildings of thirty years ago have suffered equally. The same thing is seen in San Jose. You can see the good buildings erected by good honest workmen, with material made of honest, genuine materials, which stand today alongside the poor, "shackley," jerrybuilt building of a year or so ago. It is a warning to San Francisco for evermore. She has been burned down now and often before because she has been lenient enough to allow cheap buildings, cheap veneered brick buildings on the ground of charity or on the cry 'let the boys get to work!'

A BEAUTIFUL AND SAFE CITY.

"And now, if she has the strength of mind and courage to enforce proper building laws and proper fire limits, she will not only have a beautiful city, but she will have a perfectly safe one.

"What San Francisco has lost is going to be the gain of the bay cities, because San Francisco is going to be down and out for at least a year, and gradually her business will pass into other cities. Oakland is reaping a harvest by reason of the accidental fact that she is the nearest to San Francisco. Other cities are going to be benefited likewise.

"Fancy the trade, the support of 400,000 people snuffed out in a moment. San Jose is a terminal point. Query: Why cannot she supply her territory, the smaller dealers around here, while San Francisco is down and out, instead of letting Chicago or some other Eastern city do so. I am not a merchant. I don't know whether you have any jobbers here. But smart agents ought to be able to handle the trade which San Francisco houses, because they are wiped out, can no longer furnish.

"Take Oakland. That city must now be supplying Alameda county, also Contra Costa county, which is a rich one. Oakland is taking the place of the San Francisco jobbers. Somebody has got to do it. It will mean millions to Oakland. Correspondingly there must be small towns and cities around here which San Jose could supply and which have hitherto been supplied from San Francisco. That city cannot any longer do it. Why cannot San Jose get in and do it? Suppose she added $1,500,000 to her trade until San Francisco should have revived? Is it not probable that some of that trade would stick here after San Francisco had got up? One thing I am mighty certain of and that is that if San Joseans and Oaklanders do not do it. Easterners will attend to it."

Mr. Hart then spoke of the loss to the newspapers in the metropolis. The Argonaut, of which he is the owner and chief editor, was completely wiped out with the splendid library and machinery belonging to that splendid paper.

Mr. Hart believes it will be many weeks before Newspaper Row reappears in the map of San Francisco.

"The modern daily newspaper," he said, "is so delicately equipped an organism, both intellectually and mechanically, that it is like smashing a watch; it is hard to get together and make it run again."

The difficulty of getting linotype machines and perfecting presses would be the chief delay. But the big dailies will all revive and move along as smoothly as ever. We all hope for that.

FOOD FOR ALL

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25—Gradually the National Government is taking the work of succoring the homeless and foodless thousands in San Francisco and tomorrow the representatives of the United States Army will have charge of the gigantic task of issuing food to all those who still remain in the city. This development resulted from the meeting of the executive committee today and the work will be turned over to the United States quartermaster of this department, who will establish a complete system of issuing rations at all of the 58 stations throughout the city. This move—considered a most important one—has resulted from the lack of system accorded at some places and the necessity of replacing the scores of independent relief committees with a thoroughly organized system with one responsible head.

This was a day of optimistic reports from all sides. "Conditions improving" was the happy expression from those who have had charge of any of the self-imposed duties of caring for their less fortunate fellow townsmen during the last few days. In fact, now that the most important duty will hereafter be performed by the United States Army, that of disbursing the vast amount of food and other supplies which have been donated with almost lavish hands by the people of the entire country, the citizens of San Francisco have turned their attention to the details of the reconstruction of their businesses.

There was a resumption of business to an astonishing extent today, considering the condition throughout the resident section. Retail stores were instructed to reopen and the municipal government has established a scale of prices for the most important commodities—food, clothing, etc.—which is even below that existing under normal conditions. Warning was given retailers that any effort on their part to charge exorbitant prices would result in summary action by the authorities.

Street Car Service.

Street car service is promised for tomorrow morning and electric lights will be turned on tomorrow evening. As yet there is no definite time set for the resumption of cooking in the houses. The work of rebuilding and inspecting the chimneys is progressing rapidly, but it will probably be some time before it is considered safe to allow fires.

The preparation of the morning and evening meal—for San Francisco does not partake of more than that number at present—is one of the most picturesque sights resulting from the catastrophe. In front of every house there is a small improvised furnace or cook stove whereon the food is prepared. In some places the Chinese servants still remain faithful to their employers and to them the cooking is entrusted. But it is no unusual thing to see the wives of men, who, a few days ago were the possessors of millions, stirring the porridge or deftly manipulating bacon and eggs. The housewives enter into the spirit of the work with a zest and good nature that demonstrates the facility with which the average American adjusts himself or herself to the needs of the hour.

Although the order from military headquarters permitting householders to maintain lights until 10 o'clock p. m. went into effect Monday night, it was not generally understood by the guards and on Monday night there was considerable confusion on this account.

Last night, however, the portion of the city that was undamaged was aglow with glimmering candles and coal oil lamps until "taps" sounded and the men on patrol duty were not required to give any warnings.

The curtain fell at 10 o'clock sharp, and the city was in darkness. Few risked street travel after that hour, but those who did were not molested.

"From the reports of officers filed this morning," said Chief of Police Dinan, "there is every indication that San Francisco has settled down to almost a normal condition. Our officers are everywhere, as usual, but no crimes have been reported for the past twelve hours, and petty thievery has not even kept the upper office men of the department busy.

"The one perplexing problem that we now have to contend with is the prevention of an unequal distribution of food. Those of the worst element of the city we find are living better than they ever did in their lives, while the unfortunates, who have never been accustomed to ask for aid, are actually suffering.

"We are doing all in our power to relieve this condition, and hope, in a few days, to get rid of those who are taking everything in sight.

No Hunger.

The work of housing and feeding the homeless and of reconstructing the sanitary conditions, already so far advanced Monday, was carried on with tremendous energy yesterday. It is certain that no one was hungry in San Francisco last night, unless wilfully so. There is food for all, and the method of distribution has been so perfected that it is within reach of all.

EMMA EAMES' ESCAPE

First Act of the Famous Vocalist Was to Look for Mme. Sembrich

Slept All Night on the Roadside Without Proper Covering

[The following signed statement of her trying experiences in escaping from the terrors of stricken San Francisco has been received from Madame Emma Eames Story, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is now resting at the county home of Dr. Tevis, at Alma, in the Santa Clara hills. Mme. Eames is endeavoring to arrange transportation for her return to the East next Thursday. Her story is as follows:]

BY EMMA EAMES STORY.

I was in bed and at the first quiver of the earthquake awoke to perfect consciousness. I was in a four-post bed with a very heavy mahogany canopy over it. I wondered whether I had better get out, but the futility of any movement to save one's self came over me and I lay quite still only holding on to the bed to be kept from being thrown out. I was absolutely without fear at any time. As soon as the movements began to quiet themselves I thought of moving but each time they redoubled their intensity. At last, at the end of the first big shock which must have lasted a minute and a half I heard the voice of our host asking if I were afraid. Of course I got up and dressed as quickly as I could and rushed down to the Hotel St. Francis to see what was happening to Madame Sembrich. Dr. Tevis and I got in an automobile with which an acquaintance was passing, fortunately. On getting there we rushed up six flights on foot as no elevators were going, only to find Mme. Sembrich had gone.

We at last found her and begged her to come up to us at Dr. Tevis' house, on the top of Nob Hill. We passed the day there watching the flames approaching and feeling the shocks of earthquake at short intervals. Dr. Tevis all the time trying to get some sort of conveyance to get us out of town. He at last found a landau from a livery stable whose driver consented to wait in front of the door until we must leave. All the town was burning between us and the ferries, and there was then difficulty in getting there. At about 8 o'clock the Doctor said we had best get out to the North Beach, as we might be surrounded by flames and not be able to get away. The house was ultimately surrounded by flame on Thursday and was the last to remain standing in that vicinity. It was a monument of perfect taste and was burned to the ground with all in it, including all our clothes, we being able to carry with us in our hurried flight only our valuables and one change of underclothing. We took blankets and lay out all night on the ground, the dew falling so heavily that we were soaked. At about 9 on Thursday morning, Dr. Tevis said the fires had burnt themselves out between us and the ferries and we could get over to Oakland and must go at once. The carriage took our few belongings and the two of our party the least fit for violent exercise, while the rest of us walked. At the Oakland ferry we found a large crowd, but after waiting there three-quarters of an hour for the carriage which we had out-walked (and which, through some misunderstanding had waited for us at another place all that time), we got safely over to Oakland. There, leaving our two maids in the carriage, we took a train to a suburb of Oakland where lives a relative of Dr. Tevis. There we found the house closed and lay about on the ground waiting for them to find means of conveying us to Dr. Tevis country place, 60 miles from Oakland. As we were leaving North Beach for the ferry the manager of our host's country place met us, having come to look for us, and it was he who told us we could get away. All the part of the town through which we walked was later swept by the flame, which returned to destroy all that in their previous course they had left unconsumed.

Through some misunderstanding Mme. Sembrich's maid was left with some members of the opera company in Oakland and she had to return to the special train they were making up. I had lost my voice completely and felt I could not return to confusion and dirt and a possible three days' sojourn in a railway station. At about 5 o'clock on Thursday afternoon we managed to secure an automobile to bring Dr. Tevis, Miss Tetridge, my maid, and myself up here where we have been camping out.

We found the caretakers in a state of terror on our arrival, and the house demolished by earthquake. We had taken a ride in an automobile of four hours, and was glad to be on comfortable mattresses in one of the cottages of his employees. At no time have we felt any fear, and the whole thing seems perfectly natural. When everybody is suffering from the same cause one's personal sensations are minimized. One feels very small. As I lay in my bed at the first shock I took mental notes, as I shall probably never see another earthquake, and I am not sure I want to. I tried to get news to my friends in the East, but since my telephone message to the Associated Press representative last Saturday and a telegram to reassure my friends, which I sent to the New York Herald two days ago, I have heard nothing from them that leads me to think they know of my whereabouts. We have been trying very hard to get accommodations for our journey to New York, and hope to leave on Thursday morning by the Overland Limited, arriving in New York on Monday morning. We are with Dr. Tevis at Alma, Santa Clara county, until we get away.

Repair St. Francis.

William Dahrman, the auditor of the St. Francis hotel, yesterday explored the building as far as the fourth floor. The interior resembles the inside walls of a dead furnace. The effect of the intense heat is shown by melted glass and metal objects.

The walls, however, do not appear to be sprung and the building can be repaired. The engine room in the basement sustained little or no damage. The steel superstructure is apparently unaffected, and save at the southwest corner, there are no cracks in the towering walls. The Annex, forming the third wing, which was in course of construction, was uninjured.

The vaults containing the safety deposit boxes are intact. While the metal finishings have been melted off it is believed that the contents are safe. It is believed, roughly estimated, $500,000 will restore the magnificent hostelry to its former splendor.

Milk Distributed by Committee.

Notice was served on all milkmen this morning that they must deliver their entire supply of milk to the General Relief Committee. From now on until further orders no more milk is to be delivered at any home and every householder must go to the milk depot in his immediate locality and get such amount as it is deemed necessary for him to have according to the number of persons in his home.

The unsold remainder of the sheets and all the plates of "Argonaut Stories," the book of tales recently got out by the Argonaut Publishing Company was completely destroyed by the fire after the earthquake shock of April 18th. There had been printed a special edition of 50 copies on hand-made Exeter paper with wide margins; these also were destroyed at the binders where they had been sent to be specially bound in leather for gifts to the authors of the stories. The editors of the Argonaut very much regret this loss.

Remove Chinatown.

In all the stress of work attendant upon the destruction of the city the rebuilding of the new San Francisco is not being overlooked, and the removal of Chinatown to Hunter's Point, a matter that was practically decided upon at the meeting of the General Executive Committee this morning. Ex-Mayor James Phelan called the attention of the committee to the fact that the Chinese were congregating about Fort Mason. Mayor Schmitz agreed that this was a matter that should not be overlooked and said that he himself had spoken to the Chinese Vice Consul yesterday in regard to the removal of the Chinese to Hunter's Point, and that there would be no opposition made to it by the Chinese.

A committee is to be appointed to look out for this matter and make the necessary arrangements.

Banks Still Closed.

The city is not yet in sight of the resumption of banking business. There was an inspection yesterday of the bank vaults in the burned district, and in no instance were they found to have been destroyed. But it is realized that an early opening would endanger their perishable contents, and in order that this may be avoided some weeks must elapse until they are thoroughly cooled before they are entered.

In the meantime business will be done at temporary quarters with money furnished through the medium of the mint and the United States sub-treasury.

Call Presses Safe.

An examination of the Call building shows the fact that the presses of the paper were not badly damaged either by the fire or the earthquake. The presses were in the basement and it is estimated that in two weeks' time the paper will be able to resume publication at its own building. The building itself withstood both the fire and the temblor in a remarkable manner. It stands as straight as an arrow, but suffered some from the great interior heat.

Vaults Destroyed.

The Fireman's Fund secured permission yesterday afternoon to open its vaults, with the result that all of the contents were destroyed by spontaneous combustion. The workmen made great efforts to put out the flames, but were unable to do so. The vaults had passed safely through the fire.

As a result of this disaster, Chief of Police Dinan will not issue permits for three or four days more to protect the owners from loss.

NOTICE.

As soon as the necessary permits can be secured and the debris cleared away, work will begin at once on reconstructing the Argonaut's former quarters at 246 Sutter Street, San Francisco. In the meantime, the Editorial and Business Offices will be maintained at TWENTY-FIVE BROWN AVENUE, SAN JOSE, CAL. Address all business communications there to The Argonaut Publishing Co., Jerome A. Hart, President.

The news trade can secure the Argonaut from the SAN FRANCISCO NEWS CO., No. 1711 SAN PABLO AVENUE, OAKLAND.

The paper will be on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco and by the Dennison News Co., on its boats and trains.

San Francisco After the Fire.

A condensed summary of conditions in San Francisco, as this paper goes to press, may be of interest to distant readers.

General Greeley, after a careful investigation, reports that the number of deaths is under three hundred; two hundred and eighty-eight bodies have been found. The Federal troops still patrol the city, although General Greeley has demanded a written request to that effect from the Mayor. The Federal Government has appropriated $2,500,000 as a relief fund, most of which it has disbursed through the War Department. Only $300,000 was placed to the credit of the San Francisco Citizens' Relief Committee. This has caused some feeling among the citizens, and some criticism of the President's proclamation concerning this matter. The United Railroads have resumed operating their electric cars by a circuitous route around the city to the ferries. At first, transportation was free; later, only women and children free; men were made to pay, and the resulting fares were turned over to the relief fund. Retailers are crowding into the residential district; so are professional men. Rents there are rising rapidly, and the residents are vacating their homes and renting them for business purposes.

Little has yet been done toward clearing the city. The mountains of debris will require months to remove. San Francisco is a city of ruins and shattered, broken walls, most of which, however, are still standing. Practically all of the steel-frame buildings are standing and only their woodwork and other inflammable parts are gone; most of them can be reconstructed without much difficulty. Of the other buildings, not one in a hundred was destroyed by the earthquake; the destruction of the city has been practically, in its entirety, due to fire. The United States Mint had its windows protected with steel shutters, as were the San Francisco warehouses in the days of '49. Had the modern steel-frame buildings used this pioneer precaution, it is probable that every one of them would have been, both building and contents, intact today.

The San Francisco newspapers give optimistic accounts of the present conditions which are not strictly true. To read them, one would imagine that the ruins are largely cleared away and that building is going on. For example, a headline several days ago read thus: "Ruins are razed; street railways running; water mains repaired; and San Francisco resumes the functions of a metropolis." Only where walls were dangerous have they been torn down; the street railways did not resume until three days after this statement, and then only partially; the day after it was printed the water mains were not only not repaired, but were shut off completely, in order to fill the reservoirs and (with the resulting pressure) find out where to make the repairs. As to San Francisco "resuming the functions of a metropolis," she can scarcely do so yet, when she is more than three-fourths destroyed. The city is still in darkness; the houses have neither gas nor electric light.

A new retail district has sprung up in the Western Addition, but there are more San Francisco business men established in Oakland than in the metropolis. The camps of the refugees in parks and squares are diminishing daily as they take flight to other parts of the coast and the country. They have been well provided with food, clothing and other necessities by the organized relief work of the Citizens' Committees and the War Department. There has been an adequate supply of physicians, and trained nurses may be seen on every hand. There has been no pestilence, and, strangely enough, the death-roll has not been above normal.

There was much talk before the catastrophe about rebuilding the city on the Burnham plan. It was purely academic, however. There never was a better opportunity to rebuild a city, for, outside of the residence district, there is no city left. But it is now very evident that the property owners look with marked disfavor on any plan for widening the streets, enlarging squares, running boulevards or any other schemes which will depart from the present street lines. In our opinion, the Burnham plan is doomed.

There will be much pressure brought to bear upon the authorities to permit the erection of cheap structures and buildings which are not fireproof. If they do not resist this pressure, San Francisco will again be destroyed by fire, as it was destroyed in April, 1906, and as it was thrice destroyed before.

Will San Francisco Lose Her Sceptre?

A question which vitally interests not only all San Franciscans but the Pacific Coast as well is this: Will San Francisco's sceptre as a seaport be wrested from her? Will her supremacy as Queen of the Pacific be taken from her? There can be no question that San Francisco's natural advantages have given her so far an uncontested position—she is pre-eminently the commercial outlet of the western United States. The pretensions of smaller cities, such as Seattle, Tacoma, San Diego, to that proud position, have only amused the nation. Los Angeles is an inland city; she is nearly twenty miles from the seaboard, and unless she constructs a canal she never could attempt to contest with San Francisco for the supremacy of the seas. But some of the smaller seaboard cities have not hesitated to smite San Francisco's shield, and with the point, not the blunt end of the lance.

Now, however, comes danger from a new quarter. San Francisco for half a century has been seated on her many hills on the shores of the vast Pacific, overlooking the Golden Gate which opens from that mighty ocean into the greatest harbor of the world. There is no harbor on the globe that can compare with it for natural advantages. Probably the one which most nearly parallels it is that of Sydney, yet it has many dangers to navigation which are absent in San Francisco harbor.

It might be said that the position of a city on such a great land-locked sheet of water, a city located at the tip of a tongue of land which divides ocean and bay, would be unique. It might be thought that no other city could contest its supremacy. But is this true? When California first passed under the Stars and Stripes there was great difference of opinion as to which was the best point on her great harbor whereon to erect a great city. For a time it looked as if Benicia might be the future metropolis. But this was not to be. San Francisco won, and ever since San Francisco has sat enthroned in her majesty at the Golden Gate.

Competition of Other Cities.

The danger now comes from another source. However great may be the energy, however remarkable the rapidity with which the indomitable San Franciscans will build up their beloved San Francisco, there will be a period during which her commercial activities must perforce be idle. It will take months to clear away the tangle of trolleys, of wires and poles, the heaps of beams and bricks, the mountains of ashes, cinders and slag that now disfigure the site of the once beautiful city. After these months of clearing the desolated city, years will pass before there will again be another completed city there. During all this time, what of the former population with its suburbs, of probably half a million? What of the many thriving cities along the coast and around the bay that were supplied by San Francisco? They will look to other sources of supply. To whom will they look? Primarily to the Bay and Coast cities, secondarily to the Eastern jobbers. For water-borne supplies—heavy goods, staples, and the like—they will necessarily look to the bay cities. For lighter and more perishable supplies—which must be more rapidly brought hither—they may look to the Eastern sales agents. There will be a struggle between the two, but in point of price, as a carrier, the water will always beat the rail. In point of quickness the rail will often beat the water. But in times of stress and strain people depend more upon staples than they do upon luxuries. Furthermore, all the trans-continental trunk lines between the Mississippi Valley and the Atlantic seaboard, working together, could not carry a tithe of the needs of the large population which previously was supplied by the city of San Francisco. Los Angeles will profit by San Francisco's disaster. So will Portland, Tacoma, Seattle: all of these lesser cities will profit by the great city's disaster. Those lesser cities which have terminal rates, such as Sacramento and San Jose, will profit by it up to the extent of the jobbing territory which they can command. But the one that will profit by it most of all is the city of Oakland.

Oakland As a Rival.

As a seaport city, Oakland is no mean rival to San Francisco. Oakland has navigable water on two sides, or (counting the branch of the San Antonio estuary) upon three sides. True, much of this water is shallow, but there are magnificent harbors in the Old World which have been dug out of shallow sloughs and sluggish ditches. The Elbe at Hamburg is a narrow and insignificant stream compared with the great rivers of this Western world. Yet, for some score of miles down the Elbe from Hamburg to the sea, this river's shores are lined with the sea-going craft of all the maritime nations of the world. Where Glasgow is situated, on the Clyde, that stream was once what is known in America as "a creek." Yet the Clyde has been dredged out until today the leviathans of peace and war, the great sea-monsters of the trans-Atlantic lines, the creations of the great captains of the shipbuilding industry, are built and launched there month after month, year after year. So narrow is the Clyde at Glasgow that these ships, some of them five and six hundred feet in length, cannot be launched head to the stream, as is the custom, but are launched broadside on, for fear they should run their bows into the opposite bank.

When one considers what great centres of commerce and of shipbuilding have been created in the Old World out of such utterly insignificant material, one may readily see the possibilities of Oakland. She has a water-front of many miles; she already has two great transcontinental railways with terminal points there, and soon will have a third; she has a fleet of ferryboats carrying passengers the few miles across the bay; she has other fleets of transfer boats transferring whole trains of cars laden with merchandise; and she has a third line of boats plying up the estuary carrying freight alone. Truly Oakland is no mean rival, and even if she should not succeed in wresting from San Francisco's brow the mural crown of supremacy which she has worn for half a century, at least, while the prouder sister is prostrate in ashes, Oakland may succeed in depriving her of some of her heritage.

San Francisco's Commercial Centre.

What will be the result of the new upbuilding of San Francisco? All that portion of the city which lay between Van Ness Avenue and the Bay on the east, from North Beach to Townsend Street on the south, has been wiped out of existence. It covered an irregular area of eight to ten square miles. West of this burned district lay the resident section of the city. On the northern end of it were the aristocratic quarters, Pacific Heights and Presidio Heights; south of this the Western Addition, made up of the substantial homes of those well to do, but not inordinately rich; south of this again the Mission district, containing the more modest homes of the less moneyed people; south of this again the homes of the toilers. In the zones between Polk, Larkin and Van Ness Avenue and along Fillmore Street lay the subsidiary retail district. The wants of the dwellers in the western half of the city were largely met by this lesser retail district. The Fillmore Street zone is practically unharmed. To-day the dwellers who remain in San Francisco depend on this lesser retail district for their needs. Already there are hastening thither the great retail houses of the downtown district, securing temporary quarters and attempting to secure accommodations for the many months which they foresee will pass before they can again be domiciled in permanent quarters further downtown. Here also are hastening the lawyers and the other men who occupy offices, securing quarters in the upper parts of buildings hitherto given up to lodgings.

The wholesalers, the commission merchants, the agents of great Eastern manufacturers, the warehouse men, the liquor merchants, and kindred business men seem many of them to be settling on the eastern shore of the bay in the city of Oakland. Even if they look upon their sojourn there as temporary, it may be longer than any of us think.

What will be the outcome of these swarming movements of the wholesale merchants, the retailers, and the professional men? Will it permanently affect the commercial districts of the city? Will the solid downtown wholesale element return to where it was before the fire? Will the important retail quarter of San Francisco, so long frequented by the fashionable shoppers, continue to occupy the space between Montgomery and Powell, Sutter and Market, or will it go farther westward? These are questions which it will be difficult to answer. Every property owner in the downtown wholesale district is firmly convinced that the wholesalers can do business nowhere else. So the property owners in the former retail district sneer at the idea tion. Yet no man can tell. If the dwellers in the Western Addition find themselves inconvenienced by the proximity of fine retail stores—dry-goods, jewelers, bookstores, furnishing goods stores, clothing, optical goods, florists, fine groceries, candy stores, shoes, millinery, pianos, musical instruments, and the host of other establishments required for the needs of our complex modern civilization—if they find themselves inconvenienced by the growth of such establishments within a few minutes of their homes rather than half an hour away, will they not discourage the return of the retailers to the district further downtown?

The "Made Ground" in San Francisco.

There is another factor in the downtown commercial rebuilding which seems to be carefully avoided in discussing these matters. It is this: When the city of San Francisco was laid out there lay a bight or small bay on the eastern shore of the peninsula between Clark's Point on the north and Rincon Point on the south. North and south of the bight or cove these hills ran out into the bay, and these points were made up of rock and sand. Between them lay this vast territory on which was built the downtown district. It was a mud flat, covered by water at high tide. When the tide was low, a vast stretch of mud lay between the coast land and the water line. To show how great a distance it covered, the highest point of this mud flat, where it met the firm sand of the beach, came nearly up to the rear of the present Hall of Justice, fronting on Portsmouth Square, at Kearney Street near Washington. If a pedestrian walks from the Hall of Justice to the foot of Washington Street wharf, it will give him an idea of how far up this mud flat penetrates in the solid heart of San Francisco's soil. It is something like a mile. In the early fifties ships were hauled up on this mud flat at crazy structures called "wharves," when their crews abandoned them and fled to the mines in their mad thirst for gold. On the northwest corner of Clay and Sansome Streets there is an old building called the Niantic. It is so called after a ship of that name which lay at Clay-street wharf during the gold seekers' rush. She sank down in the mud and slush and ooze, and presently a lodging house was built on her decks by some thrifty speculator of the time, where lodgings were let out to the returning miners at the trifle of four or five dollars a night. Many years after, the writer saw workmen excavating there for the foundations of the present substantial structure, and with his own eyes he saw the lines of the hull, the bilge of which protruded well out under Clay street. He saw the workmen removing the rotting ribs of the old ship, which had sailed many seas in her days, at last to come to an inglorious end as the basement of a lodging house in a San Francisco mud flat.

To the north of this on Merchant Street is a block of buildings over forty years old. These buildings, like many others there, have been slowly slipping toward the bay into and over the quagmire beneath. When sales of land have taken place, it has sometimes been necessary for the adjoining owners to deed to each other in exchange an inch or so on eastern and western lines. This gradual slipping forward of the mass of buildings characterizes the whole of the territory affected. Although these statements will be stoutly denied by many whose interests are unfavorably affected by them, they are patent to the most casual observer. Nearly every new building located in that district within the last ten years has been forced to set its sidewalk on the "official grade." This official line is not measured from the uncertain surface of the earth, but is fixed scientifically from the "base line," which is determined by considerations with which the slipping and sinking soil in that district has nothing to do. Therefore it is that pedestrians in the downtown district so often find themselves forced to mount steps when they reach a sidewalk in front of a new building, sometimes going up as high as two or three feet. The lower level of the old sidewalks shows the manner and the extent to which the soil has sunk since the date of their construction. Correspondingly, when the present Market Street Railway cable was constructed, some score of years ago, the engineers found that on lower Market Street the official grade of the street—on which grade they were legally obliged to lay their rails—was twelve to twenty-four inches above the then level of the street, the street sinking more as they reached the foot of Market Street. They remained in a quandary for some time, and finally determined to lay their line on the official levels. This they did. Their action created consternation among the downtown property owners, who moved heaven and earth to force the railway people to lower their levels. But they failed. Even the city authorities were forced to raise their pavements, and the property owners were forced to hoist up their sidewalks. In the course of these succeeding years they have sunk again.

Sky-Scrapers on Mud Foundations.

If the owners of land on this mud flat decide to rebuild in steel-frame construction, they will have to carry the foundations on piles, as has been the case hitherto with two and three-story brick structures. Many such buildings there are now supported by hundred-foot piles. These piles have been driven down through the mud, sometimes striking nothing solid, even at a depth of a hundred feet. Sometimes a couple of hundred-foot piles have been driven down, one on top of the other, without striking bedrock. It is on this quagmire that the builders of colossal steel-frame sky-scrapers must support their structures. The support will not be given by the base of the piles resting on rock or sank, but on the friction between the piles and the surrounding mud. This has been found sufficient for the support of two or three story buildings. Will it constitute a sufficient support for the foundations of ten and twelve story buildings? This is a problem for architects and engineers.

In every severe earthquake known in California this district has suffered heavily. It would not be fair to say that it has always suffered most severely, for earthquakes are eccentric. At times the houses built on rock or sand in the western part of San Francisco have also suffered severely, but generally speaking it is the belief of old residents that brick or stone buildings on this unsubstantial soil are subjected to greater damage than those on rock or sand. The earthquake of April 18, 1906, is the most severe experienced in San Francisco in the memory of white men. Will the land-owners build again on this district with tall steel-frame buildings, and show the same tenacity and the same fearlessness as they did after the lesser shocks of 1865, 1868, and 1871?

Will Tall Buildings Concentrate the Business Area?

The question of tall buildings raises another factor in the construction of new San Francisco. Hitherto tall buildings have been the exception and not the rule in this city. It is only a decade and a half of years since the first of these buildings was erected, that of the Chronicle. Since then the number has been smaller than in any city of similar size in the East. It may be due to the higher cost of labor and structural steel. It may be that people fear the effect of earthquakes on these tall buildings. Yet the recent earthquake shock shows distinctly that modern steel-frame buildings bear the brunt of the earth's waves better than any other form of structure. This would seem to point clearly to a vastly increased number of tall steel-frame buildings in San Francisco. If hundreds of owners erecting such buildings make them twelve stories high, this would make an average in cubical measurement more than three times as great as the old buildings destroyed by the fire. By a simple process of reasoning it is easy to see that one-third to one-fourth the number of twelve-story buildings would house the same number of people as previously completely filled the three and four story buildings that previously stood there. What will be the result? If San Francisco's downtown retail and downtown wholesale districts should be covered with twelve-story buildings, would they at first only be one-third occupied, or would the downtown retail and the downtown wholesale districts be only covered with one-third of the space previously occupied by the buildings and still adequately house the population and business which previously covered the entire space?

Shifting of Business Centres.

Already in San Francisco there is an ominous menace of a shifting of business centres. A number of wholesalers and warehouse men who have been burned out and who desire to open up for business immediately had made arrangements to go to the Oakland side. The Real Estate Exchange heard of their intentions, and hastily called a meeting of the two committees. The wholesale men avowed their intention of moving unless adequate ground and facilities at reasonable rents were given them on the San Francisco side. The President of the Real Estate Exchange then assured them that they could be given hundred-acre lots at the south end of the city outside of the burned district at two hundred dollars per month. To this figure the wholesalers demurred, saying they were offered much larger plots of ground on the Oakland side for a purely nominal sum. This shows that the Oakland people are intent on taking away as much of the wholesale and warehouse business of San Francisco as they can. The Real Estate men then urged the warehouse men to give them a couple of days more to present new propositions, which was acceded to. The two bodies are to meet again, but the wholesalers are showing great restlessness and may be induced by the Oaklanders to accept their terms.

Altogether, a certain shifting of business centres may be expected in San Francisco. Even before its destruction by fire, the city, from a real-estate standpoint, was in a semi-fluid condition. The wholesale district had been changing from the old quarter on Front and Battery streets to the district south of Market Street, on lower Mission Street. The retail shopping district had been drifting from Montgomery up as far north as Market and Powell. Such a movement could not fail to be accelerated by the conflagration which has practically wiped out both the retail and wholesale districts. He will be a wise man who can foretell exactly what the lines of the new district will be.

A potent factor in determining the boundaries of these new districts will be concentration of investment. In an embryonic city, continual concentration in one quarter with the weight of great aggregated wealth will bring about sweeping changes. A single fortune will not do it. It requires many fortunes. The late James G. Fair, with his twenty odd millions, attempted to arrest the decay of the district between Montgomery Street and the water-front. He erected some fine buildings there, but he did not effect an appreciable change. Had he, as colleagues, the millions of half a dozen men as rich as himself, he might have accomplished the result he strove for.

Now, however, conditions are different. If half a dozen plutocrats were to invest largely in any one spot in San Francisco, they could determine absolutely, for a generation to come, the specific character of that special district. This is the age of combinations; if a handful of millionaires should combine to change the boundaries of San Francisco, they could not only determine definitively the character of the district in which they invested their millions, but would add immeasurably to its value.

One of the factors which will make toward stability and against change is the Southern Pacific Company. This corporation is, beyond question, the richest and most powerful institution in California. Its freight depots, yards and warehouses on the San Francisco side of the bay are not injured. The piers and docks of the steamship companies which it controls, such as the Pacific Mail, Occidental and Oriental, San Francisco and Portland, and the Japanese Steamship Companies are all intact. It is therefore quite evident that the Southern Pacific officials will make no changes in their present piers, docks and stations on the San Francisco side of the bay. That they will establish new ones is also beyond question. They will run steam railway lines through the burned district for the purpose of clearing away the debris. While these lines will be called "temporary franchises," it is not improbable that some of them will remain. It may be that the Southern Pacific may eventually have a belt line around the city. Such a franchise would have been stubbornly resisted a few weeks ago, but if great corporations must courtesy to great cities in times of tranquillity, great cities must sometimes ask favors of great corporations in time of calamity and time of war.

Federal, State, Municipal and Amateur Government.

During the period when San Francisco lay at the mercy of the flames there was a temporary paralysis of civil government. Thereupon the federal arm was extended. The authorities of the San Francisco military posts at once took charge of the distracted city—presumably at the request of the municipal authorities, though that question is still an open one. Governor Pardee hastened to call on the National Guard, and at once sent the militia to San Francisco. There was also organized a committee or citizens' body called variously a "Committee of Safety" or a "Vigilance Committee." Before twenty-four hours had passed there was presented the curious spectacle of a city patrolled and guarded by Federal troops, State troops, Municipal police, and amateur "Safety Committees." As a result there was continual friction and many clashes of authority. Generals Greeley and Funston command the Federal troops, Governor Pardee commands the State troops, and Mayor Schmitz is in charge of the municipal police. All seem to have acted with discretion and consideration, and to have avoided causes for friction, but it was not always so with their subordinates. As a result, the citizens of San Francisco who were irritated by what they considered reckless shooting and tyrannical treatment, demanded the removal of the National Guard. Governor Pardee warmly resented this aspersion on the character of the State troops, and up to the present writing has refused to remove them. Mayor Schmitz disavows any reflections on the State troops, and speaks highly of their conduct. The charges made against them have come apparently from individual citizens and groups of citizens, and not from municipal officials. General Greeley has scrupulously refrained from interfering in this controversy. He has tactfully yet persistently maintained that his forces have been called in by the municipal authorities, and that he has been acting entirely with them, and, in a sense, under their direction.

Nearly all concerned, however, unite in condemning the actions of some of the "Safety Committee" men. A most wanton affair was the killing of H. C. Tilden while going in an automobile on urgent errands of relief for the suffering. He misunderstood or refused to accede to a demand to "Halt!" made by a "Safety Committee" patrol. Thereupon he was fired on. He was instantly killed and another man in the car was wounded. The three young men concerned in the killing were arrested by the Federal troops and confined in the guardhouse at Fort Mason. They claimed that authority had been given them by some militia officers, but it is not easy to see how militia officers can empower "Safety Committees" to perform military duty when they have duly enlisted troops under them for the performance of such duties.

Altogether, it would seem as if the killing of the unfortunate Tilden was the inevitable result of giving authority to persons not duly made responsible for its enforcement. The preservation of law and order should be entrusted to the officers of the law and to them alone in times of tranquillity. In extraordinary periods of war, fire, pestilence or famine, the civil authorities, under our system of government, may call upon the military. But in this day of our generation, California is old enough to have outgrown this:

to amateur militarism. We have had "Safety Committees" and "Vigilantes" in the past. They may have worked well or ill for California. It is quite evident that their traditions endure, because when a Chinese wash-house is burned in California, some one at once organizes a "Vigilance Committee." But the time is past for that sort of thing. It may have been necessary in our younger and more turbulent times. It is not necessary now. We are past the age of the "Vigilantes." Let the law be carried out by the officers of the law, behind whom stands the State, back of which again looms the mighty power of the Federal Government.

It is curious to note how in half a hundred years the people of this country have turned instinctively from their own weak "citizens' patrols" and "guards," "Vigilantes" and "Safety Committees" to the protection of the powerful Federal arm. It shows how the City and the State are becoming mere organic cells in the great organization we call our Federal Union. Once they were distinct entities, each with its own autonomy. Now they are merely parts of the whole. Where once a city would rely upon itself and ignore State officials and even defy them—as San Francisco did in the Vigilante period of 1856—now it welcomes State aid. Once where the shotted cannon of the Vigilante Committee pointed from Fort Gunnybags down toward the water-front where lay an American gunboat, whose commander offered asylum to David S. Terry, a fugitive from the vigilante justice, now to-day to these same waters hasten American ships of war from every point on the coast, bringing protection, supplies and food.

In 1856 San Francisco was distinctly a Vigilante town, and she defied the Governor of California and treated with semi-hostility a United States ship of war. In 1906 San Francisco has welcomed the Government's dispatch hither of State troops, has hailed with joy the protection of the American army and navy, and is disposed to look with suspicion on amateur Vigilantes.

There are many changes in fifty years.

Effects of Dynamiting.

A marked difference of opinion exists in San Francisco concerning the work of dynamiting the buildings during the recent fire. As the water mains were, many of them, ruptured by the earthquake, a fire brigade, acting under the orders of the municipal officers, began dynamiting buildings in the portions threatened by the advancing flames. All night long, the day after the earthquake, the dull boom of dynamite explosions could be heard fifty miles from San Francisco. The firemen certainly succeeded in checking the conflagration after many hours, but the citizens are divided in their belief as to whether this was due to the dynamite or not. Those who have had the most experience in such matters believe that the dynamiters did not work sufficiently far in advance of the flames; that had they done so, great open spaces would have been presented with nothing for the flames to feed upon.

However that may be, a strong sentiment against the dynamite brigade grew up during the course of the conflagration. The United States Mint went through the fire almost unscathed. Superintendent Leach shut the steel shutters and got out his fire brigade; as a result, the government building stood like a rock while everything around it disappeared in the fierce heat. But two days after the earthquake the dynamite brigade began blowing down dangerous walls on Market street a block away from the Mint. At that time the Mint employees were loading wagons with specie to be shipped to Oakland to enable the Oakland banks to open their doors. The first blast proved so dangerous to the Mint and to the Mint workmen that the Superintendent at once shut down operations, dismissed the wagons, and closed his shutters again until the dynamite storm should blow over. The hail of brickbats, bolts, and fragments of beams, etc., was like a cannonade. The Mint employees remarked that the building had gone through the earthquake and the fire with less damage than from the dynamite blasting.

Later on the dynamite brigade turned their attention to the financial district around California, Montgomery and Sansome streets. When the bankers saw them coming they fled in terror to the City Fathers and prayed for mercy. They begged and pleaded so earnestly that finally the city authorities relented, called off the dynamite brigade, and the dangerous walls were pulled down with donkey engines. These are more old fashioned, but apparently not so fatal.

The citizens of San Francisco seem in this cataclysm to have had all the elements arrayed against them. First they had the earthquake; then, when turned out of their houses, there came fog, wind, storm, and fierce rains on their unsheltered bodies; then fire ravaged their unprotected homes. Thus they had to undergo the terrible ordeal of earth, air, fire and water. When nature had nearly finished them, man took a hand and did them up with dynamite.

Peculiarities of the Fire.

Among the many strange freaks of the fire that devastated San Francisco was the curious fact that so many buildings went first at the top. All the spectators seem to concur in saying that vast balls or bodies of flame seemed to leap from building to building and from block to block, sometimes crossing streets, but never squares; that these flame balls would ignite the roof of a building like a torch, whereupon the flames would at once burst forth from the top, and the building would then burn downwards. In the case of the tall buildings, story after story would thus yield one after another to the flames, but it frequently happened that the fire was checked before it reached the street level. Hence it is that so many basements and lower floors are not injured. In the case of the banks and safe deposit vaults this was most fortunate. There seem to be none of these whose vaults have been destroyed by the fire. In fact, in most of them the upper stories soon yielded to the flames and quickly fell in, so that in many cases a mountain of debris is heaped up on the vaults, which latter have not been touched by the flames. This is a reversal of the ordinary condition of things. Fires starting in buildings usually either go up or down the elevator shafts. If they start in the basement, they frequently climb to the roof by the elevator shaft, and then the fire burns from both ends, meeting in the building. This was the case in two notable fires some years ago in San Francisco, the H. S. Crocker building, on Bush street, and the Bancroft building, on Market street. In each case the fire started at the bottom and at first burned upward; story after story fell, until the whole interior contents of the buildings was heaped up in the basement; the standing walls then served as a vast chimney, up which the fire roared sometimes to a height of over a hundred feet above the cornices. This recent fire of April, 1906, seems to have acted in an entirely different manner.

Street Railway and Real Estate Investments.

Verily, no man—or woman—can tell what a day may bring forth. It is only a few months since the United Railroads took over the greater part of San Francisco's street railway system. They paid a round price for the cable stocks, and the stockholders of those roads profited accordingly. The stocks were well held, and many old San Francisco families owned street-railway stocks which had been in their possession since the roads were built. In many cases the stocks had risen to a point where they commanded an enormous premium over par. Naturally, those holders parted with their stocks with reluctance, but feeling comforted, however, by the reflection that they were selling their shares for several times what they cost, and selling them for cash; also, that it was quite possible for them to invest the resulting cash to good advantage. This they hastened to do. Many of them were women; a number of the richer women of the city, including many wealthy widows, were large holders in street-railway stocks. Women on this coast like to have tangible holdings. In older countries they are quite content with stocks, bonds, rentes, consols and government bonds generally, which securities they never see, but from which their income returns with promptness and regularity. Here in this semi-pioneer country they seem to prefer tangible belongings. They like to own houses and lands and jewels and things they can see. Therefore, most of these wealthy women were suddenly confronted with the necessity of investing hundreds of thousands of dollars. The alternative was "losing interest on the money"—something which appalls the wealthy heart. So they made haste to rush into real estate. There is little else to invest in here. There are a few firm local securities in San Francisco, such as gas and water stocks. The electric power stocks are closely held. Thus there remain but a few small corporations like the powder companies. When the street-railway stocks were eliminated, there remained little to invest in but real estate. Most of these wealthy women so invested. Most of them purchased improved property, land bearing buildings bringing in incomes; thus they saved themselves the worry and trouble of erecting structures on unimproved lands. Most of them paid stiff prices both for land and buildings. To-day many of them find themselves with their buildings gone, their revenues gone, and possessed of naught but vacant land, covered with mountains of debris. This land has depreciated in value, so much so that it may be difficult for them to mortgage it for enough to erect new buildings on the empty land.

Uptown Retail District.

There is a phase of the possible change of the retail district in San Francisco which must not be unnoticed. When San Francisco was built, half a century ago, street transportation was slow, costly and bad. Now it is cheap, swift and good. Those who in childhood rode from one end of San Francisco to the other on the "North Beach and South Park Horse-Car Line," Michael Skelly, Superintendent, always took a package of cold lunch with them before they started. When a man left the ferries and got aboard a venerable horse-car to go to the San Jose station near Valencia Street, he always took a book or paper along to fill up the time with. Yet this was the seed from which grew the present colossal Market-Street system, with its many branches. In the old days, dwellers in the neighborhood of what is now called Pacific Heights had but one way of reaching there from downtown. It was by the "bobtail" or balloon horse-cars on the "Sutter Street Railway, H. Casebolt, Superintendent." This took about an hour and a quarter, to go from the foot of Market Street to the outlying terminus.

Even twenty years ago the crawling horse-car had only been replaced by the slow and clumsy cable. When one cable-car stuck, all the other cable-cars stopped. When the cable broke, everything stopped. And with the cable system it took over three-quarters of an hour to go from the present fashionable residence district to the ferries.

Now all this is changed. With the swift electric traction system it is possible to go from the finer residence districts to the ferries in twenty minutes or less. This is less than half the time of twenty years ago and less than one-fourth the time of fifty years ago, when San Francisco's downtown wholesale and uptown retail districts were laid out. This marked change in transportation will also doubtless have its effect in determining the retail and wholesale boundaries of the new San Francisco.

Municipal Ownership.

Among the many other things which have been knocked down and out by the earthquake, municipal ownership in San Francisco seems to be the leading one. This fad was in a most thriving condition on the 17th of April, 1906. Two days afterward there were none so poor to do it reverence. Even the "Examiner," which has been its friend through thick and thin, remarked that "municipal ownership seems to have had a slight setback." There are nearly a score of Supervisors, all of whom were urgent advocates of municipal ownership a fortnight ago; now they frankly admit that they have changed their minds. When interviewed they say that all the money raised by taxation will be "absolutely required for necessities." From this it is evident that they looked upon municipal ownership, not as a necessity, but as a luxury. In short, they considered it a way of paying $5.00 a day for $3.00 men and $4.00 a day for $2.00 men.

The San Francisco Postoffice.

For several months the press and people of San Francisco have been very harsh in the opinions they expressed concerning Postmaster Fiske's operations of the postoffice. The "Argonaut" took no part in this criticism. At times we suffered from postal delays as did others, but we took it for granted that the Postmaster was doing the best he could. The removal from the old quarters to the new postoffice was in itself a colossal task, and the Postmaster went on to Washington at his own expense and spent weeks in getting the department and Congress to ameliorate conditions. Then he returned and entered upon a most disagreeable task, that of weeding out old employees, who, by reason of age or physical incapacity, were unsuited for their posts. It was while engaged in this task that the earthquake came. The shock which paralyzed all communications—railway, express, telephone, telegraph—naturally struck hardest at the postoffice. Yet no one can deny that in the face of this terrific blow the San Francisco postoffice has done wonders. There has been some delay, but not nearly so much as might be expected, considering the magnitude of the disaster, and the postoffice seems to be rapidly getting on its feet. The many harsh criticisms made on the operations of the postoffice by Postmaster Fiske in recent months seem to us unwarranted. We consider it no more than just to extend to him this meed of praise for the way he has risen to the situation in the recent paralysis of all means of communication.

The origin of many parts of our attire is curious and interesting. The hatband can be traced to a fillet which held in shape a simple piece of cloth. Sometimes this fillet was tied in a bow behind, the tails of which survive in the Scotch cap, the sailor hat and the bishop's mitre. A little bow inside in the lining of the hat is a survival of a lacing which kept the lining in shape, or possibly takes us back to a time when a hat was made by putting a string through holes in a flat piece of leather, and, by tightening it, producing a crown. The plumes in hats are on the left side because in early times the adornments were so big that they would have seriously interfered with the use of the sword if worn on the right. The helmet of the fireman is practically identical with those worn by the ancient Greeks. The large white collar, such as Milton wore, is still in a smaller form worn by the clergymen who preach in Geneva gowns. Buttons on coat sleeves point to a time when coats were very costly and it was customary to turn back the sleeves so that they should not be soiled. The origin of the two buttons on the back of the coat is due to their support of the sword-belt. There is no satisfactory reason why in European countries the buttons on men's clothes should be always on the right side and those of women on the left. The possible connection between the ornamentation on modern boots and the openwork shoes of the Romans is noticeable.

Dr. D. B. Hill, who lived in Springfield, Ill., from 1836 to 1843, tells this characteristic story of Abraham Lincoln, with whom he was personally acquainted: "Once Lincoln was defending a man who was accused of cheating another man in a business deal. Lincoln was arguing before the jury that his client had no intention to defraud when the transaction occurred; in fact, that he never thought he was cheating the man. Pointing his finger at Judge Logan, his partner, Lincoln said: 'Any boy you meet in the street knows how to put on his clothes. You all know that Judge Logan is learned in the law, and nobody would accuse him of doing wrong. You will observe he has his shirt on with the wrong side in front. Now, the judge never intended to do that when he put his shirt on. You see, people do wrong without intending to do so. If my client has done anything wrong, he never intended to do so, any more than Judge Logan intended to put on his shirt with the back side in front.' Sure enough, Judge Logan had his shirt on wrong, and the use Lincoln made of his partner's mistake in dress caused his client to get off free."

The great Duke of Wellington was noted for his rigid integrity. Here is an instance which occurred in reference to his large estate. Some farm adjoining his lands was for sale, and his agent negotiated for him for the purchase. Having concluded the business, he went to the duke and told him he had made a capital bargain. "What do you mean?" asked the duke. "Why, your grace, I have got the farm for so much, and I know it to be worth at least so much more." "Are you quite sure of that?" "Quite sure, your grace, for I have carefully surveyed it." "Very well, then, pay the gentleman from me the balance between what you have already given and the real value of the estate."

Alexander Dumas, pere, was once asked by an officious interviewer: "You are an octoroon, are you not, Mr. Dumas?" "Certainly." "And your father?" "He was a quadroon." "And his father?" "A mulatto, sir, a mulatto!" "And his father?" "A negro, sir, a negro!" "Might I presume so far as to ask what his father was?" "An ape, sir, mon Dieu, an ape! My pedigree ends where yours commences!"

Old Parson Helton, a Baptist preacher of Tennessee, had eighteen sons, and during the Civil War sixteen enlisted in the Union Army and two sided with the Confederates. When the old minister had reached his eighty-eighth year, some one, who did not know about his sons' views, asked him where his sympathies lay during the war. "My sympathies were with the Union by fourteen majority," said the old man.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Yes!!!!!!

Editors "Argonaut"—Gentlemen: Was your building destroyed in the fire? Respectfully yours,
GEORGE HYDE,
1816 Chicago St., Omaha, Neb.
24th April, 1906.

From Chicago.

Chicago, Ill., April 25, 1906.

Editor "Argonaut": For the first time in twenty years your paper will be missing, and I feel just as I would if a dear friend had died. We join hands in a common sorrow, and my grief is great both on your account and my own. But I want to send a message of cheer to you, with the fervent hope that you will bear up bravely in your affliction, and amidst the trials which beset you, rise nobly to the occasion, and prove yourself worthy of your name. As Havelock Ellis remarked, "Set your shoulder joyously to the world's wheel," and all will be well. You have my deepest sympathy, and all my good wishes for future success. Yours very truly
GEORGE R. SPARKS.

From Ohio.

Van Wert, Ohio, April 21, 1906.

Editor "Argonaut": Your favor of the 16th inst. is at hand and contents fully noted. I already have a copy of Mr. Hart's "Two Argonauts in Spain" and "Levantine Log Book." But I wished a copy of the "Argonaut Letters" in order to possess all of Mr. Hart's works. I very much regret that "Argonaut Letters" is not to be had. Like all other citizens, I am in deep sympathy with the citizens of San Francisco at this time. I hope that the city will be rebuilt. I trust that the "Argonaut" has not suffered in any way.

Yours truly,
F. W. PURMORT.

From Mid Atlantic.

Steamship "Canopic," at the Azores, April 13, 1906.

Dear "Argonaut": Enclosed please find two-dollar bill, in return for which kindly instruct one of your agents to send me "A Levantine Log Book." Since Christmas the Boston bookstores have always been in a state of "just sold out." Address
CAPT. I. SEALBY,
S.S. "Canopic," White Star Line, 84 State St., Boston.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Admiral Cervera, who commanded the Spanish fleet at Santiago, has been appointed chief of the maritime district of Ferrol.

The men who have been writing the magazine articles which the President asserts have disgusted him are the following: Upton Sinclair, David Graham Phillips, Alfred Henry Lewis, Henry Beach Needham, Lincoln Steffens, Ray Stannard Baker.

It is told of Herbert Spencer that when out for a drive from time to time he would have his carriage stopped, no matter if in a crowded London street, till he had felt of his pulse. If it was regular, the drive continued; if not, he went directly home.

There are now five British peeresses who were actresses, namely, May Carrington (Lady de Clifford), Belle Bilton (Countess Clancarty), Connie Gilchrist (Countess of Orkney), Rosie Boote (Marchioness of Headfort) and Anna Robinson (Countess of Rosslyn).

ington. From 1873 to 1885 he was United States Consul at Hong-kong.

The first tribunal of the Seine was to have heard the arguments April 28 and determine the question of a reconciliation between Countess Boni De Castellane and her husband, but the hearing was postponed owing to the desire of the Count, who is a candidate for reelection to the Chamber of Deputies, not to proceed with the case pending the conclusion of the electoral campaign.

It having come to the Czar's knowledge that General Kouropatkin was about ready to publish his memoirs, which he has been writing since he returned from the war, an emissary from Interior Minister Durnovo went to the general's home and demanded the proof sheets. Kouropatkin had no option; he surrendered the proofs. All the proofs and manuscript are being lodged in the Ministry of the Interior.

Tax Collector J. F. Nichols broke all records Saturday in his temporary headquarters at 2511 Sacramento street. The largest payment was by M. H. de Young, who handed Tax Collector Nichols a certified check in the amount of $11,960.98, this representing the taxes on Mr. de Young's San Francisco properties. In making the payment, Mr. de Young presented, in duplicate, a full list of his properties.

Raynaldo Hahn, one of the more eminent song-writers of the day, like Mme. Carreno, was born at Caracas, in Venezuela. He studied for a number of years in Paris, where he still lives, and where his "Chansons Grises," "Chansons Latines," and "Chansons Espagnoles," his opera, "L'Ile de Reve," his symphonic poem, "Nuit d'amour Bergamesque" and his incidental music to the drama "Esther" are very popular.

King Edward always wears a gold bangle or bracelet on his left wrist. He is never without it, and it is quite a familiar object to all the members of the royal entourage, but the history of it is not generally known. It has very tragic associations, as it belonged to the ill-fated Emperor Maximilian of Mexico, who wore it always, and from whose arm it was removed after his execution, and later came into possession of King Edward, who has worn it ever since.

Harry Dam, who was one of the most brilliant journalists of California fifteen years ago, died in Havana, April 25, of cancer of the stomach. Mr. Dam was a native of California. Henry Jackson Wells Dam, the dramatist and magazine writer, graduate of the University of California, was married in London in 1892 to Dorothy Dorr, an actress. He was for several years engaged in dramatic work in London. Some of his plays produced in this country and England were "Diamond Deane," "The Silver Shell," "The White Silk Dress," "La Coquette," "La Madeline" and "Skipper and Company." He was a prominent member of the Bohemian Club, and a well-known writer on the "Argonaut," "Chronicle" and other San Francisco journals.

After an illness of little more than two days, Arthur B. Turnure, owner and editor of "Vogue," a weekly fashion magazine, died in New York last week. Mr. Turnure was fifty-one years old. He had been in the publishing business for nearly thirty years. Soon after his graduation from Princeton, in 1876, he founded the "Art Interchange." Later Mr. Turnure published the "Art Age." He was still a young man when he became the manager of Harper & Brothers' art department. At that time his uncle, Lawrence Turnure, a well-known banker, offered him a place in the office of his bank, but young Turnure had decided on the career of a publisher, and declined it. In 1902, with Harry McVickar, who has since died, Mr. Turnure established "Vogue," which he had since conducted.

Admiral Rojestvensky will be tried by court-martial. The special commission which has been investigating the naval battle at Tsushima Straits, in which the Russian fleet was destroyed by Admiral Togo, has reported in favor of court-martialing all the officers who were on board the torpedo-boat destroyer Bedovi, to which Vice Admiral Rojestvensky was transferred after the disabling of his flagship, for surrendering the vessel. Admiral Rojestvensky alone is excepted under the finding of the commission because he was wounded and unconscious when his flag was lowered. Vice Admiral Rojestvensky, who recently applied for retirement on the ground of shattered health, nevertheless has requested that he be tried with the others, though his punishment, as in the case of Vice Admiral Nebogatoff, may be dismissal in disgrace from the navy.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

Notes by a Frank Book Crank.

"War of the Worlds," by H. G. Wells, is a remarkable story. From Mars the Martians fire huge cylinders against the earth, filled with fighting machines; these gigantic tripods with 100-foot legs stalk over England. Heat-rays like searchlights burn everything; thick black smoke chokes every living thing in its range. England is desolate and deserted; all who can do so, flee. Finally the few human survivors crawl out and find the Martians dead—slain by the bacteria of putrefaction coming from dead bodies. Man is immune, owing to centuries of putrefactive contact; but the Martians, coming from Mars, a clean and non-bacterial planet, fall easy victims.

"The Nemesis of Froude," by Alex. Carlyle and J. C. Brown, is a severe arraignment of Froude for his conduct in printing the Carlyle Reminiscences. The authors convict him of bad faith and falsehood. They corroborate Charles Eliot Norton in his accusations of Froude's verbal garbling of Carlyle's and Mrs. Carlyle's letters. They prove him also to be greedy over the financial returns from the Carlyle MSS., and dishonest over their custody and ownership.

"The Social Secretary," by David Graham Phillips, is a light novel of Washington life. In it a young woman of good family but reduced circumstances coaches a rich parvenue Western family, tells them how to climb, and marries the son. It is short—only 31,000 words—This for $1.50!

"The Autobiography of Andrew D. White" is the story of a man who has been a credit to the United States, whether as Commissioner to peace conventions, college president or Ambassador. It is full of all manner of quotable matter, anecdotes, inside diplomatic history, etc. It tells much about the Hague Tribunal. President White is always frank except where some of our national policies are concerned. He is reticent over the disingenuous attitude into which the Monroe Doctrine forced us at the Hague Tribunal; of the political and business corruption lately revealed in the United States he himself says little, although mentioning foreign comment thereon. So with the work of the McKinley administration, Philippine annexation, etc. President White is a wise and far-seeing man. He endeavors to force himself to take an optimistic view of American civilization, but it is evident that the political corruption, lawless spirit shown by lynching, etc., the feeble, almost farcical administration of criminal "justice," the race problem in the South, the foreign immigration problem, the race and religious problems in our new possessions, the other questions connected with our insular dependencies, and the dangerous and undefined extension of the Monroe Doctrine dishearten him. In fact, he says so. The book abounds in anecdotes. It gives a good picture of life in western New York half a century ago. His inside history of the Hague convention is amazingly frank for a diplomatist.

"Moncure Daniel Conway, Autobiography, Memories and Experiences," is heavy, didactic, pompous, dull. Although written about striking events, it is not striking; although telling of interesting people, it is not interesting. It would be difficult to write a more uninteresting book about the people and the events discussed. The book tells of people in the United States and Great Britain from 1850 to 1900; among them, writers, artists, orators. It discusses the Civil War and antebellum days. It compares very unfavorably with the autobiography of Andrew D. White. The latter is a diplomat and a man of the world; the former a cranky cleric. Much space in it is given to "childhood and youth"—a very uninteresting period even in great men. Portraits of Uncle Lemuel and Aunt Jane abound. Mr. Conway was thrown in contact with scores—perhaps hundreds—of notable men in England and the United States, in stirring times like the Civil War. It is amazing that he could produce such a jejune record.

"The Queen's Quair," by Maurice Hewlett, strikes one as obscurely pornographic. Frank salaciousness is more effective in a book than salacious ambiguity. Vide Faublas, Casanova, Saturnin, De Sade. The story is very difficult to follow, it is so badly told. Even the pronouns are mixed—a common trick in conversation, but not to be expected from a "stylist." One goes through the book with a puzzled face, impelled continually to look at a "History of Scotland" to dig up the author's meaning. Sometimes it is necessary to read a paragraph two or three times. So much labor on a novel is a waste of time. Reading an historical or philosophical work so, one might be rewarded. But not with a semi-sensual romance.

San Francisco Libraries.

One of the irreparable losses resulting from the great fire is the magnificent libraries of San Francisco. A million volumes disappeared. Great collections of invaluable records came to the pitiful condition of making food for flames, and, unlike the city that fell, will never rise from the ashes. Of the books destroyed, it is believed that the value was in excess of $3,000,000. Among the collections that vanished were those collected in the main Public Library and two of its branches, the Mechanics' Institute Library, the Mercantile Library, the Sutro Library, the Pioneer Library, the Bohemian Club Library, the B'nai B'rith Library, the French Library, the San Francisco Law Library and the library of the Supreme Court. The number of volumes in these collections was not less than 700,000, and the loss of individual owners ran up the total to more than a million.

The Public Library was the eighth largest institution of its kind in the United States. Librarian George W. Clark said: "In the main library in the eastern wing of the City Hall we had 130,000 books. This was a total loss. When our branch collections are brought together, we will have a good working library of reference books and also a fine collection of standard literature. We have $750,000 that Andrew Carnegie gave us. We have the square block bounded by Van Ness, Hayes, Franklin and Fell streets, which was bought with bond-issue money, and we have $1,000,000 of bond money available for a new library building."

The Sutro Library of 200,000 volumes, collected by the late Adolph Sutro, was destroyed. It contained some of the rarest books in the United States. The library of the Society of Pioneers is gone. One of its priceless features was the typewritten reminiscences of pioneers, bound in twelve volumes. The Bohemian Club lost its library, many of them autographic copies from noted authors. The French Library is no more. The B'nai B'rith Library contributed 10,000 volumes to the pyre. The flames took the costly library in the Crocker mansion. Nothing remains of the 35,000 volumes of the San Francisco Law Library. The Supreme Court lost its library of 10,000 volumes.

Of all the big libraries in San Francisco, one alone is intact. The Bancroft Library, containing an immense collection of historical works, was stored at Twenty-sixth and Valencia streets and is undamaged. This collection was purchased some time ago by the University of California and doubtless will be taken to Berkeley as soon as possible.

There will be scores of thousands of books purchased in San Francisco in the immediate future.

TO "ARGONAUT" SUBSCRIBERS.

The fire did not interrupt the publication of the "Argonaut."

Every number has been posted to our mail subscribers, with the exception of those in the burnt district of San Francisco. These latter are requested to send their NEW ADDRESSES to the Argonaut Mailing Clerk, 25 Brown Avenue, San Jose.

The death was announced in County Tyrone, Ireland, April 23, of George Fletcher, the oldest British subject, so far as known. He was one hundred and eighteen years old. King Edward recently presented Fletcher with a gold snuff-box.

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Clay M. Greene and Frank L. Unger are cruising in the Mediterranean on the yacht "Atlantic."

Twenty-one San Franciscans arrived in New York, April 29, from Europe on the "St. Louis." Most of them received telegrams at the pier and some had received wireless messages off the banks. Only a few of the number had escaped losses. Mrs. E. Baird, who returned with her granddaughter, Miss Baldwin, was said to be the heaviest loser. Her losses are almost a million. A. H. Bullock returned with his daughters. A letter awaited him, telling of his big loss. Joseph D. Grant, of the dry-goods firm of Murphy, Grant & Co., and Mrs. Grant were on the ship. George H. Lent, a San Francisco real estate agent, was rushing back to the Coast with his wife. George A. Newhall, former Police Commissioner, came with Mrs. Newhall. Other San Franciscans who came on the "St. Louis" were A. T. Regan, F. A. Robbins and Mrs. Robbins, Mr. and Mrs. R. Stoneberger, W. C. Lowery, Miss A. Lowery, George Campbell, C. H. Stoddard and A. C. Stoddard.

The University Club has a mail address at 724 Golden Gate Avenue. Temporary quarters are not yet secured.

Albert Pissis was lying in the Palace Hotel, very ill, when the earthquake came. Before the fire he was removed to safer quarters and finally taken to Oakland. He is now said to be improving.

The board of directors of the Olympic Club is discussing the proposition of securing the Hobart mansion, on Van Ness Avenue, as a temporary home for the club. The house has been tendered to the club, at a stated rental, by President McCutchen of the Hobart estate.

Concerning the rumored arrival of one of the Sharon heirs, who once was Flora Sharon, a special to the "World" from London says: "One of the heavy losers through the San Francisco calamity is Lady Hesketh, wife of Sir Thomas Hesketh, of Easton Neston Park. She is a daughter of the late Senator Sharon. So serious is the shrinkage of her wealth that Sir Thomas has offered Easton Neston to be let for a term of years, and the family will be obliged to move into a smaller house. Lady Hesketh will set out soon for San Francisco. She was made seriously ill by the news."

The steamer "Breakwater" has gone to San Diego with John D. Spreckels, who is convalescing from a long and severe illness. Accompanying him are Mrs. Spreckels and Claus Spreckels Jr., Mrs. Harry Holbrook, Mrs. Alexander Hamilton and Mrs. Sands W. Forman. Their sojourn at the Hotel del Coronado will be indefinite. Mr. Spreckels will offer the use of the "Breakwater" to San Diego or any other Southern California city desiring to send supplies to this city.

Information regarding the whereabouts of Ward McAllister, oldest son of the late Ward McAllister, who was credited with creating New York's four hundred, is eagerly sought by his guardian, Hall McAllister, of 2436 Jackson Street. A year ago McAllister suffered from an attack of paralysis which left him speechless. For some time he was a patient at a local hospital, and when the flames threatened that institution most of the patients were moved by boat to Mare Island. At Mare Island and Vallejo sanitariums, no one answering McAllister's description was on the registers. Ward McAllister has been a member of the Pacific-Union Club for years, where he lived up to the time of his affliction, and was one of the attorneys for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. His mother, Mrs. Ward McAllister, and his sister Louise and brother Heyward, live in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Crocker were last week registered at the St. Regis, New York. Their California Street mansion was destroyed by fire. Not a single one of the magnificent residences on Nob Hill escaped destruction, and shapeless heaps of masonry, iron and ashes now mark the sites of the city's most famous mansions. Only the walls of the Flood mansion still stand. The destruction of the others, including the Hopkins, Huntington, Stanford, Crocker and Spreckels places was complete. Many valuable paintings were destroyed, probably including Millet's "Man with the Hoe," which was still in the Crocker mansion at last accounts.

The flames that circled Russian Hill came within a half block of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson's house on the top of the hill, at Hyde and Lombard streets. That it is still standing to-day is due to the efforts of a score of members of the Bohemian Club. The bohemians hold the memory of Stevenson in reverence. When the word was passed around that the residence of his widow was in danger, a relief corps was hastily got together. The party secured blankets and gunnysacks, and, climbing to the roof, fought away the flying embers.

The directors of the Bohemian Club are meeting frequently at the residence of President F. W. Hall, 1405 Grove street, Oakland, to discuss plans for the club's future. It is expected that the directors will decide to build at once a clubhouse on the ground at Post and Taylor streets, which they acquired eighteen months ago at a cost of $125,000. The club has a building fund accumulated through a system of monthly assessments. The present quarters are at 2171 Pacific Avenue. The losses of the club are far in excess of the insurance carried, which was only $80,000. The heaviest loss is that of the library. Most of the paintings and all the club records were saved.

The Cosmos Club, Sutter and Octavia streets, was undamaged and is keeping open house for members of all other city clubs.

H. T. Oxnard is a guest at the Holland, New York.

C. A. Spreckels, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus N. Eddy, Miss Eddy, Mrs. Marshall Field and Mrs. Marshall Field Jr. sailed from New York last week to attend the wedding in Paris of Miss Lurline Spreckels to Spencer Eddy.

Well-known people departing recently for Europe were Mrs. Leslie M. Shaw, Miss Cassidy and Miss Pansy Perkins, daughter of Senator Perkins. The last three named will make a tour of the Continent together, and return home next fall.

San Francisco passengers on outgoing liners from New York last week were: Mrs. A. Schwerin, Mr. and Mrs. Julius Fierbach, Miss Emma Fierbach and Dr. and Mrs. McLennon.

Prince Poniatowski was registered at the St. Regis, New York, last week.

Mr. and Mrs. D. T. Murphy were recent arrivals at the Holland, New York.

San Franciscans who reached New York within the last week were: Mr. and Mrs. G. Marcus, who are guests at the Wellington; Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Hillis, at the Imperial; Mr. and Mrs. A. Schafer, at the Wellington; Mr. and Mrs. B. Arnold, at the Bartholdi; Mrs. M. J. Maloney and Miss McNamara, at the Grand Union; Mrs. W. M. Newhall, who is at the Walcott; Mrs. M. M. Taylor, at the Navarre; Miss Lockhart, at the Earlington; Miss Leonard, at the Algonquin; Mrs. Schmidell, at the Albemarle, and Mrs. Lynruckles, at the St. Denis.

Cable advices say the following San Francisco tourists have arrived in Paris: Frederick Wilson, R. H. Auerbach, Mrs. L. Bradley, Mrs. Louis P. Monteagle, Paige Monteagle, Mrs. R. Peixotto, Mrs. Eustace M. Peixotto, Miss Peixotto and Mr. and Mrs. R. Roth.

Mr. Newton B. Knox has taken up his residence permanently in London, where he is residing at 26, Hanover Square.

Harry Veuve, the well-known San Francisco clubman, died in San Francisco April 30. He had been afflicted with locomotor ataxia for years, and the excitement of the earthquake and fire, followed by the ordeal of hurried removal to a place of safety, hastened his death.

Rev. John Hemphill, D.D., of Calvary Presbyterian Church, led to the altar, on May 1, Mary B. Taylor, a faithful worker of his flock. The ceremony, which was performed in Dr. Hemphill's own church, was private, only a few personal friends of the couple being present. The honeymoon will be spent in the doctor's residence, 2502 Fillmore Street, until more auspicious times.

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the California novelist, is engaged in writing an account of the earthquake and fire for one of the Eastern magazines. Much of her personal property, including 40,000 words of a new novel in manuscript, which was stored in the basement of the Occidental Hotel, in San Francisco, was destroyed by fire. Speaking of her impressions, she said: "I have never known anything more interesting than the psychological result of this earthquake. Not only has it brought out the best in everybody, but it has almost recreated everybody who was meandering along in a rut and given them an intense and adventurous interest in life. It has created a new, capable and experienced set of pioneers. With the intense energy and optimism that everybody is showing, and the opportuneness of the fire, regarding the widespread interest in the Burnham plans. I think there is no doubt that before five years are past we will be one of the most beautiful cities in the world."

Charles Warren Stoddard, the well-known author is at Congress Springs. Two of Mr. Stoddard's books, "For the Pleasure of His Company" and "In the Footprints of the Padres," have gone up in smoke in San Francisco. So also has the manuscript of an unpublished volume of sketches.

Richard Burke, who married Miss Donohue, of the Peter Donohue family, will come to San Francisco to supervise the reconstruction of his property.

She laughed upon her hills out there
Beside her bays of misty blue;
The gayest hearts, the sweetest air
That any City ever knew.

For I have whistled all the songs
That thrilled upon her care-free breath,
And I have mingled with her throngs—
But never in the thought of Death.

Lady of Ventures, Joy of Earth,
How more the pity for your moans
With all the blossoms of your mirth
Crushed, like your Youth, beneath the stones!

Lord Rathmore has told a friend how he once took "Ouida" in to dinner and how disappointed he was to find that the novelist devoted herself to the dishes rather than to intellectual refreshment. He said at last, in despair at having only been able to get "Yes" and "No" in answer to the different subjects he introduced: "I'm afraid I'm singularly unfortunate in my choice of topics. Is there anything we could talk about to interest you?" To which the chronicler of society's shortcomings replied: "There is one thing which would interest me very much. Tell me about the duchesses; I have written about them all my life and never met one yet."

VANITY FAIR.

A curious phase of the recent disaster in San Francisco was that it caused an increase in marriages, an increase in births and a diminution in deaths. Excluding the victims by accident, the normal death rate fell off. Weddings in great number resulted from the recent disaster. Women driven out of their homes and left destitute consented to marry at once the men to whom they were engaged, and immediately marriages were effected. A Maiden Lane jewelry manufacturer (in New York) received a rush order from San Francisco for 160 wedding rings. From the first day of the disaster, an increase in the number of marriage licenses issued was noticed by the San Francisco County Clerk. This increase grew greater and greater. One morning seven marriage licenses were issued in an hour. "I don't live anywhere," was the answer given in many cases when the applicant for a license was asked where his residence was. "I used to live in San Francisco." In San Jose also there was a boom in marriages. Engagements which had been lingering long and "understandings" seemed to be suddenly brought to a head by the earthquake shock. All day blushing young couples spent hours after the earthquake climbing around the debris in front of the City Hall and the Court House trying to find where they could obtain marriage licenses. They were somewhat handicapped in their endeavors, as they were generally unwilling to tell anybody what they wanted. The Santa Clara County Clerk had installed his office on the verandah of a residence on St. James and First streets, whither the procession of would-be spouses took up their line of march.

Is it a fixed law that a woman shall take her husband's last name at marriage, or is it just a custom? It is, according to an authority on the law of husband and wife, "a mere question of choice." As the husband is the head of the family, it is generally the custom for the wife and children to adopt his family name. But either parent may take the other's name, or they may join their names together. The great inconvenience of a failure to adopt a common family name at the time of marriage practically prohibits any disagreement on the subject.

Calico, cambric, dimity, silk, damask, satin, brocade, cotton take their names from the places where they are made. Damask goods originally came from Damascus; dimity from Damiatta, Egypt; cambric was first made in Cambray, France; calico in Calicut on the Malabar coast. Cotton is derived from the Arabic word, goton; silk from the Latin word, sericus (soft), and satin from the Italian word, seta (having a fine lustre). Brocade comes from the word broccare (to stitch, to figure).

The old custom of throwing a shoe after the bride came from the ancient custom of plucking off a shoe and giving it as a proof of the transfer of any piece of property, or throwing it on a piece of land as a symbol of new ownership. The eighth verse of the sixtieth Psalm, for instance, refers to the custom. So the practice of throwing an old shoe after the bride came into general use in old days as a sign that her parents had resigned their authority over her. A later Anglo-Saxon custom was for the bride's father to hand her shoe to the bridegroom, who touched her head with it to show that she now belonged to him.

Panama hats are expensive because of the closeness and difficulty of the work; first, because perfect hats are hard to obtain, and then because it takes so long to make them. Owing to the fact that every fiber must be kept thoroughly moist to be pliable, the work can be carried on only between the hours of midnight and seven in the morning, when the air is humid. The Indian weaver first takes the straw, selecting it fibre by fibre. Then, with his little finger or his thumb, he slices it into smaller fibres, running down the whole length of the grass until he has a bundle of threads each four or five feet long. This accomplished, he braids sixteen or twenty fibres together, interlacing them at their middle. After that, all he has to do is to braid, to keep on braiding, braiding, from midnight to morn, adding another fibre at every turn until the task is finished.

STORYETTES.

The Archbishop of Dublin recently performed a marriage in the family of a wealthy Irish distiller. After the breakfast the distiller thanked the archbishop effusively for his share of the proceedings, and said to him as he took leave, "The Lord be with you." "And with thy spirit," is reported to have been the rejoinder.

Few men have ever been so ready and witty as Mark Twain in introducing others to public audiences. At Hartford, December 12, 1877, he presented Mr. Howells, and after a word or two as to his literary work, said: "But I am not here to speak of his literary reputation, but simply to (a long pause) back up his moral character."

Ex-Senator Evarts was discussing dyspepsia and indigestion and that sore of thing one day with a lady, who remarked that she supposed the greater part of the trouble men had with their stomachs was due to the different wines they drank. "It was the indifferent wines that gave me the most trouble," retorted the venerable statesman.

On one occasion, the Dean of Wells, in introducing E. A. Freeman, whom he could abide neither as man nor historian, said: "I rise with great pleasure to propose the health of our eminent neighbor, Mr. Freeman, the historian, a man who—in his own personal characteristics—has so often depicted for us the savage character of our first forefathers."

"I had occasion not long ago," said "Private" John Allen, in conversation with "Uncle Joe" Cannon, "to visit a certain hospital where an old friend of mine was convalescing. He was being fed on a daily diet of egg and sherry. When I asked him how he liked it, he replied: 'John, it would be all right if the egg was as new as the sherry and the sherry as old as the egg.'"

"A London newsboy, who is accustomed to shout 'Extras' every evening, recently had a very bad cold and became hoarse. Feeling himself at a disadvantage, he carried a large card in front of him, on which he had roughly written: 'Hush! Noise is a nuisance! I can't shout my extras, but I have them all the same!' It did not take the boy long to sell out his stock of papers to the grateful passersby.

The late Charles Keene, the artist of "Punch," used to describe, with a great delight, the method of a certain man whom he called "a pot-house Ruskin." This person was sitting with a friend in an inn parlor, and was haranguing the other man on matters in general. Finally the friend ventured mildly to interpose an objection. The speaker drew himself up with much dignity. "I ain't a-arguing with you," said he; "I'm a-telling you!"

When Wong Kai Kah was temporarily a sojourner here—alas, that this Oriental gentleman who endeared himself to all who met him is no more!—one of his new-made acquaintances asked him as to the antiquity of his family. "Oh," he said, with naive modesty and yet with a merry twinkle in his eye, "my family is new in China; indeed, we have nothing to boast of as to long establishment in that country, for we have been there only 2,500 years, having come from a place to the south and east of the Caspian Sea."

A man and his wife were at a San Francisco hotel, when they were aroused from their slumbers by the recent earthquake. "Now, my dear," said the husband, "I will put into practice what I have preached. Put on all your indispensable apparel, and keep cool." Then he slipped his watch into his vest pocket and walked with his wife out of the hotel. When all danger was past he said: "Now you see how necessary it is to keep cool." The wife for the first time glanced at her husband. "Yes, William," she said, "it is a grand thing, but if I were you I would have put on my trousers."

THE INSURANCE SITUATION.

So much anxiety is felt in California concerning the stability of foreign insurance companies, and so little that is published, is authoritative, that the following from the financial letter cabled from London to the New York "Evening Post," will be read with keen interest:

"London, April 23.—The Bank of England's supply of American gold coin is large, but withdrawal of another million sterling would mean a rise in the bank rate. This withdrawal is anticipated, but it depends largely on the fire indemnities. There is no necessity for immediate remittance by the British underwriting companies, their funds in the United States being large. But the estimate of the fire liabilities of British companies in San Francisco is £25,000,000, and the net loss is put at £10,000,000. Belief here in London is that several American companies will be put out of business, to the ultimate advantage of British companies, which have lately suffered by the severe rate-cutting of your institutions. Our offices are likely to place liberal interpretation on their protective clauses, but the effects of their necessary sale of stocks from their assets has been at least partly discounted by the shrinkage of £8,000,000 in two days in the market value of insurance shares."

Another financial cable says:

"London, April 23.—Conflicting accounts are current as to what extent individual British insurance offices will be involved, and the shares of various companies have fallen in different proportions, the London Assurance and Royal Exchange Companies having suffered most. The total loss, estimated at between fifteen and twenty million pounds, is so distributed through reinsurance that no failure will ensue. It is generally agreed that where contracts are limited by an earthquake clause this will not be pressed."

These cables give a distinctly favorable view to the insurance situation in California.

The Decrees of Heaven.

"O God! have mercy!" a mother cried, As she humbly knelt at the cradle side. "O God, have mercy, and hear my prayer, And take my babe in thy tender care; For the Angel of Death is in the room! And is calling aloud for my babe to come. Thou, then, alone hast the power to save Oh! God have mercy, 'tis all I crave."

"O Father in Heaven, protect my boy From the wiles of folly—from sin's decoy; From the snares of temptation in life's dark sea; Guard him and keep him pure for thee. So a mother prayed as her darling son Went forth to battle the world alone; Alone, save the blessing his mother gave. And that prayer to God to keep and save

A father and mother knelt them down Together before the Eternal One. And with trusting hearts implored that Heaven Would guard the flower its grace had given— Would keep their blossoming daughter pure, And shield her, aye, from the temptor's lure, And from every stain would keep her free As the lilies that bloom in eternity.

A beautiful maiden knelt to pray For the life of a loved one far away— Away in the fields where life and death

Hang poised in the scale that tips with a breath.

"Oh, Father of Mercies, protect the heart

Of him I love from the foeman's dart; When the death-bolts rain on the charging field, Be Thou his guide, his strength, his shield."

The night was dark on the ocean's breast,

And the waves ran high in wild unrest, When a stately barque was dashing on Toward a breaker's crest with her rudder gone.

Around the captain in wild despair, The crew had gathered and joined in prayer

To Him who only had the power to save,

To deliver them from a watery grave.

'Twas midnight in the city's heart,

And slumber reigned o'er home and mart,

When the fire fiend burst from his secret place

And wrapped all things in his fierce embrace.

Oh! then how many a friendly prayer To Heaven for safety rent the air—

For homes, for lives, for loves, and then

The flames that crisped them sneered at amen!

From the earliest dawn of nature's birth

Since sorrow and crime first darkened the earth,

From clime to clime, from pole to pole, Wheresoever the waves of humanity roll,

The breezy robe this planet wears

Has quivered and echoed with countless prayers;

Each hour a million knees are bent, A million prayers to heaven are sent.

There's not a summer beam but sees Some humble suppliant on his knees;

There's not a breeze that murmurs by But wafts some faithful prayer on high

There's not a woe that afflicts our race, But some one bears to the throne of grace;

And for every temptation we may meet We plead for grace at the mercy seat.

But the beams smile on, and Heaven serene

Still broods as though no prayers had been,

And the breezes moan as the branches wave.

"When man is powerless Heaven can not save."

The Universe a Paradise.

Out through the sweep of the uttermost spheres—

If I were God!

Down the dim span of the ultimate years—

If I were God!

The luminous lilies forever should shine

The passionate roses flame red on the vine,

The golden grapes drip with a delicate wine,

If I were God!

Never a coffin or cold winding-sheet,

If I were God!

Nor blue myrtles blooming at headstone and feet,

If I were God!

No sad, stricken souls bending down by their dead

To kiss the pale corpse whence the spirit hath fled,

While the torn bosom bleeds and the hot tears are shed,

If I were God!

The fires of friendship should faithfully burn,

If I were God!

Heart unto heart should unchangingly turn,

If I were God!

Never should longings be vile or vain, Never be pestilence, famine, or chain,

Never be poverty, farewell, or pain,

If I were God!

Never a mortal should come unto harm,

If I were God!

Never a gallows should lift its red arm,

If I were God!

Sin should slink far out of sound and of sight,

The wrong that is rapturous always be right,

Nor fagot and steel be the symbols of might,

If I were God!

—W. Hubbard-Kernan.

The Easy Position.

"What I want," said the constituent, "is a nice, easy position."

"My friend," answered Senator Sorghum, "give up that idea. When an easy position is discovered, so many people are after it that man has to fight ten hours a day to get and twelve hours a day to hold on to it."—Washington Star.

CURRENT VERSE.

Soldier, Rest!

[The specifications for fitting up the Seventy-first New York Regiment's armory included 31 davenport, couches, and divans upholstered in leather, 354 arm-chairs of special design, and 4,643 other chairs.]

Soldier, rest!—In mission chair Or on couch of Spanish leather, Dream not of the trumpet's blare Sounding in all sorts of weather. In this sybaritic hall

Not with ball and powder dally, But with pool or bowling ball

Hit the pocket or the alley.

Soldier, rest! No war alarms, Put away your bristling arms.

In the drill-room cases show 'em, Take a chair—we've plenty of 'em.

No rude sound shall reach our ear, Nary noisy foe besiege us.

Soldier, rest!—the trappings here Beat the Waldorf or St. Regis.

Couches, couches everywhere For your slumberland transportment

Or, if you prefer a chair, We've a large and fine assortment.

Soldier, rest! The bugle's dumb.

Soldier, rest! Unstrung the drum.

Soldier, rest! No storm is brewing.

Soldier, rest! There's nothing doing.

Evening.

The quiet streams their lullabies are calling;

All through the apple boughs their voices creep,

While from each petal in the orchard falling,

Down droppeth sleep.

From Munich to Verona.

Black mountains pricked with pointed pine

A melancholy sky.

Outdistanced was the German vine, The sterile fields lay high.

From swartzy Alps I traveled forth Aloft; it was the North, the North;

Bound for the Noon was I.

I seemed to breast the streams that day;

I met, opposed, withstood

The northward rivers on their way, My heart against the flood—

My heart that pressed to rise and reach,

And felt the love of altering speech, Of frontiers, in its blood.

But oh, the unfolding South! the burst Of summer! Oh, to see

Of all the Southward brooks the first! The traveling heart went free

With endless streams; that strife was stopped;

And down a thousand vales I dropped, I flowed to Italy.

—Alice Meynell in the Outlook (London).

Beauty.

Foredoomed am I to serve her. Where she glows,

There is my heaven. These famished lips are vain

To kiss her naked feet, altho in vain The Nymph elusive comes, elusive goes;

I reach to fold her to my heart,—she flows

Wave-like away, and with a sweet diadain

Beckons me on to where I see remain, Rising resilient from her step, the rose:

So, panting after Beauty all my days, I trace her footings o'er the wind-swayed wheat,

Drawn by her blown hair fluttering in the glades,

Or white arms luring down Italian ways:

I am her thrall, and she, a splendid cheat,

Fadeth forever, tho she never fades.

—Lloyd Mifflin in Everybody's Magazine.

Renewal.

On the highways of the world I hear them tramping,

Anglo-Saxon, Teuton, Malay, Celt, and Black.

All the horses of the earth their bits are champing,

Blithe and eager for the load upon the back.

In the offing all the sails are roughly breasting,

With a longing for the freedom of the gale,

While the silent words of Nature are unsheathing,

Soon to battle with the resister of the flail.

Love and laughter fill the orchards and the gardens,
Flowers are blooming, bees are humming, birds are gay;
All the good and mighty tides of life are rising—
Hasten! hasten to the highroad—and away!

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

When Father Rode the Goat.

The house is full of arnica
And mystery profound;
We do not dare to run about
Or make the slightest sound;
We leave the 'big piano shut
And do not strike a note;
The doctor's been here seven times
Since father rode the goat.

He joined the lodge a week ago—
Got in at 4 a. m.,
And sixteen brethren brought him home,
Though he says he brought them.
His wrist was sprained, and one big rip
Had rent his Sunday coat—
There must have been a lively time
When father rode the goat.

He's resting on the couch today
And practicing his signs—
The hailing signal, working grip,
And other monkeyshines;
He mutters passwords 'neath his breath,
And other things he'll quote—
They surely had an evening's work
When father rode the goat.

The Former Tenderloin.

Where is the gang of yesterday?
The Redlight's ruddy glare
Shines not on lips incarnadine
Nor on peroxide hair.
The man who dallied with delights
Along the cocktail route
Is lurching in the bread line and
The gang is camping out.
The amber glass, the giddy whirl,
Were shattered by the shock,
The Tenderloin is bounded now
By ashes on the block.

The Circus Season.

Now the merry circus season spread-

Mark the flaming posters looming up on every hand;
Maiden with the six-foot tresses;
Trapeze-girls in scanty dresses;
Beasts from unknown wilderness-

Girl who lion fierce caresses;
Birds that no known land possesses;
Calliope that nerves distresses;
Clown who ancient jokes express-
es;
Farmer who at shell-game guesses;
Procession that with pomp progresses;
All of which our wealth assesses;
See the people throng the sidewalks
when they hear the band.

Note the fearless bareback-riders dashing 'round the ring;
See the ancient damsel from a lofty

See red lemonade a-flowing;
Mark the last year's peanuts going;

Scent the jungle zephyrs blowing;
Hear the sacred white bull lowing;
See the strong man make a show-

STAGE GOSSIP.

The biggest benefit programme ever given in Los Angeles has been prepared at the Mason Opera house. All the proceeds are to go toward the San Francisco relief. The first number will go on at 12 o'clock, noon, and it is expected that the show will continue until evening.

The Theatrical Managers' Association have each decided to act independently and resume operations at the earliest possible moment. The Orpheum management, as soon as the debris is cleared from its old site intends erecting a twelve-story building.
Within a month, the regular Orpheum bills will be presented at the Chutes Theater, which escaped injury. Belasco and Mayer, owners of the old Al-cazar and Alhambra theaters, expect to be back in the amusement field within at least three months. Their houses in Portland and Los Angeles have stage paraphernalia which could easily be brought here as soon as they get some sort of a house.

W. H. Leahy, of the Tivoli Opera-house, is accorded with saying that a new house will be constructed at the Eddy and Mason street site at an early date. No definite knowledge is obtainable regarding the reconstruction of the Columbia Theater. Doubt has been expressed regarding the rebuilding of the old Grand Opera-house on Mission street. This site is likely to be turned over for wholesale purposes. Harry Bishop expects to have the Ede people rebuild the Majestic.
The Macdonoughs have decided to rebuild the California Hotel, but not the theater.

Richard Mansfield announces that he proposes to give a great benefit at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, to rebuild and re-establish the Bohe-mian Club of San Francisco, at which all the literary men and artists of the world have been guests. Mr. Mansfield will ask the co-operation of all newspapers and all artists and writers of the United States.

Immediately after the San Francisco disaster Sarah Bernhardt gave a monster benefit performance in Chicago for the sufferers. The artist now announces her determination to bring her company here despite the fact that the city upon which she depended for her greatest support in the West is in ruins. She will appear May 15, at the Liberty Theater, Oakland, in "Camille," and will give a matinee performance of "Phedra" at the Greek Theater, Berkeley, May 16. Her appearance in the college play, "Phreda," at the Greek Theater will be one of the most remarkable events of dramatic history of this country. No more wonderful setting for such a drama could be found than the open air theater at Berkeley. Madame Bernhardt announces through her management that ten per cent of the proceeds of the performances in Oakland and Berkeley will be donated to the relief of San Francisco sufferers.

The Insurance Situation.

Clouds of rumors have tended to mystify policy holders as to the intentions of the insurance companies. Letters to the agents have resulted in no replies but bare acknowledgements. Evidently the companies do not care to put themselves on record in any manner. Generally speaking, the situation now would seem to be that the European companies will adhere strictly to the letter of their policies, and will make a desperate fight on technicalities. Some of the American companies will adopt a more liberal policy, but only such as is forced upon them. The English companies met in London on May 3rd and cabled the following to California:

"The British offices will only pay the losses for which they are legally liable, since to go beyond their contracts would be illegal. They cannot recognize any liability for damage by earthquake where no fire ensued, nor damage by fire to fallen or partly fallen buildings, which were pulled down or destroyed by order of the authorities of San Francisco."

The European companies will claim immunity where walls have fallen by earthquake shock and there is no fire damage. They will claim immunity where walls have fallen by earthquake shock and subsequently been damaged by fire. They will claim immunity where walls have fallen by reason of the acts of the authorities in blowing up or otherwise removing ruins. In short, they will only pay losses when the buildings where the damage occurred were practically left intact after the earthquake shock.

The Underwriters in New York have been endeavoring to effect a compromise by which both the European and American companies will settle all claims on a scaled down basis. Instead of contesting claims on the ground that many buildings were damaged by the earthquake before they took fire, these Underwriters hold that it would be better to settle all claims at 60 per cent. They say to the policy holders: "It would be better that you should accept 60 per cent and get your money in thirty days, rather than wait a year or two for the slow processes of the courts."

That proposition is all very well for a man whose loss is either entirely from earthquake or by earthquake and fire, but the vast majority of policy holders who lost in the San Francisco fire met their losses by the action of fire alone, for nearly all the buildings in the city were standing hours after the earthquake. We do not think that this proposed "compromise" would be either just or equitable.

If the fire insurance companies stand to lose heavily by reason of this great conflagration, they have made money enough out of California in the past to recoup them for their losses. There is no district in the country which has paid such enormous premiums to the insurance companies as has California. Furthermore, it is in the power of the insurance companies to increase their charges to such an extent as to indemnify them in a few years. The New York

Fire Underwriters are already holding secret sessions with a view to making a horizontal advance of 25 per cent or over on all fire risks throughout the country. If they do this they will speedily get back the one hundred and fifty millions which they must pay to San Francisco.

Later Insurance Notes.

At the time these lines are written the insurance situation is still in an uncertain and unsatisfactory condition. The Mayor and the Citizens' Committee have several times requested the Underwriters to meet and inform them what the attitude of the companies would be. But the Underwriters have abstained as yet from attending any such conference. To notifications or letters addressed to them by policy holders, they make either vague replies or no replies at all. They are evidently extremely fearful of committing themselves.

Some of the companies that were looked upon with the most apprehension seem to be the ones most to be relied on in the present crisis. Much doubt was expressed as to the ability of certain California companies to meet their liabilities, but they are advertising that they are prepared to meet all legal claims as soon as they are adjusted. There is, of course, considerable latitude in the term "legal claim." The English companies—which institutions it was feared might evade payment and abandon California as an insurance field—have announced their intention of paying their losses, and are already shipping coin to meet the emergency. They will, however, stand strictly on the lines of their legal liability. They will pay no damages caused by earthquake, and will shield themselves in many fire losses behind earthquake damages. There will doubtless be many legal contests with them before policy holders can obtain even measurable satisfaction.

The American companies will probably adopt a more liberal policy than those of the English companies, but even they are evidently determined to fight every doubtful fire claim. They will repudiate some of the promises made by their local agents. Some emissaries are sowing seeds of doubt in the minds of the smaller policy holders, evidently with the desire to instigate them to compromise. We do not say that these emissaries come from the insurance companies, but it is difficult to see from what other quarter they could come.

One of the companies that was least expected to be weak, the Traders of Chicago, has gone into liquidation. This company's assets about balance its losses and some of the stock holders wished to levy an assessment of $200 a share to meet the emergency like men, to wipe the losses off their books and go to work again. Had they done so, they would have speedily put their company on its feet again, and coined money in the enormously increased business and the enormously increased rates bound to follow in the wake of this great conflagration. But some of the stockholders adopted a more cowardly plan and forced the company into liquidation. This will mean that the policy holders will not get their just dues, and what they get, if they get anything, will be much scaled down from the face of their claims by the expenses of liquidation. In a few days the names of the stockholders, who have forced the Traders into liquidation, will, we hope, be known. If they are known, we trust that the newspapers of California will thoroughly advertise the Traders and those of the Traders' stockholders who have played fast and loose with business honor in this great crisis.

The President's Refusal of Relief Funds.

The refusal of President Roosevelt to accept relief funds from foreign nations for the stricken people of San Francisco has been received with mingled feelings both at home and abroad. Some of the German newspapers have not hesitated to say that they receive it with resentment. They declare that President Roosevelt may advocate his ideas of the Monroe Doctrine as much as he pleases in the field of the intercontinental balance of power, but that when it comes to benevolence and philanthropy the Monroe Doctrine does not apply. Mr. Roosevelt may have been actuated by well-meaning motives in his refusal. Some of the dwellers in the communities east of the Rocky Mountains will say that he was right. They will agree with him in thinking that the United States should take care of her own, and that for so powerful and wealthy a nation to accept relief at the hands of foreigners for a stricken sister would be unbecoming.

But the stricken sister State does not believe so. Many cities of the Pacific Coast are crushed, and San Francisco is prostrate in her own ashes. Our people are so sorely stricken that they are disposed to welcome aid from whatever quarter it may come. They are all the more inclined toward this course when they reflect that for many years California has been the first in all the sisterhood of States to respond to appeals for relief from every quarter. The very night before the earthquake shook the mountains and valleys of the Coast Range, San Francisco was busily engaged in gathering and transmitting large sums for the unfortunates afflicted by the Vesuvius eruption. Therefore it is that the stricken in California cities do not sympathize with the somewhat theatrical attitude of the President when he loftily waves back the charitable hands extended to help them.

It is probable that the President desired to impress the nations of the world with our prosperity and our power in peace as well as in war. It is our boast that we need no alliances; that we are so great, so prosperous, so populous, no nation could subdue us in defensive war, no nation could repel us in offensive war. Correspondingly the President would have the world believe that in times of great calamity like this which has afflicted the Pacific Coast the nation can take care of its own; that we are so great, so rich, so charitable, we can purvey to the needs of our own stricken kindred.

It goes without saying that the people of our afflicted State do not agree with the President. There are some in other states who also disagree with him. A committee of Californians has been engaged in collecting funds in New York City, to transmit to California, of which committee Gaylord Wilshire is the Chairman. Mr. Wilshire learned that the President had refused to receive and transmit to California the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars which the Hamburg-American Steamship line had donated for the sufferers. He thereupon addressed a letter to the New York newspapers in which he said that the people of California were better able to judge of their needs than President Roosevelt; that the Hamburg-American steamship line had received many millions of dollars for many years from the American travellers; that if this foreign steamship line desired to help an American community which was in sore need, and if that American community expressed no objection, he saw no reason why President Roosevelt should; and he closed by informing the Hamburg-American Steamship line that if they still desired, notwithstanding President Roosevelt's rebuff, to devote twenty-five thousand dollars or any other sum to the sufferers of the Pacific Coast, the California Committee stood ready to accept and transmit it with their earnest thanks.

A relief association of California women also disagree with the President, and have drawn up and published a set of resolutions in the daily press in which they state that the needs of the sufferers in this State are so great that the amount subscribed, large as it may seem, is utterly inadequate to cope with the suffering already experienced and which suffering is not decreasing. They would seem to be supported in this view by the military authorities in San Francisco, who are finding the demand for food so great that they now confine their free rations to women and children, ordering the male refugees to go to work. It is of course true that able bodied men should work for their food, but the helpless city of San Francisco is crowded with professional men, clerks, book-keepers, stenographers and others who are utterly unfitted for hard bodily labor, and that is the principal kind of work at present to be had in San Francisco. If these men cannot obtain work which they are able to do, without free rations, they will starve. The only kind of work obtainable is a kind of work they cannot do, and the military authorities refuse longer to furnish them with free rations. Hence the only logical outcome is that they will have to starve. Furthermore at this writing the military authorities have food enough on hand for only about ten days' rations.

In the meantime donations continue to be offered by foreign nations which the President continues to decline. The Empress Dowager of China has offered a personal subscription of seventy-five thousand dollars to the American Minister at Peking for the relief of the sufferers in San Francisco. The President instructed the State Department to decline the donation with an expression of appreciation. The Japanese government has also offered a donation of 100,000 yen, which has similarly been declined. The Canadian Government has offered $100,000 for the relief of the sufferers on the Pacific Coast by the earthquake and fire; declined. The Republic of Mexico voted the sum of $30,000; declined. The Republic of Guatemala offered $10,000; declined. The Government of New Zealand offered $25,000; declined. The little island of Martinique offered 10,000 francs; declined. The municipality of Edmondson, Canada, offered $1,000; declined. Many municipalities, corporations and individuals in Germany, France, Cuba and other countries have also offered aid. All of these offers have been declined.

The general comment on these cases in the West has indicated a total disagreement with the President concerning this matter—sometimes mild disagreement, but generally acrid disagreement. We are not as yet apprised of the tone of the press and the people in the East, but it would seem as if it must be changing to a certain accord with Pacific Coast sentiment, for the President has seen fit to send a special message to Congress on the subject of receiving foreign aid for California. It is somewhat apologetic in tone. He says concerning these offers of aid: "Where they were tendered to me in my official capacity I did not feel warranted in accepting them." The President adds, however, in an explanatory way: "Where these offerings are made to the private relief committees organized to deal with the distress in San Francisco, I have of course no official action to take concerning them." This is quite obvious. If Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman should offer to the Mayor of San Francisco one hundred thousand pounds, naturally Mr. Roosevelt could take no action, officially or otherwise, regarding it, as the matter would not concern him. If, however, the Government of Great Britain, of which Sir Henry is the head, should offer to give one hundred thousand pounds to the Mayor of San Francisco, Mr. Roosevelt could at once interfere. For no foreign government may have official dealings with the citizens of this Republic save through the formal intermediary of our foreign office, which is the Department of State. Therefore if President Roosevelt directs the Department of State to refuse donations offered by Great Britain or any other government, it is tantamount to forbidding that government to donate its money to California or to San Francisco in any way. No government would venture thereafter to attempt to make such a donation. The President's action practically forbids a foreign government to exercise an act of charity which would give to a stricken domestic community some kindly and well meant aid. We agree with those who think this action is unnecessary and uncalled for. The only possible motive for it that we can see is an attempt at self-glorification on the part of the United States.

Wooden Palaces for Priceless Treasures.

It has often been a matter of wonder to visiting strangers in San Francisco that our millionaires should be willing to intrust their priceless treasures to the scanty security of wooden walls. There is great wealth in San Francisco—or there was. We all believe there will be again. There are few cities in the country—perhaps in the world—where there is so large a number of millionaires in proportion to the population. In the houses of these wealthy ones may be found every imaginable kind of priceless art treasures—canvases from the modern masters of Europe; pictures in oils, in pastel, in water colors; bronzes from Barbedienne; marbles from the studios of American, French and Italian sculptors; miniatures; cameos; intaglios; tapestries; rare books, new and old; first edition Shakespeares; ancient missals; incunabulae; pots and jugs, ancient and modern; Delft, Seures, Worcester, Doulton, Satsuma, repousse brass and beaten copper; weapons of all kinds, yataghans and scimitars.

Yet these art treasures in the houses of the San Francisco millionaires are shielded only by wooden walls. To the visiting stranger it seemed as if they were an easy prey to the flames. In the Old World the meanest peasant's barn would have better fire-resisting construction, for most farm buildings there are of stone and some of them are of concrete. As for the great art galleries of the Old World, such as the Louvre in Paris, the Tate Gallery in London and the Uffizi in Florence, and the Pinacothek in Munich, they are not only built with a view to almost absolute security against fire from without, but usually there is no possible means of fire starting from within, for no heating devices are used in the day time and no lighting devices at night. In fact, they are closed before the approach of darkness and never opened at night.

Strangers have always wondered at this strange temerity of the San Francisco millionaires in risking their art treasures in houses so absolutely at the mercy of the flames. It has seemed odd, but the reason is not difficult to find. Although we in California strive to forget our earthquakes as speedily as we may, they will not be forgotten. Strive as we may to push the recollections of them back into the past with the dead yesterdays, there still clings around us the recollection of the ugly feeling which chills our hearts with the first sullen rumblings of the earth. It is this feeling which makes the present generation of matrons just a little timorous of occupying brick houses, when they remember the earth's convulsions in their childhood thirty years ago. After the great earthquake of that time, nearly every brick dwelling house in San Francisco was at once vacated; wooden houses were at a premium. The feeling since then has slowly subsided, but it has subsided very slowly. The brick or stone dwelling house is still a rarity in San Francisco, and while the municipal authorities have gradually been changing from wood to brick as a material for their school houses, the fact that the schools that still stand are almost entirely of wood will probably cause them to revert from brick to wood again.

Therefore it is that the stranger who sneered at the San Francisco millionaires for building their art palaces of fragile wood, instead of imperishable brick or stone, may have been in error and the millionaires may have builded more wisely than the stranger knew. But if a man build his house upon a rock and build it of wood so that the earth when it quivers will not tear it down, how shall he provide against the fire that destroyeth? And if he cannot preserve his art treasures from fire except he encase them in brick or stone, if he cannot save them from earthquake unless he encase them in wood, with what shall he encase them withal? Shall he build him a steel-frame house, or shall he lay aside completely the gathering together of gear that is fragile and perishable, such as paintings and tapestries, and confine himself to the laying up of a treasure in heaven where the moth doth not eat nor the rust corrupt?

What?

High Protection and Charity.

We are speedily going to have an opportunity to judge whether protectionism and a high tariff come hand in hand with brotherly love.

"And the greatest of these is charity." Or is it protection?

An attempt is now being made in Washington to bring about a reduction of duties on structural material imported into California. The business part of San Francisco has been utterly wiped out. The lesser cities in California have also suffered. That they are lesser cities does not make their suffering less, even if their people be not so many. Some of them have been even more severely visited by the earthquake shock than was San Francisco. For two hundred miles up and down the coast there are cities in California which need material to reconstruct buildings that have been wrecked and to re-erect buildings that have been burned. We need lumber. We need cement. We need all sorts of building material, and we need it badly. San Francisco alone has lost a third of a billion of dollars. It is not like losing something that has profited other people in the United States, as when we pay the high prices that go to tariff-nurtured steel mills. What we have lost has been wiped off the earth by fiery tongues of flame. Now we ask of our more fortunate brothers throughout the United States who have profited and prospered by the high tariff which has created so many multi-millionaires that it has amazed the world—we ask of them that they will for a time lower their high tariff on structural materials that we may rebuild our wrecked cities. To the north of us in British Columbia there are vast stores of lumber ready to our hands, but there is a heavy duty on it of two dollars a thousand. Britain, Belgium and Germany manufacture vast quantities of structural steel and iron, but our high tariff demands the payment of half a cent a pound. Millions of barrels of cement will be required to rebuild our shattered cities in California, but it can enter no Pacific Coast port unless a tariff tribute is paid of eight cents per hundred pounds.

What will our richer and more fortunate brothers in the older cities do at this juncture? Will they be willing to lower their high tariff? Will they be willing to permit Belgium to sell structural steel in San Francisco at the same rate for which American manufacturers sell their own steel in Europe?—that is to say, far below the rate at which it is sold in America. Will they allow lumber and cement to come in at a lower duty? Well, we rather think not. The Argonaut looks with somewhat calmer eye on the emotional workings of human nature than do our gushing daily contemporaries. We know that in the first flush of a great disaster men are moved by generosity, but in a very few days this generous instinct wears off. Before a fortnight the stream of money flowing toward California will largely dwindle. Will the protected industries who furnish structural materials then consent to let California have these vital necessities at a special low tariff rate? No, indeed—not they. They will say vaguely, "The tariff must not be interfered with;" "Let well enough alone;" "We have already given millions to California;" "When is California going to let up?"

More ingenuous journals might say that as Congress made tariff exemptions for Chicago when she was destroyed by fire in 1871, certainly Congress will do it for San Francisco, now that she has been destroyed by fire in 1906. But this we do not believe. In thirty years those who have profited by high protection have come to believe that the tribute paid to them by the whole country belongs to them as much as their watches, their houses, or their lands. They would look on an appeal on the part of the people of California to urge our own government to give us building material duty free as an attempted robbery of the East. Yet as a matter of fact it is not a robbery but a right; California is entitled to demand building materials duty free. If there be any robbery under the circumstances, it is the robbery of those who profit by the tariff on building materials, for the American Steel Trust sells steel cheaper in Europe than it does in the United States. Those apostles of high protection may experience some twinges of conscience as they wire their lobbyists in Washington to stifle this movement toward a temporary removal of tariff duties, but they speedily will overcome their infrequent conscientious scruples by saying "Well, didn't we give California millions? didn't we give her charity money? So what is she kicking about?"

A Human Ant-Hill.

Did you ever step on an ant-hill? Did you ever note the perturbation caused by your action? Did you ever observe how the long, orderly lines of ants were thrown into temporary confusion? And did you ever see also how speedily, through force of habit, they automatically fell again in orderly lines, but running in different directions and to every point of the compass?

Among the many curious things which happened after the great San Francisco fire, one of the most curious was the way in which the frightened humans took up their various lines of march. You have doubtless often seen a very small ant, struggling with a very large grain of sugar, or the seed of a flower, or some other minute vegetable organism precious to the heart of an ant. Correspondingly, the long lines of humans after the San Francisco disaster were also loaded down with every kind of impedimenta—clothing, bedding, furniture—everything in short except pianos. The most curious kind of burdens seemed to be pets—white mice, monkeys, canary birds and the like. But in what the affrighted city dwellers most resembled the disturbed ant-hill was in their fashion of taking up lines of march in different directions. With the fire burning to the east and south, one might have imagined that the general tendency would have been only toward the north and west. Not so. The long lines of human beings toiled painfully north, south, east and west. Along the broad expanse of Van Ness Avenue there poured a mighty concourse directed toward the north, where lay the Military Reservation, the Bay and safety. But an equally large procession countermarched by their side, plodding painfully toward the south, where lay desolation, conflagration and Hell fire. Both processions seemed equally confident that they were going in the right direction. On the cross streets yet other thousands marched and countermarched toward the bay and toward the ocean. Some of them marched into dangerous districts almost circled by fire. Yet they toiled on with the same dogged persistence as did their brothers and sisters bound north and south.

Of a truth, it was a striking parallel. The orderly community in the ant-hill is thrown into no greater confusion by the descent of a heedless human foot, than was the sometime orderly community of San Francisco when it was disturbed by the giant grip of some Enceladus rending the rocks below in the bowels of the earth.

Government Guaranteeing San Francisco's Bonds.

The Citizens' Financial Committee last week discussed the project of obtaining from the Federal Government a guarantee of bonds to be issued by the city of San Francisco, which would insure the borrowing of money at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent instead of 5 or 6 per cent. The suggestion met with the general approval of the committee. It remains to be seen, however, whether it will meet with the general approval of the United States. So sorely as San Francisco has been afflicted, there is no specific reason why she should have her debts guaranteed by the Federal Government any more than any other American city suffering from a calamity. For that matter a Western village of one thousand people wiped out by a cyclone would have fully as much right to ask the Government to guarantee its bonds as for San Francisco to do so. Many of those ruined by this calamity will look upon this expression of opinion as harsh and unfeeling. But it is not so. It is merely a calm statement of what will be the opinion of the people of the United States. All of us in San Francisco have lost—some of us have lost all we have; but that does not change the rules of right and wrong.

The matter was brought up in the Senate on the 2nd day of May, when Mr. Newlands, of Nevada, introduced a resolution directing the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House to consider the feasibility of the Federal Government guaranteeing bonds to aid in the rebuilding of San Francisco. Mr. Newlands discussed the resolution, and earnestly advocated its favorable consideration. A notable remark by Mr. Newlands was this:

"A country that can spend $200,000,000 in freeing Cuba, and $300,000,000 in instructing the Filipinos in self government, can afford to lend its credit to the extent of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 to help the Pacific Coast in its hour of distress."

Broadly speaking, Mr. Newlands is quite right—charity begins at home. If the Government can guarantee the bonds of the railways in the Philippines, there should be no good reason why it should not guarantee the bonds of San Francisco in California. But it will refuse. And it should also refuse to guarantee the bonds of the Philippine railways.

Mr. Newlands was not supported in this matter by his California colleagues, Senators Perkins and Flint. Both of them stated that they considered the introduction of the resolution as unwise, and both expressed their opinion that the California delegation should have been consulted before its presentation. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance. There is, however, little hope for its favorable recommendation.

The Argonaut admits that the guaranteeing of municipal bonds by the Federal Government would be unwise, and that it would set a bad precedent. Still, for the sake of our stricken city, we hope it could be done. If we in San Francisco were Filipinos now, instead of Californians, or if we were Cubans, or Porto Ricans, the Government would cheerfully spend two or three hundred millions on us. But inasmuch as we are merely Americans, we may expect from our country nothing but a governmental blessing.

It is always easy to be wise after an event. As some philosopher once remarked, "Hindsight is easier than foresight." None the less this journal has more than once remarked how odd it is that multi-millionaires should concentrate their goods in a single spot. We speak only of the very wealthy. Most of us are poor, or just able to get along, hence we have little to worry about in that regard. Most of us have so little to invest anyway that we must invest it in one spot. If we were to attempt to diffuse it, it would spread out so thin that it would make no spot. But this is not the case with the abnormally rich. Still it would seem as if a very common phase of the possession of great riches is to invest it all in a single city or in a single form of investment.

One of the most notable cases in this regard was that of the late James G. Fair. He had accumulated an enormous fortune in the mines of the Comstock lode and in the kindred industries of milling and smelting ores. When he had determined practically to abandon the Comstock he began investing his large fortune in San Francisco. Aside from a few side investments which every rich man is led into—such as the South Pacific Coast Narrow Gauge, which he soon afterward sold to the Southern Pacific—Senator Fair invested his large fortune almost entirely in San Francisco real estate. Much of it remained absolutely unproductive for many years. His large holdings on the North Beach shore of San Francisco Bay so remained for many years. Most of that land remains still unproductive. He purchased a fine block in the heart of the choicest residences of San Francisco—that which is now the site of the Fairmount Hotel—and this block also remained vacant for many years; it was years after Senator Fair died before his heirs concluded to build there. In the older part of the city, Senator Fair erected numerous costly buildings, hoping thereby to improve the character of the district and elevate the price of his holdings, in which project he succeeded only measurably, if at all.

These, however, are details. The point which we are striving to make clear is this: that Senator Fair invested nearly the whole of his large fortune, say some twenty odd millions, within the limits of a single city, at that time having a population of less than three hundred thousand inhabitants.

Oddly enough, a colleague of Senator Fair acted in an exactly similar manner—Senator William Sharon. Both represented the State of Nevada in the Senate of the United States; both were very shrewd men; both had worked their way up from poverty; both had amassed large fortunes in the most material and tangible way—by taking gold and silver by great labor out of the ground. Both of them invested all of their money in exactly the same way. Each disposed of his immense fortune entirely by purchasing real estate in a single city, and that city one of less than three hundred thousand inhabitants.

To the man of affairs it would seem the part of un wisdom to confine the investment of so large a sum of money to a single spot upon the globe. To the man of affairs it would seem wiser to allot it to several cities; or to invest part of it in railways, whose rolling stock is extended over thousands of miles and not all confined within a few city blocks; or to hazard some of it in cargoes borne by ships sailing over the oceans that encircle the continents; or if not in cargoes, to invest it in the great ships that bear them; or in anything, in short, that is property, that is income-bearing and that is not confined to a single spot.

Certain men are attracted instinctively to investments in land, but recoil at the idea of putting money into ships. They fear the perils of the deep, the typhoons, the cyclones of the sea. Yet the owner of an argosy of ships, scattered on all the seas that belt the globe from the equator to the pole, need never fear that Aeolus will loose from his bag of winds gales enough to send all of these ships at once to the bottom of the sea. Yet it is easy for a tornado on land to wipe out a single city, and it has been done more than once in the memory of man.

To continue the parallel. It is striking that the largest possession of the heirs of Senator Sharon should be a gigantic hotel in downtown San Francisco. It is odd that the principal possession of the heirs of Senator Fair should be a gigantic hotel in uptown San Francisco. Both hotels were practically destroyed by the flames. It is true the Fair heirs had transferred this property only a few days before the fire, but they received in exchange for it property which was also destroyed by fire, so the parallel still holds good. Oddly enough the property transferred to the Fair heirs was immediately contiguous to that of the Sharon heirs, and only a few rods distant from the Palace Hotel.

Here we have a curious instance of two rich men; two rich men who once were poor; two rich men who, once poor, acquired wealth by extreme far-sightedness, by great wisdom, by great tenacity of purpose and by unusual shrewdness. Yet both these shrewd rich men committed the cardinal error of investing many millions within a single city. One of them, Senator Sharon, not only put all of his fortune in the city of San Francisco, but nearly all of it in the southern half of San Francisco; nearly all of it in the eastern quarter of the southern half of San Francisco; nearly all of it in the northwestern eighth of the eastern quarter of the southern half of San Francisco; and he even put a bunch of several millions into a single gigantic hotel which now is a ruin.

Refugees Who Object to "Rubber Necking."

A curious manifestation of the peculiarities of human nature was developed in the San Francisco Refugees' Camp at Sutter's Fort, Sacramento. The capital city had installed elaborate accommodations for the comfort of the refugees in the Fort, but it became a place of resort for the more fortunate Sacramentans who had suffered no damage by the earthquake or the fire. They repaired blithely to Sutter's Fort for the purpose of scrutinizing the refugees. Oddly enough the refugees objected to this. Then the Sacramentans objected to the refugees' objections. But the visitors stared all the harder. Thereupon some of the more sensitive of the refugees made extemporaneous masks out of newspapers to hide their faces from the curious gaze. The directors of the relief camp soon found that the refugees were leaving in such numbers that they became apprehensive of some disease there. On investigation, however, they found that it was simply a pestilential outbreak of "Rubber-necking." The refugees continued to scatter, declaring that they would go elsewhere for the privacy which they could not secure at Sutter's Fort. The Superintendent thereupon attempted to exclude from the relief camp all of those who were not refugees. But the "Rubberneckers" took high ground, and with much heat informed the Superintendent that Sutter's Fort is a State institution, and that they have a perfect right under the law to go where they please on State premises. The Superintendent, Col. Guthrie, still was determined to exclude the "Rubber-neckers." But he came into collision with G. W. Vice, one of the Sutter's Fort trustees, who took sides with the visitors in thinking that they had a perfect right to visit and inspect State property. At last accounts the visitors had so thoroughly demonstrated their legal right to "Rubber-Neck" that the camp at Sutter's Fort had ceased to be populated with refugees and consisted entirely of "Rubber-Neckers."

Money, Cash, Checks, Credit.

Eight or ten days after the San Francisco disaster, there came to the Editor of the Argonaut an envelope bearing the stamp of the Portuguese Government. Foreign stamps on letters coming to the Argonaut are by no means unusual, for we have subscribers all over the world who send us money in various ways, usually by international postal order. On opening this, however, there fluttered forth a two-dollar American bill. Accompanying it was the following note:

Steamship "Canopic," at the Azores, April 13, 1906.

Dear "Argonaut": Enclosed please find two-dollar bill, in return for which kindly instruct one of your agents to send me "A Levantine Log Book." Since Christmas the Boston bookstores have always been in a state of "just sold out." Address

CAPT. I. SEALBY,

S.S. "Canopic," White Star Line, 84 State St., Boston.

We read the note and fell into a reverie. Exactly one year before to a day, on the 13th of April, 1905, we were in the little Portuguese port of Ponto Delgada in the Azores Islands. We stopped there only for a day. All of us pitied the poor Portuguese people there—partly for their poverty, partly for their severe earthquakes. There was plenty of money aboard ship—American money, English money, French money and German money—but nobody had any Portuguese money. All of us desired to purchase some knick-knacks, photographs, shells and the like, but it was only by the most Herculean labor and after overcoming insurmountable difficulties in the way of addition, subtraction, division and multiplication, that we were able to cope with the intricacies of exchange. The Portuguese money, as everybody knows, is based on a unit which is worth about the thousandth part of a cent. So if you buy a single postage stamp it costs you about ten thousand milreis. We were shocked at the price of the objects the vendors desired to sell us. When presented with a bill some of us got heart disease and some of us apoplexy. Only after long explanations in mingled Spanish, Portuguese,

French and English did we learn that a photograph offered at several thousand milreis was worth about fifteen cents. In short it was brought forcibly to our attention how extremely artificial a medium is money, how difficult it is to get, how difficult it is to keep, but also how difficult it is to exchange this interconvertible medium in foreign countries—when you have any. Probably it is even more difficult when you have not.

These were the thoughts aroused in our mind when there fluttered forth from the Azores letter the two-dollar bill. Only a twelve-month had rolled by since then, and nothing had occurred in our private lives to throw a shadow over the very modest prosperity which is our reward for long continued toil. Yet as a result of a sudden cataclysm of the earth an exigency had arisen by which we found ourselves absolutely destitute of money. True we had credit, such as it was, but while credit will do many things, it will not buy necessities when the sellers obstinately demand cash. But even if it would, it will not pay poor people—people poorer than yourselves—when these work for you and when their greater needs demand cash for their supplies because their credit is not so good as yours.

We were in a brown study. A laboring man had been carrying bricks out of the house all day; slowly he was reducing a mighty heap of bricks which an inscrutable providence had discharged upon us through the roof. The decrees of the inscrutable providence, however, were dangerous but not fatal, for the bricks barely missed us and thereby we saved our lives; we were only stunned, blinded, choked with dust and plaster, and nearly scared to death. That was all.

This laboring man certainly was well worthy of his hire, for while providence moves bricks with ease, a laboring man does so with difficulty. A check, he explained, was of no use to him, for his grocer and his butcher were hard-hearted persons who dealt only in cash. The writer was more than willing to give him cash—the only reason for refusing was because we had none. Yet at this crisis relief came. Out of the deep, out of the mid Atlantic, from the isolated islands, "at Flores in the Azores where Sir Richard Grenville lay," there came to us—broken, busted, impecunious, moneyless, destitute of cash, hung up, N. G.—possessing nothing for the nonce but that vague, fleeting illusory thing called "credit"—like the dove to the ark—there came to us a two-dollar bill from Portugal.

Blessings on the bill! It was not a bright new bill, but somewhat grimey. Yet none the less, blessings on the bill! We gave it to the laboring man who had borne forth the bricks which an inscrutable providence had hurled at our head, thoughtfully missing us. He received this grimey two dollars with much greater thankfulness than if we had given him twenty dollars in the form of a check.

There is a moral in this about money, another one about an inscrutable providence, and still another about bricks, but we do not know exactly how to apply them.

Long Leases for San Francisco Property.

In the call for an extra session of the Legislature James D. Phelan is attempting to include consideration of a bill extending the period of leases from fifty years to ninety-nine years, with a revaluation every ten years. Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento objects to this in a signed letter. He says that "Fifty years is long enough, and every effort should be made to get individuals to purchase the land on which they build." He further remarks that "such lengthy leases tend to create law suits and bequeath them to our descendants." This zeal on the part of a lawyer for posterity when posterity never did a thing for him and this benevolent lawyer's desire to prevent barratry and the stirring up of law suits, is calculated to make the devil laugh.

Mr. Phelan is wholly right and Mr. Johnson is entirely wrong. Had it not been for the long lease law in Illinois, Chicago never could have built herself up after the great fire of 1871. The capitalists of Boston and other Eastern cities would never have loaned their good money on short leases. Neither will they in California. Any capitalist anywhere will require good security and adequate interest before he will invest his capital. Mr. Johnson would if he were a capitalist.

If a measure for 99-year leases be considered in the call for a special session it ought to pass. Academic considerations, like Mr. Johnson's belief that the land owners "ought to build on the land they own," or capitalists "buy the land on which they desire to build," are interesting but not practical. If Mr. Johnson owned a lot in the burned district of San Francisco; if that lot was worth $50,000; if it had a $30,000 building on it; if it was mortgaged for $48,000; if fire wiped out the building and Mr. Johnson had no money wherewith to build, where would he get it? Nowhere—no one would erect a building on a short lease. The bank would take his land and that would be the end of Mr. Johnson's lot. Under the long-lease law, however, Boston or New York capitalists would give him a liberal rental for his ground on a ninety-nine year lease which would soothe Mr. Johnson's declining years and which would still enable the Eastern capitalists to make a fair interest. We sincerely hope that Mr. Johnson does not represent the public opinion of Central California and of its capital city.

San Francisco's Trade Rivals.

Not a little bitterness is being engendered in San Francisco by Oakland's attempt to add some of the larger city's commercial and industrial assets to its own. It does not seem to us, however, that there is any business basis for bitter feeling in this matter. The merchants and warehouse men who are out of business want to "get busy." They intend to do so. If San Francisco has the ground and the buildings, they prefer to remain there. If she has not, they will go elsewhere. It would scarcely be reasonable to expect them to remain out of business when ground and buildings can be had and business awaits them in most any old place. If it is not Oakland, it will be some other city or cities. There is plenty of ground on the bay shore south of San Francisco which is also suited for these purposes.

If Oakland offers exceptional facilities these business men may go there; or they may go to other bay cities which are hungrily waiting for crumbs. In any event, Oakland will fall heir to much of San Francisco's business. So will Sacramento; so will San Jose. Los Angeles will get all that is coming to her as an inland city, and perhaps a little more. So that the only good reason San Francisco could have for hating Oakland more bitterly than other California cities is because Oakland is the nearest to her.

The Dynamite Destroyers.

As the days pass it would seem as if the dynamite brigade is more to be feared than earthquake or fire. Days after the conflagration had ceased there were continual reports of appalling devastation by the dynamiters. As late as the first of May the dynamiters were working at the corner of Van Ness and Post street attempting to remove the solid brick and concrete walls of the Concordia Club. They succeeded in their attempt, but they blew into the air a mass of bricks that were hurled clear across the avenue. Four houses that had gone through earthquake and fire without damage were so shattered by the blast that they are untenable. Every piece of glassware and chinaware in these houses was shattered, and scarcely any plaster remained on the walls or the ceiling. The terrified occupants had fled for safety before the blasting began, but when it was over they sadly returned and began removing the remnants of their household goods. Four residences here were practically destroyed, and four were so damaged that they may have to be torn down. The dwellers in these houses were private individuals, and therefore their complaints will be received with comparative indifference, but Postmaster Fisk is a public official, and his statements concerning the damage done to the Postoffice from blasting will be received with attention in official quarters. He said in an interview last week: "The damage to the new Postoffice from the disaster amounted to $400,000, but additional damage to the amount of $75,000 was caused by the dynamite blasting. Little injury was done to the interior fixtures, but the blasting in our vicinity caused large pieces of plaster to fall, and even blew the panels out of the doors." It is of course more up to date and more spectacular to remove dangerous walls by modern explosives rather than by old-fashioned ways. Still, it seems inexpedient to tear down one ruined building at the cost of wrecking eight others in the process, and it might be well to revert to more ancient methods. We would suggest that the dynamite brigade be replaced by donkeys—donkey engines we mean—with cables attached. The result would be fully as effective and not so dangerous, if less spectacular.

San Francisco's Real Estate Investments.

Last week we remarked that the paucity of avenues of investment in this city drove the people to invest in real estate whether they would or no. The habit of years in this regard had affected them to such an extent that they had come to look on real estate as the only means of investing money. Chairman Phelan of the Finance Committee also made this fact apparent in his report to the Committee one day last week. He pointed out the fact that Secretary Taft had expended nearly all of the two and a half millions appropriated by the Federal government for the relief of San Francisco, leaving only three hundred thousand dollars at the disposal of the Committee, and he closed by showing how short were the funds of the Committee and how unfortunate it was that a widespread belief should exist that the Committee had millions in ready cash at hand. Incidentally he remarked that San Francisco occupies a unique position among the great cities of the United States in this regard—that nearly all of the people here invest almost exclusively in real estate. This is indeed a notable fact, as the Argonaut pointed out last week. In no Eastern city is this the case. In Boston, in New York, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore and in Pittsburg much of the wealth of the citizens is invested in real estate within the limits of those cities it is true, but it is also invested in many other ways. It is invested in the stocks and bonds of trunk railways gridironing the continent and running as far away as San Francisco. It is invested in coal mines, in iron mines, in copper mines, in steel and iron works, in steamship lines, in traction companies, in deep-sea vessels. In short it is invested in every form of human activity, and may be disseminated over an area of thousands of miles. Yet San Francisco's wealth is almost entirely invested in the small area on which she stands. Where her citizens have made investments in channels other than in San Francisco real estate, they have generally invested their money in the securities of local corporations like gas and water stocks, the value of which is based entirely on the value of city real estate. Hence it is that when such a catastrophe strikes a city, there is probably no community in the land where its cumulative and crushing effect would be felt with such stunning effect as in San Francisco.

They Think We Have Money Enough.

Our newspapers have been indulging in too much tall talk. They have printed so many scare-head articles about "San Francisco rising again, phoenix-like, from her ashes," or about "Making the city beautiful," or "Running magnificent boulevards," or "Remodelling the city on the Burnham plan," that the East has suddenly concluded that if we have so much money to spend on beautification, we do not need much for grub. Owing to the boasting of California newspapers, there has always existed in the East the idea that every other man out here is a millionaire. There are some millionaires here, it is true, but at present there are one-fifth of a million people in San Francisco who have nothing to eat. Let this be considered an exaggeration, we give the official figures of General Greely, which came to hand as we write. He states that yesterday there were fed in San Francisco on free rations by the officers under his command, 191,237 people, and that he has food enough for only ten days more. That is the exact condition of affairs in San Francisco. Now, if our papers would stop their boasting and booming and bombast, and let the people of the United States know the truth, that nearly 200,000 people are today staring starvation in the face in San Francisco, perhaps our Eastern kinsmen may not close their purse strings. Already the entire press in the East has begun to pay scant attention to the San Francisco disaster, and is concerning itself with other matters. There seems to be an almost universal impression that San Francisco and California have received already more than they need and more than they deserve. Here, for example, is a paragraph from a Boston paper dated May 1st:

"Now that the immediate wants of the living victims of the San Francisco disaster have been satisfied as far as food is concerned, why not spend some of the money collected in Boston here, instead of sending it away to enrich Western millionaires? We have given freely without expectation of return, but, nevertheless, business, like charity, should begin at home."

The foregoing is a fair sample of the comment one now sees in the Eastern press.

San Francisco's Chinatown.

The hysteric way in which public opinion chops around in times of great stress and strain is shown very notably in the attitude of San Francisco of late toward her local problem, Chinatown. The universal remark after the fire was "This means the end of Chinatown." And it seemed as if it were so. For years the district known as Chinatown had been an eye sore to San Francisco. It was once one of the finest parts of San Francisco, and many of the filthy dwellings occupied by the Chinese were in former times the dwellings of the city's magnates. Rod by rod and block by block, the yellow plague had made its way, driving the whites before it, until Chinatown extended from Sansome street on the east to Powell street on the west, from Broadway on the north to Bush street on the south. Therefore it was that San Francisco said that the fire was not an unmixed evil, if it should drive out Chinatown.

The Chinese seemed to simplify the problem by fleeing from the city in great numbers. Together with the Japanese they did not stand on the order of their going, but fled in droves, principally southward. Only those who were absolutely unable to leave the city remained, and they were placed in a detention camp in the Fort Mason Military Reservation. Their odoriferous neighborhood, however, was so distasteful to the white men and women in their neighborhood that they were twice removed by the authorities. This gave rise to the complaints to Washington that they were being "maltreated." As a matter of fact they were as well fed and well treated as the white refugees, with the single exception that they were thoughtfully placed to leeward of the whites, as the Chinese odor, if they were placed to windward, would have driven the white men and women into the bay.

Now, however, when it comes to the "disappearance of Chinatown," many difficulties have arisen. One of the first of these is that many of the Chinese own the title to the land in Chinatown in fee-simple. These people will resist dispossession unless paid an exorbitant price for their land. If any attempt is made to eject them, outside the law, it will speedily become a Federal matter. The Chinese government will complain and the Federal Government will intervene. While the matter of individual Chinese owners might be settled by large payments for their land, the Chinese Government owns a large piece on Stockton street which it occupies as Consulate General for this coast. The Chinese Government will not sell that for any price, as it would be derogatory to its dignity to do so. It will therefore be impossible to eliminate the Chinese entirely from this district, but even if most of them be removed, it would be an improvement highly to be desired.

A phase of the matter which is not unamusing is this: Nearly fifteen hundred Chinese have taken refuge in Los Angeles, many of them wealthy Chinese merchants. They have assured the Angelenos that five thousand of their countrymen will follow them from San Francisco if they are hospitably received. They have gone further and have assured their hosts that San Francisco's "large Oriental trade was due to the existence of the Chinese colony there," and that if the Chinese colony were transferred to Los Angeles, "the Oriental trade would follow it, using San Pedro as a shipping point." No one in San Francisco before has suspected the Chinese colony there as being "the centre of the Oriental trade." But the mere thought of Los Angeles taking anything away from San Francisco in her hour of trial so aroused San Francisco that at a meeting of the General Citizens' Committee it was urged that this matter be taken up at once. Charles S. Wheeler is reported in the Chronicle as declaring that "If the situation were not wisely handled, the bulk of San Francisco's Oriental trade might be diverted to other Pacific Coast ports." Thereupon the Committee declared that there was no disposition to harass the Chinese or to exclude them from full participation in the commercial life of the city, and a sub-Committee determined to bring about "an amicable adjustment of matters concerning the Chinese."

Editorial Library Losses.

Elsewhere we note that Mr. George Hamlin Fitch, Literary Editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, lost his library, the accumulation of years, in the recent destructive fire. Many other men lost their libraries, legal, medical and miscellaneous. The Argonaut has said little about its losses—so many of us have lost in San Francisco that "hard luck" stories are not popular. But Mr. Fitch's loss reminds us of the fact that we lost our own library. Furthermore as letters are coming to us from various sources asking questions about property—manuscript and other—consigned to us, it may be well for us to make some explanation concerning it here.

Everything belonging to or in the custody of the Argonaut was totally destroyed by fire. In the Editorial and Business offices, up-town on Sutter street, and in the Mechanical Department, down-town on Merchant street, everything went—editorial library, personal library, account books, office records, manuscripts, bound volumes, files, type-setting machinery, folding machinery, and printing machinery. Many of these things can be replaced if the insurance companies pay us the damages they agreed to, which is beginning to look somewhat doubtful. But while the machinery can be replaced, much of the library cannot, and neither can the bound volumes, files, and manuscripts.

As showing the impossibility of providing against a great conflagration in a large modern city, here is an incident. There were complete files of Argonaut, bound volumes placed, first, in its up-town, second, in its down-town departments: third, in a residence two miles to the west in the Western Addition: fourth, in a warehouse a mile and a half to the east near the water front. This was done for the express purpose of preventing the destruction of all the bound volumes at the same time by fire. But the precaution was futile. All of these buildings were destroyed and all the files which they contained are now dust and ashes. A number of warehouses on the water front were not consumed, but the one in which the Argonaut files were stored was not so fortunate—it was burned down. These buildings were not damaged by the earthquake, and the Western Addition residence was entirely of wood. All of these buildings were standing the night after the earthquake, but the following day all of them were burned.

When the fire took place the Argonaut's usual "Spring Publisher's Announcement Number" was nearly ready for the press. It was to have been forty pages in size, and to contain a number of special articles prepared for it by well known writers. It was profusely illustrated. Over thirty pages of it were in plates. But of plates, cuts, sheets and manuscripts nothing remains—all were destroyed. The illustrations sent us by Eastern publishers are a prey to the flames. Some of their advertisements which were in proof and some which were in manuscript still remained in the mails. These, however, we have returned to the publishers: as we cannot give them the kind of newspaper we had intended, we therefore feel ourselves bound not to publish their advertising. Hence it is returned, with the regret that we cannot return the half tone blocks, but they are destroyed.

Quite a number of manuscripts were in the possession of the Argonaut, sent in by contributors. They also fell a prey to the flames. We regret very much their loss, but as the MSS. were not ours we had no insurable interest in them and therefore could not pay premiums on them. It is perhaps fortunate for the insurance companies that they had not insured these priceless manuscripts.

Out of all these things that fell a prey to the flames there is one item that—to use a common, coarse, post-conflagration expression only permissible in times of great excitement—rather sticks in our craw. We had a very unique library of verse. It included some fifteen hundred volumes, generally called in the office, the "Poetry Library". In truth much of it was poetry, most of it was good verse and there was no rubbish. It was the accumulation of many years. No one could believe that so large a collection of good verse could be gathered together had he not personally attended to the gathering of it.

About a week before the fire, the writer determined to have this large collection removed from the editorial rooms of the Argonaut, where it was encroaching upon space which was needed for the reference and general library. He ordered it packed and shipped to his residence in the country. A storage and packing company accepted this task. They were directed to finish it on a certain day, to have their wagons ready at 12 o'clock on Tuesday, April 17, 1906, and to ship it that afternoon. They did the packing, but they did not have their wagons ready, and they did not do the shipping. They had forty-five cases packed and ready for shipping at five o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, April 17th.

With these were included some score of bound sets of Argonaut files. This made a fifth place of deposit, and this to be outside of the city, in addition to the four deposits in separate places in San Francisco.

The storage company packed, but did not ship. Next morning came the earthquake, the next day came the fire. Forty-five cases were destroyed. And yesterday came the bill.

This seems like the very irony of fate. The weird sisters evidently did not intend that those fifteen hundred volumes of verse and those Argonaut files should escape from the flames. But why, oh why, did they let the writer get them packed and then make him pay for the packing?

This last loss sticks in our craw.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

To subscribers writing to the Argonaut for change of address: please give your old address, your new address, and your name written in plain legible characters.

LETTERS TO THE ARGONAUT.

A Three Years' Subscription.

Denver Colo., May 7, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: My subscription expires in June some time, and I send you a New York draft for twelve dollars, three years' subscription to the Argonaut, and regret that I cannot make it twelve hundred.

Kindly let me know if I can be of any service to you in any way.
E. P. VARIAN.

There has been doubt expressed in some quarters as to "whether the Argonaut would resume publication." The Argonaut does not have to "resume," for its publication has not been interrupted. No doubts, however, have come from our subscribers, as may be seen from the foregoing hearty and encouraging letter, which is typical of many. We thank the writers most warmly for their offers of service. We can suggest no better way in which such loyal friends could aid us than by continuing to testify their faith in the old Argonaut as they are now so earnestly doing, and to encourage and stimulate the editor with their splendid and steadfast loyalty.—EDITOR ARGONAUT.

No Argonauts Failed to Issue.

California State Library, Sacramento, Cal.,
April 30, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: We have received no copies of the Argonaut for April 21 and 28, 1906. Will you kindly send them for our library file? We discovered your address by seeing the paper for the 28th addressed to the Sacramento Bee. We have received none for the Library. We felt very glad to see the familiar face of the Argonaut again.

Yours truly,
J. L. GILLIS, Librarian,
Per A. L.

The Argonaut missed no numbers, and its publication was not interrupted. The copies in question have been duly forwarded to the State Library, whose officials we thank for their kindly interest.—
Editor Argonaut.

An Advance Subscription.

PITTSBURGH, April 30, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have just received the earthquake edition of your paper, dated San Jose, April 21st, and I am distressed to learn that the Argonaut establishment was completely destroyed. You deserve credit, however, for so promptly sending out copies of the paper printed at San Jose, and for your efforts in helping the sufferers, as outlined on the first page of your publication.

Enclosed you will find $5, and it has occurred to the writer, in view of the fact that you must plan for new quarters, that it would be well for all subscribers to send advance subscriptions covering a period of several years. We all wish to see the Argonaut resume its regular weekly publication and many will doubtless be only too glad to lend a helping hand.

Yours truly,
JOHN L. HAINES.

A Sympathetic Reader.

ST. HELENA, Cal.,
May 3, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Recently I saw an item to the effect that the Argonaut is being published in San Jose. I was more than glad to hear this, as I had been unable to learn before what had been your fate in the terrible destruction.

Sympathy for your loss must have been so often expressed that it has doubtless become a drug in the market with you. But surely all readers and lovers of the "best paper on the Coast" feel like telling you of their sorrow in your loss. I can assure you that our five years' complete file looked very dear to us when we did not know but that we had our last number.

Trusting that the fortunes of the Argonaut will have suffered no lasting reverses, and again begging to assure you of not only my own, but the sympathy of all St. Helena Argonaut lovers, believe me

Very truly yours,
MAUDE HEATH.

From a New Jersey Reader.

SCHUYLER B. JACKSON,

N. J. Supreme Court Commissioner.
Special Master in Chancery.

NEWARK, N. J., April 27, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: We of the East are admiring the wonderful coolness and calm energy of the San Francisco and California people. They certainly deserve all sympathy and will gain success. There is no question but that San Francisco and all those places which have been devastated or destroyed will be rebuilt in a much more beautiful and magnificent, as well as practical way than ever before.

Let me suggest that a dual water supply be provided in San Francisco and other large places. The salt water from the bay would be especially efficacious in extinguishing fires.

A suggestion made by a prominent mechanical engineer was that large subterranean reservoirs or cisterns be placed at intervals throughout the city with hydraulic or steam pumps, which could be used for pumping up the salt water into these reservoirs at strategic points throughout the city.

Then, also, a new invention of a hall or flexible joint for water pipes has been suggested. Thus the mains would adjust themselves to the seismic motion. Cannot some of your engineers develop this idea? Then all electric wires furnishing power should be placed underground.

With the above suggestions, the greater danger by fire would be largely obviated, because the fire was much more disastrous than the earthquake.

We are raising large sums of money in Newark and New Jersey, and have already sent considerable to help out the immediate emergencies, and the whole nation is certainly responding in a magnificently generous and sympathetic manner.

I know the Argonaut will come over to us just as inspiring and fresh and bright as ever.

Yours respectfully,
SCHUYLER B. JACKSON.

For Friends in England.

REDLANDS, Cal., May 4, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Let me extend my congratulations to the Argonaut for the issues of April 21 and 28. The display of spirit is so fine that I want to send copies of the above editions to friends in England and enclose funds herewith for same, hoping that the edition is not exhausted. May I also extend to the Argonaut my very best wishes.

ARTHUR S. AUCHINCLOSS.

A Reader For Twenty Years.

South Bend, Indiana, 804 Park Ave., May 3, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have just learned that you are publishing your paper temporarily at San Jose and that your papers and records were destroyed in the recent terrible calamity in San Francisco. May I venture to remind you that I have been a constant reader of the Argonaut for over twenty years, through the kindness of my cousin, Mrs. C. B. Alexander, 4 West 38th St., New York City? My subscription expires March 1, 1907. Please send me the numbers since the earthquake if you have not exhausted the editions. Although not a Native Daughter, no heart beats more truly for California than mine, and I believe firmly in San Francisco's power to rise from her ashes more beautiful, more fascinating than ever.

Yours truly,
SARAH DEMING STEDMAN

Kind Offers of Service.

CAMULOS, May 5, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: May I ask you if there is any way in which your old subscribers can be of service at this time? I am sure there must be many like myself, who would be pleased to know how they can be of service.

Yours faithfully,
HERBERT FRYER.

We are receiving many letters similar to the above and can scarcely find words to express our thanks to our old subscribers for their warm-heartedness toward the Argonaut. Probably the way in which they could help us most materially would be by bringing the paper to the attention of those of their friends to whom they think it would prove a congenial visitor.—Editor Argonaut.

An Argonaut Prediction.

May 4, 1906.

Jerome Hart, Esq.

Dear Sir: Kindly have my Argonaut sent to me care of the enclosed address.

I can distinctly recall the warning note you sounded concerning the helpless condition of San Francisco after the Baltimore fire. Ah, had we only heeded it!

Very respectfully yours,
DR. EUGENE ZEILE.

Yes, We Will Continue.

60 High St., Boston, May 2, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: In the terrible disaster which has befallen San Francisco, your office has probably been destroyed, but presumably you will continue the publication of the Argonaut in due course, and when this takes place I hope you will see that I am still on your mailing list, for I should keenly miss your bright and entertaining paper if entirely deprived of it.

My subscription expires, I think, somewhere about the middle of August, but I am not at all sure about this and am quite willing to start afresh from your next issue and remit accordingly.

Yours truly,
ERNEST F. MARCUS.

When the Ashes Blow Away.

San Francisco, May 1, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: When the ashes blow away, please send my Argonaut to No. 1272 Fulton street, San Francisco.

Yours very truly,
J. E. JANES.

An Old Friend.

Annex, Produce Exchange.

New York, May 1, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: The Argonaut has frequently been in my mind of late when thinking of friends or matters in or connected with San Francisco. I am an old friend and personal acquaintance of the late Mr. Frank M. Pixley, and am therefore somewhat familiar with your "back history."

As soon as you can pull yourselves together, I am sure you will be starting up again. I am on the list of your subscribers, and my household is waiting with keen interest the arrival of the first number that you will be issuing under the new conditions. I extend to you my heartfelt sympathies.

With sincere regards and best wishes, I remain
Very faithfully yours,

THE DESTRUCTION OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Episodes and Incidents, Reflections and Deductions.

MIRIAM MICHELSON.

The well-known writer, author of "In the Bishop's Carriage," etc., was in San Francisco during the fire. She had invested a large portion of her earnings from books in property there. This is a portion of her graphic narrative of the scenes she witnessed:

It began then, that fearful hegira. All through that long night of unnatural stillness we heard the fleeing footsteps. It was a horrible sound, that continuous, hurried, straggling exodus. The stricken people did not run—they were too exhausted by the time they had reached our quarter—but they toiled doggedly on, on out toward the west, toward the cool eucalyptus forests in the Presidio, out toward the edge of the bay. One man I saw carried with care a brand-new pair of tan shoes. He had absolutely nothing else, but these he bore on a stick over his shoulder. Women carried their babies, their canary birds in cages, their parrots. Next to a man who trundled all his household possessions on a lawn mower rode a group of negroes in a ghastly hearse, pulled by stalwart negroes. A chattering crowd of Chinamen carried pathetic little bundles of rice, their brightly clad little wives and babies dragging miserably on behind. A man and his wife harnessed themselves with ropes to a trunk, and with bowed backs and blistered feet went on. It was a fearful night in the open, with mothers seeking their children, with aged parents separated from their families. A man I know wandered through the Presidio for five hours that night, calling his wife's name. There was no light, there was nothing to distinguish one huddled mass of refugees from another. My friend called and called till he was hoarse. When he dragged himself back to town on Thursday he had the search to begin over again.

When the sun arose that Thursday morning it was blood-red in a heaven of smoke. Black clouds were belching forth; the business part of the town was a hot graveyard, whose rickety, irregular-shaped tombstones marked the spot where millions of property lay in mountainous heaps of smoking brick and twisted steel. And in rich men's back yards, under rose-bushes, silver and laces and jewels had been secreted that night. The dynamiting began, and we became familiar with the sight of automobiles carrying a red flag and bearing a soldier with rifle in hand, while a businesslike person informed the proprietor of a hotel worth half a million that in three minutes his property would be blown up. And it was. It took just that length of time to transform the hotel in which my sister lived into a smoking ruin. She came out, covering her eyes, for she had seen a twisted dead body across the street where the tower had toppled and fallen, half burying it.

From the hill where we lived we could look out over the superb and terrible spectacle. The heat was fearful, and the light a ghastly dull glow that sickened the eye as terror and pain sickened the stomach. We were nauseated with misery and apprehension. Some of us had been in the country. Can you realize what a conflagration it was when the people of a town forty miles from San Francisco could see the white clouds billowing up and down, and who stood at night on the little beach watching the fearful pink glow that told of disaster?

ALFRED HOLMAN,

Editor of the Sacramento Union, happened to be in San Francisco at the time of the disaster. Portions of his narrative, a very striking one, are given below:

At the time of the shock I was in the Pacific Union Club at the corner of Stockton and Post streets, a building quite new and entirely modern, with steel frame and heavy outer walls of stone. I was awake and in the act of touching a button in order that I might see what time it was, when the shock came. My pen halts at the point of description, for mere words are not equal to it. It was as if the building were in some Titanic grasp, being wrenched violently from south to north. The plastering came down with a crash, followed by the globes from a central electric fixture. How long the shock lasted I cannot say, but the time was sufficient for me to get out of bed, to go first to a window which shattered as I approached it, thence to the opposite side of the room, where I took refuge under a door casing. The noise was terrific, but whether from the earth itself or from the creaking of the steel frame of the building and the grinding of the stones of the outer walls I cannot say. My own room and the whole interior space of the large clubhouse was filled to suffocation with plaster dust, while the sound of falling and shattering glass continued for some moments after the shock was past.

As soon as outside sounds could be heard, my attention was attracted by the screams and groans of a club employee, who in his terror jumped from a second-story window to the stone sidewalk below, where he lay writhing in agony. Myself and others ran in our night clothes to his assistance, carrying him into the hall, where in some unexplainable way a physician appeared and proceeded to care for the man, who was terribly hurt. I then made my way up the dark stairways, through stifling dust to my room on the fourth floor, where, after some groping about, I found the wherewithal to clothe myself.

By the time I left my room for the second time, perhaps some twenty minutes after the shock, it was entirely light in the street, though the dust within the building made it fairly dark and the passage in the gloom down the stairway and over broken glass was a nerve-racking procedure. It seemed by a quarter to six—half an hour after the shock—that the whole city had poured out into the streets. Union Square, immediately opposite, was already filled with a multitude who had fled from their beds in the St. Francis and other hotels near. Many men wore nothing but their night clothes, while hundreds of women wrapped in blankets and in fragments of clothing sat or wandered about in the cold, early morning. Several wounded men crawled out or were dragged out from a collapsed lodging-house immediately south of Union Square, several of them covered with blood and plaster, and some of them crying out in agony.

From Union Square I walked down Geary street to the junction of Market and Geary, thence past the Palace Hotel to Montgomery, and down Montgomery to the Mills building. So far as I could see, no serious damage had been done to any of the new and larger structures. Neither the Call nor the Chronicle buildings appeared in the least damaged, while the Palace Hotel was intact excepting for a few broken windows. The Crocker building stood unharmed, as did the Mills building.

A new and more immediate danger now became apparent, for at various points in the region between Montgomery street and the bay and off to the south and southeast, there appeared volumes of smoke which told their own story, many fires with not one drop of water.

From Montgomery I then started to walk to the extreme western part of the Western Addition, hoping to relieve the anxiety of my family, who were lodged with relatives at a point on Clay street near the Presidio. This long walk of four miles, which I accomplished approximately in an hour, is in my memory a nightmare of horrors. Streets everywhere were littered with fallen bricks, copings of structures which for the most part remained intact. It was necessary to pick one's way through debris over a good part of the distance, making the walk both tedious and often dangerous, since broken walls and chimneys were still crumbling and falling into the street. The people everywhere had left their houses and were gathered in the middle of the streets, many of them as they came from their beds, wrapped in blankets and window drapings. The general movement was downtown, thousands of men hurrying down to see what had happened to their places of business and hailing every western bound person for information. I must have been accosted one hundred times with inquiries after particular buildings or localities.

By 11 o'clock, after reassuring myself as to my family, I returned to the downtown district, to find that the smoke had burst into a vast conflagration. Literally there was not a drop of water to be had. The city lay at the mercy of the flames—and there was no mercy. Fire rose in twenty directions with vast volumes of smoke clouding the whole sky, while terrific explosions from the flaming district told of the harrowing progress of the conflagration.

It would not be easy to describe the universal terror of Wednesday night. There were few who dared to sleep within doors. The parks and streets were full of people, in large part without covering of any kind save the clothes they wore, while there were thousands of sleepers rolled in blankets. At 2 o'clock in the morning, myself and a friend who walked through the region between Octavia and Central avenue, encountered hundreds of men, women and children lying asleep on the sidewalks, and even in the streets, without covering whatever. There was no water and no means of cooking. Patrols, mounted and on foot, warned people everywhere against starting fires in their houses. Many thousands of persons went hungry and thirsty to sleep on the cold pavements or in the moist grass of open squares. The feeling everywhere was that of terror, due to the fact that slight shocks were felt every few hours.

Nothing could have been more admirable than the conduct of the authorities. Early in the forenoon of Wednesday martial law was proclaimed and the guarding of the city practically turned over to the soldiers, mounted and afoot, who came promptly from the Presidio and the various forts about the bay. There was a soldier in every street, while lines of men in uniform shut off every avenue leading to the burning district. So far as my own observation was concerned, the work of the soldiers was admirably performed. The attitude of the people for the most part was excellent.

I hope I may never again witness a scene so painful as that of Thursday, when apparently all the people turned from their homes to flee into the open region to the west. The streets were crowded with a motley procession of refugees. Some came in carriages elegantly equipped, many in vehicles of any and every description, while the great flood passed by on foot. Everybody was loaded down to the limit of his or her capacity to carry or draw a load. The vehicles were as various as the persons themselves. Everything that could go on wheels, from automobiles to improvised carts made of boards and roller skates, were loaded down with every possible description of domestic gear. All considerations of order and dignity were lost in a terrible eagerness to get beyond the reach of the flames. Fathers of families with packs of bedding or clothing were followed by their wives, equally laden, and by groups of worn-out children, who had in many cases literally to be dragged along. I saw the daughter of Thomas Starr King, herself the wife of a millionaire, riding amid a pile of miscellaneous luggage on the top of a dirt wagon. I saw the venerable Judge McFarland, with his aged wife on his arm, limping past, dragging a child's cart upon which a few domestic essentials were tied. This motley and pitiful procession was a sight to rend the heart, for there was no aspect of it which did not tell of terror and pain.

The midnight scenes of this Thursday night were, if possible, worse than those of the night previous. Throughout the Western Addition there had all day been a constant shower of cinders and pieces of charred wood. The whole populace was hegrimed with it, for if there had been time or disposition for bathing there was no water for that purpose. Two-thirds of the people were dusty with ashes from head to foot, while all were worn and more or less hungry and thirsty. Water had been brought into the parks in limited supply, but there was not enough to go around. There was a little district in which by some chance the water still flowed through the pipes and at Devisadero and Post streets there was a horse trough into which the water steadily poured, and here was a great congestion of animals and men and women struggling for water. I saw women stooping and drinking, literally, side by side with horses and dogs.

Amid this great mass of suffering humanity there were sick in very considerable numbers carried from hospitals and from private houses. In these congested centers many a poor exposed woman suffered the agonies of child birth. In every such instance people rose from improvised beds to give over their blankets and sheets. From God knows where came hundreds of uniformed nurses, who were present at every scene of distress.

At 11 o'clock on Thursday night I found my way to the top of Lafayette Square, at the junction of Octavia and Clay streets. By this time the whole region between the California-street hill and Van Ness avenue was a raging ocean of flame. I have no words to describe the terror and the grandeur of a picture which can never fade from the memory of anybody who looked upon it.

It was as if the whole region a mile wide by two miles long were a vast and seething crater, and its awful impressiveness was emphasized and punctuated by terrible explosions of dynamite, by which a row of structures between Van Ness avenue and Franklin street were being blown into atoms by way of creating an open space to stay the flames. Thousands were gathered on the hillsides to view this colossal destruction and in their midst other thousands lay on the grass or upon the sands of the hillside sleeping the sleep of complete exhaustion. But even in the midst of this terrible situation there was the spirit of levity. One could hear laughter from many groups and at one point there were gathered some fifteen or twenty persons making merry over rag-time airs produced by a guitar and a violin. I could but wonder whether this incongruous and curious exhibition were due to mere levity of spirit or to hysteria.

JOHN P. YOUNG,

Managing Editor of the Chronicle, thus touched upon the efforts of the dynamiters and others fighting the flames:

The din of the temblor was still in my ears when the much more terrifying spectacle of the spreading flames demanded attention. It was at 5:13 a. m. when the earth shook; before 8 o'clock intelligent men realized that the fires which had broken out in several quarters of the city were menacing a great conflagration; by noon the menace was converted into an awful reality, which carried with it the horrifying conviction that it was likely to become of such magnitude that all attempts to cope with it would prove unavailing. At nightfall of the first day it seemed as if the city could not escape destruction. The resort to dynamite in the business quarter instead of arresting the progress of the flames, helped to promote it; in order to stop the spread on one side of Kearney street a building was blown down, and a mass of flame shot across the thoroughfare, and in a few moments the blaze was eating its way toward Chinatown, which it speedily licked up like so much tinder. The complete ineffectiveness of the efforts of the fire fighters, the knowledge of which seemed to be general, that the water supply was inadequate, and in many cases almost wholly cut off, should have produced a state of panic, but marvelous as it may seem, there was no exhibition of anything of the sort, and from first to last people kept their heads.

I met friends driven from the burned district by the flames, who had saved nothing but what they stood in, who were collected enough to discuss the future of the city, and in more than one instance the brief replies to greetings were optimistic in character. During that first night I snatched occasional moments of sleep in a room so brightly illuminated by the flames which were roaring in several quarters of the town that it would have been easy to read a newspaper by their light.

GEORGE HAMLIN FITCH,

Literary Editor of the Chronicle, speaks feelingly of the loss of his library:

I live on Clay street, near Larkin, but when the flames crept around the Fairmount, I saw that everything as far as Van Ness avenue was doomed.

Then I set about trying to save my library, a collection of 6000 volumes, made during forty years and containing many authors' copies, with autographs and notes—priceless volumes which money cannot reproduce. But this work was rendered futile by a squad of militia, which drove everything out of the block, although the flames did not reach my house until two hours and a half later. From Lafayette Square I saw my beloved books—gathered with so much pleasure and dear to me beyond all other earthly possessions—go up in smoke.

E. H. HAMILTON,

Of the Examiner, points out in striking language the extraordinary tangle of titles, the labyrinth of lost documents and the remarkable wiping out of accounts and records due to the great fire:

Just look at a few of the facts and then try to imagine a time when the lines of meum and tuum shall be drawn as they were at 5 o'clock on the morning of the 18th of April.

The insurance companies think they have a hard task before them. Many of their records have been destroyed. Many of the policies have been lost. There are questions as to where the lack of liability for earthquake damage ended and where the liability for fire loss began. Then there are quibbles as to payments for damage by dynamiting when the efforts were made to stop the conflagration. And the insurance men are so much at sea that one will figure the total insurance loss at not over $150,000,000, while another will add an entire $200,000,000 to that figure.

But the troubles of the insurance men are trifles when compared to the general chaos of business affairs. Begin with the land titles. Some of those are apt to be as unstable as was mother earth when she shivered so fearfully in the cool of that April morning.

Everything in California dated back to the Spanish and Mexican land grants. The early records regarding San Francisco were in the United States Land Office. That office was in the sub-treasury building. The sub-treasury building is a heap of cooling bricks. Not a record remains. The maps and recorded grants are ashes. Out in the Hall of Records, in the badly shattered City Hall, many of the title records are ruined or missing. Very likely San Francisco will have a repetition of the long litigation over "squatter titles" that followed her original upbuildings, for the original deeds have gone by tens of thousands and it is conceivable that some of the owners of property may never be distinguished or identified in the broken and blackened stumps of men that will come from the miles of tumbled brick and stone.

When you turn to personal property you enter a domain without marks or charts for guidance. It is believed nearly all the bank vaults are all right and that their contents will be very little damaged. At best this is a belief, for no bank vault can be opened for many days yet.

The City Assessor opened his vault and everything was in flames at once. How long it will be before the bank vaults may be opened with safety it is hard to tell. When they are opened, what?

One or two of those bank vaults are known to have smoked a great deal. Men shake dubious heads when they speak of them.

It must be remembered that individual bank books have been destroyed by the tens of thousands.

But with this possibility of trouble you have just poked your nose into what seems a limitless labyrinth of lost documents.

There are great public service corporations here who haven't a list or book to show the names of their stockholders and they number those stockholders by the thousands. Many of these stockholders have lost their stock certificates. Where do these corporations stand? Will anybody answer that question offhand? How are the stockholders to be determined? Who is to be assessed to reconstruct the plants?

Mining company after mining company has lost all its records. Here again the certificates of stock have in many instances been destroyed. It must be remembered that in most instances the contents of the very best so-called "fire-proof" safes were found to be ashes and molten metal.

HUBERT E. HUNT

Tells of his sensations when he saw the countless fires viewed from a hilltop breaking out all over the city:

"See! San Francisco is burning!" said some one at my elbow, when I had scrambled to the top of the eminence and paused for breath.

I turned and looked. It was the most awe-inspiring scene I ever expect to witness. In the dense section of the city lying south of Market street and extending from somewhere near the water front up to perhaps Fourth or Fifth streets, I counted eight immense fires. The flames were leaping high into the air. The fires were well scattered. In between, the smoke was beginning to curl up from what seemed to be perhaps a score of smaller fires. In the district north of Market street, between Telegraph Hill and the foot of Market street, flames began to leap skyward at several places. I forgot the earthquake and the damage it had wrought. The one fact that took possession of my senses was that the greater portion of the downtown section of San Francisco was doomed to destruction by fire.

I counted the fires again. Eight conflagrations were raging south of Market street. Any one of them would have taxed the energies of the fire department. Smoke was spreading over the city and clouding the atmosphere. Immense tongues of flame leaped up and through the murky blackness, and in another instant were lost to view. I wondered why the fire bells did not ring. A stillness reigned on Telegraph Hill. People were in the streets and open spaces, half clad, but said little. The crowds simply gazed at the picture of destruction and turned pale. And through the silence came the noise of crackling flames, a mile or more distant.

E. E. BOWLES

Was impressed by the leveling sentiments that pervaded the people of the stricken city:

The mind cannot grasp nor the pen describe the spectacle of 300,000 men, women and children fleeing before an on-coming fire. Some have seen the flight of non-combatants from a city that was threatened with bombardment—such was trivial to the scenes in the streets of San Francisco during April 18th and 19th. Every few feet held its incident of human interest, of pathos and—yes of humor.

But the thing that impressed me most was the leveling effects of the disaster on the human family. I have seen sworn enemies for years meet in the street and in the presence of all men clasp hands while their eyes filled with tears. I have seen women in sealskin, silk and diamonds sitting on blackened steps or street curbs sharing a loaf and a can of tomatoes or corn with women and babes in tattered calico, and I have seen those same richly-dressed women nursing the babes while the tired mothers rested. To-day in San Francisco one hears nothing of "grinding monopolies" and "soulless corporations." It has taught the workmen and capitalist their true status in the scheme of the universe—they are all children of one Father.

W. S. LIVENGOOD,

Of the Los Angeles Times, tells how he was impressed by a soldier and made to clean up garbage in the park:

Early in the day I started out afoot to ascertain the fate of friends living in the Richmond district north of Golden Gate Park. While passing through the Panhandle of the park I met a newsboy with the first "extras" I had seen since the fire began. I sat down in the park to read the "extra." I had not been reading long before a soldier came along and commanded me to get busy gathering up the waste paper and garbage with which that part of the park was littered. It was not my camping ground or my dirt I was ordered to clean up. A human hog was quartered there and had made most of the mess, but the soldier got his eagle eye on me first and set me to work to gather up the other fellow's filth. It is useless to try to bandy words with a soldier when martial law is in force and the man behind the gun has the power of life and death in his hands to be used at his discretion. Any way, I have a wholesome respect for the uniform of Uncle Sam and have always prided myself on being a law-abiding citizen, so I pocketed my newspaper and got busy under the soldier's direction. After I had done my stunt as scavenger the fellow who was bivouacked on the particular piece of ground I cleaned up, kindly condescended to lend me a match to set the rubbish afire. Then I trekked without loitering further in the park.

The park resembled a summer encampment. Many of the thousands of fire refugees located there, having erected cozy tents and other forms of shelter, and being prepared, evidently, for a long stay. Many of the refugees were people of quality who had fled from the fire in automobiles or their own private carriages which stood by and formed part of the camp equipment. They had brought with them an abundance of clothing, bedding and food.

VANITY FAIR.

The first wedding ever celebrated in Golden Gate Park took place last week, when Miss Amilie Bartmann became the wife of Rudolph Bossert. The ceremony was performed by Rev. F. D. Bovard of Berkeley in the little summer house just west of the conservatory, where the bride has been staying with friends since the fateful April 18th. The romance is the direct result of the earthquake, and is another proof that every cloud has a silver lining. Miss Bartmann formerly lived at 268 Turk street, and it was when Bossert hurried to her rescue after her home was in flames that she first learned that life is too short to live it alone. Bossert himself was burned out, as he lived at 501 Geary street. "San Francisco never looked better to me than it does right now," said the bridegroom, "and when we return from our wedding journey—which is to be to the Cliff House—we are going to set up housekeeping in this little summer house." "I always intended to be married in white," said the bride, casting a regretful glance at a pretty dark green cloth traveling dress, "but the fire left me only the clothes I have on." Judging by her manner, that did not matter in the least. Great difficulty was experienced in finding a place where a wedding ring could be bought. But one was finally found at a jeweler's on Twentieth avenue. The summer house was decorated with flowers, and the bride carried a large bouquet of roses.

In San Francisco this is a bad time for the artificial blondes. A shortage of the supply of peroxide, together with a carelessness as to appearances, has resulted in many peculiar coiffure combinations. The blonde of yesterday, who was the brunette of day before yesterday, will be the blonde-brunette of to-morrow. Inability to secure the needed drug and lack of attention to her crowning glory is the reason. One of them walked up Fillmore street the other day. Her carriage was airy, her demeanor chic—her hair yellow blonde. That is to say, part of her hair was blonde. It didn't take even a close observer to note the startling fact that in near the roots her hair was black. There was nearly a half inch of this black hair. There will be more in a few days. If she doesn't immediately begin the work of reconstruction the neighbors will be talking about her.

How long will it be before San Francisco is again remarkable for the great proportion of its well-dressed men and women? How many months must elapse before the theaters pour into the streets and into the brilliantly lighted cafes their multitudes attired in silk and satin and broadcloth and glittering with diamonds? Just at present the entire city must be the despair of the more conventional. The women as well as the men seem to have forgotten that there was such a reputation to sustain. Garments of the plainest texture and the most subdued pattern are worn, to the exclusion of all others, and there is not even an attempt to appear fashionable or to outdress one's neighbors. Women in the extreme of negligee and dishabille tend the curbstone kitchens during all hours of the day. A shirtwaist of any color that is not white, a straw hat and a short skirt are the essential features of the ideal outdoor costume. How many of these garments are borrowed is nobody's business. The men have kept pace with the general decline by discarding boiled shirts and stiff collars. Nearly all of them wear soft shirts, and a census of those rendered shirtless by the fire might be taken by enumerating the garments that are but too evidently of Government distribution.

The kitchen and dining room of the Vendome Hotel, San Jose, are practically unharmed. In a week or so they could be put in good condition. But the remainder of the hotel stands in need of considerable repairs and it will probably take two or three months to put it in good shape. The suggestion, therefore, is to establish a tent city on the spacious and handsome grounds of the Vendome.

"Why wouldn't it be a good scheme?" said its author. "We could lay flooring, put up nice tents with good accommodation, open the dining room and offer the public a regular picnic. I believe that it would be a good thing. Of course, the tourist season is about over for this year, but there are a whole lot of people who have been in the habit of staying at the Vendome, who would come to the tent city with the Vendome bill of fare to back it. Meantime we could be carrying out repairs on the hotel, but after those were finished I would be in favor of running the camp as long as the warm and pleasant weather lasts. I think we would catch a big bunch of people from San Francisco. There are a whole lot of business men there who have been burned out, or who would like to get their families out of town until things are more settled. They could send them here and as they are feeling now they would a great deal rather live in a tent than in any building. A tent is earthquake proof. We could accommodate several hundred guests on the grounds, and see what a pleasant place it would be for them to take life easy under those big trees. I believe the idea would catch on and bring a lot of people here for the summer."

A Philadelphia business man recently had as guest a friend from Toledo, an extremely busy individual, little familiar with the social graces. For the first evening of his stay a dinner party had been arranged. The hostess had provided a most attractive young woman for the Toledo man; and it was thought that he would take a desperate fancy to her, which, indeed, he did. When the guests had gathered and were ready to go out, the host, with his politest bow, said: "Mr. Blank, will you please take Miss Dash out to dinner?" "Certainly," responded the Toledo man, with alacrity, "but I understood that we were to have dinner here in the house."

Twenty-five young girl students from Barnard College, the female seminary annex of Columbia University, attended a reception in New York on May 4th in honor of Mlle. Andreieva, the Russian actress whom Maxim Gorky tried to pass off as his wife. The reception was held at the residence of Professor Dewey of Columbia University, and the girl students were there at his invitation. The utmost secrecy was observed by the young women. A dozen other women of Dewey's acquaintance were also present. At the reception Mlle. Andreieva made a speech and called for funds to aid the Russian revolution. After the address the actress held a levee and spoke flatteringly of the charms of American women. She did not mention the unpleasantness her association with Gorky had occasioned here. While the reception was in progress the Columbia boys became aware of it, and they gave a serenade. It was not appreciated.

Mrs. Nannie Langhorne Shaw of Virginia, and Waldorf Astor, eldest son of William Waldorf Astor, were quietly married at All Souls' Church, Langham Place, London, May 3rd, by the Rev. Francis Scott Webster, M. A., the vicar. Neither William Waldorf Astor nor Mr. Langhorne, respectively the father of the groom and the bride, were present, both being too ill to attend the ceremony. Only immediate relatives and intimate friends of the couple knew of the arrangements, so the congregation was small. It included Ambassador Reid and Mrs. Reid. Charles Dana Gibson accompanied the bride to the altar and the groom was supported by his brother, John Jacob Astor. The newly married couple received many handsome presents, including the beautiful Cliveden estate, which Mr. Astor presented to his son with all its contents as a wedding gift. Mr. Astor also gave the bride a tiara in which is set the famous Sancy diamond, weighing 53½ karats and valued at $75,000. The groom's present to the bride was a necklace formed by three rows of superb pearls. The object of the quietness of the marriage was to prevent its possible interruption by certain of the clergy of London, who object to the marriage of divorced persons in church, whether they are the aggrieved party or otherwise. One of these clergy had threatened to interrupt the Astor-Shaw ceremony with an objection.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

One of the remarkable features of the recent San Francisco catastrophe was the impressment of passers-by on the streets for the purpose of clearing up debris and performing other rough work. The patrol of Federal soldiery was no respecter of persons. They were ordered to have the steets cleared, and they carried out their orders. They did not confine themselves to pedestrians, for one wealthy youth going along in an automobile was ordered to descend and go to work packing bricks. He objected on the ground that his automobile might fall into bad hands. The Sergeant in command replied promptly, "We'll attend to that; we'll use it for Red Cross work," and the young man sadly saw his auto disappearing in the distance. Even the Secretary of State of California, while passing down Market street, was impressed, and made to labor for several hours at clearing away debris. One of the numerous earthquake couples, who became suddenly mated in consequence of the calamity, were hurrying down Market street to the ferry, the bridegroom dragging a trunk and the bride carrying a suit-case. "Here," said the Sergeant, "you're a husky fellow, drop that and get to work." The bride pleaded tearfully that her hubby be released on the ground that it was their "honeymoon." "No time for honeymoons now," said the Sergeant; "after he puts in a stunt of four hours we will let him loose; you can sit on the trunk and watch him; when the time's up the honeymoon can go on." So the bride sat on the trunk and wept while the bridegroom slung bricks.

General Samuel S. Sumner, U. S. A., who was here for a brief stay, left the city after the earthquake and went to San Rafael. There he was informed by one of the guiding spirits of the village that he must aid in patrolling and guarding against fires and unruly refugees. Something in General Sumner's military bearing evidently impressed the man, for, after a moment's thought, he said, "I think I'll make you a Second Lieutenant." "Thank you," answered General Sumner. "I don't think any rank ever conferred upon me ever pleased me more, unless it was when I was made a Major General in the regular Army."

The following are taken from some "compositions" on the earthquake and fire written by school-children:

"And the people ran to the banks and tried to get their money but they couldn't get it out and the Call building is still standing."

"The Palace Hotel was blowed up with dinnimight."

"The tides came together and then they broke and many people were cild (killed). Bricks fell on the people also and killed them and then they put the fire out and said San Francisco is going to be larger than it ever was."

"The people were aloud to take a hath and eat vegetables."

"San Francisco is nothing but a sematery now. When a sick lady in the hospital felt the earth quake she jumped from a six story building and she met death."

"The fire burned Hales store but a little place in front which said, "your credit is good."

"A big water main broke and drowned all the people in it."

"They said San Fras. was going to be destroyed and so a volcano blew up and covered the city with lather." (lava,

"They dinamited everybody's house up and we had another hig one last night."

"Big balls of fire shot out of the ground and started fires all over."

"San Francisco was destroyed by fire. There was no water because the water front burned first."

"People were lined up for bread and water, some being killed by the earth quake."

"The fire burned so hard that people came to Napa to live."

"The Chronicle building is all hurt in the inside and people are cooking on the outside waiting for their chimneys to be inspected."

"They are working hard to get the ruins finished."

"There are 400 babies born in San Francisco since the earth quake and people all over the world are making baby clothes."

The late Susan B. Anthony was once talking in Washington about the nude in art.

"The nude in art is all very well in its way, I have no doubt," she said, "but there is one thing about it that I particularly object to. That is the habit some men have of smoking pipes with nude women carved on the bowl, or of carrying canes with nude women on the handle, or of wearing rings that contain cameos of nude women."

"There was a certain high dignitary of the church who once rebuked this habit magnificently."

"The thing happened in the days when it was fashionable to take snuff. It was at the end of a dinner, and a distinguished nobleman (let us call him Lord Jones) extended his snuff box to the clergyman, and said, bowing and smiling:

"Snuff, sir?"

"The other opened the box, and took a pinch of the brown powder within. It was a gold box, and in a circle of brilliants a nude woman was portrayed in bright enamel. The clergyman frowned as he saw the picture. Lord Jones smiled. Intentionally, perhaps, he had given this affront."

"But Lord Jones' smile vanished quickly as the clergyman said, tapping the nude figure with his finger:

"Very pretty. Is it Lady Jones?"

The late Congressman David B. Henderson of Dubuque some years ago addressed the Dubuque people at a May Day festival.

The ex-Speaker, apropos of ignorance, said:

"But the worst case of ignorance I can tell you of occurred in '69 in a remote section of our country."

"There was a man who suddenly became rich, and built an enormous house. He decided to adorn the house with some statuary, and so he wrote to Italy for a copy of the Venus de Milo."

"The copy in due time arrived. It was executed in Carrara marble very beautifully."

"But no sooner did he receive it than the millionaire sued the railroad for $2000 for mutilation, and what's more, he won the suit."

A comfortable kraal had been assigned the missionary, and he was now very contentedly and cheerfully engaged in unpacking his trunks.

A native entered and said, with a low bow:

"His majesty the king, sir, bade me come and dress you."

The missionary smiled gratefully at the attention.

"You are the royal valet, I presume," he said.

"No, sir. The royal cook," the native answered.

Dr. R. A. Torrey, the evangelist, was condemning drunkenness in Philadelphia.

"For my part," he said, "I wish all the whisky dealers were like a certain Western one, a hard-headed old Scot who grew rich in the trade."

"After he had grown rich, the old man built himself a fine house—a limestone mansion on the hill, with a park around it, with conservatories, stables and outbuildings—in a word, a palace."

"One day the old Scot rode in the omnibus past his fine house. A temperance man pointed up at the grand edifice, and said with a sneer:

"It was the whisky built that, wasn't it?"

"Na, na, man: the water," the Scot answered."

Allyn & Bacon, publishers of school books in Boston, Chicago and New York, have sent receipted bills to their San Francisco customers.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Samuel L. Clemens (Mark Twain), appeared for the last time as a public lecturer at Carnegie Hall on April 19, at a benefit for the Robert Fulton Memorial Association. He announced that he would never again speak for a fee.

Prince Charles Joseph Stanislaus Marie Poniatowski, well known in this country, Mexico and Europe, died May 5th at the Hotel St. Regis, New York, from pneumonia, aged 44 years. He was the eldier brother of Prince Andre Poniatowski, who is the brother-in-law of W. H. Crocker, of San Francisco. His father, Prince Stanislaus Poniatowski, was Master of Horse to Napoleon III and an ancestor was King Stanislaus of Poland. Prince Charles came to this country in the early 80's and became very popular at Newport. His marriage in Paris, 1884, to Miss Maude Ely Goddard was a brilliant event. For many years Prince and Princess Charles have made their home in the City of Mexico, and in Mexico the Prince had extensive mining and railroad interests.

Professor Curie, the discoverer of radium, was run over by a wagon and killed on April 19th, in Paris. He was forty-seven years old, and his early taking-off is matter for the deepest regret, though his wife, coworker with him, and codiscoverer of the secrets of science, may, perhaps, continue his work. The daily press gave no space to chronicle the life of this eminent scientist, for his death occurred while the great fire in San Francisco was still raging.

While Sarah Bernhardt has been touring America her son Maurice has been taking exception to what the French press has to say about the celebrated actress and has been challenging people right and left to duels. The latest object of Maurice Bernhardt's anger is Henri de Wendel, editor of an illustrated weekly. Maurice sent his seconds to De Wendel, who is a keen swordsman and a crack shot, but De Wendel sent back word that neither he nor his paper meant any disrespect to the famous actress and the incident has been closed.

Philander C. Knox, former Attorney-General and present junior Senator from Pennsylvania, burns the midnight oil the year around, except for one month, March, when he goes to Miami, Fla., with his friend Henry C. Frick, of Pittsburg. They fish from morning until night, sometimes from night until morning. During the other eleven months, Senator Knox's only diversion from legislative or legal duties is to read. He is one of the omnivorous readers of the age, and subscribes for about fifty magazines published in different parts of the world. He purchases all the best new books and all the rare editions of old works which come his way. He reads in his carriage going to the Capitol, on trains and every place where he must spend some moments waiting. Even in bed, the Senator reads with the aid of an adjustable electric light, and by his side is a contrivance of his own patent which can hold a large volume, tray fashion.

Leoncavallo has gone to Spain to study the people, their customs, and especially their folk-songs, before writing his new opera, "Figaro's Youth."

Mme. Mathilde Marchesi de Castrone, who is still actively engaged in teaching, celebrated on March 26th the eightieth anniversary of her birth. Sixty years ago she studied under Manuel Garcia. Mme. Marchesi taught singing for many years at Vienna and Cologne, but since 1881 has lived in Paris.

Beatrice Sacchi, a professor at Mantua, and the holder of a doctor's degree, is the first woman to vote in Italy. There is no law in Italy to prevent a woman from voting, and Miss Sacchi discovered this and went to the polls and voted.

Manley Lawton, of Pewee Valley, Ky., who has just received his appointment as a cadet to West Point, is the oldest son of the late Maj.-Gen. Henry W. Lawton. At the tender age of eleven he was under fire in the Philippines, where he had gone with his father.

On April 18th, at the venerable age of ninety, died, in New York, Daniel Huntington, the painter. If volume of work settled it, he would be rated as the most noted American portrait-painter of his day. He was exceedingly productive, and a painter of remarkable talent, but less fortunate than either his predecessors or those who came after him in the schooling he got in Europe in the formative period of his career. The week before, Eastman Johnson had died, also full of years, at eighty-two. They were veterans of their craft.

King Alfonso and Princess Ena are both descendants of Mary Queen of Scots, as is every monarch in Europe except the King of Sweden and the Sultan of Turkey.

Among all the faithful and devoted servitors of the United States Government in the lighthouse department, one of the very oldest in duration of service until her recent resignation was Julia T. Williams of Santa Barbara. Her husband became keeper of the Santa Barbara lighthouse in 1845, and when he died in 1867, Mrs. Williams took up his work and continued it until recently, when forced to resign her post on account of the infirmities of age. "Every night for thirty-eight years," so runs the official record, "Mrs. Williams climbed to the light at midnight and changed the lamps, and never was she absent from her post except to go to church on the Sabbath."

The Earl of Harrington was born sixty-two years ago, and succeeded his father in the title in 1881. He is one of the peers who have dabbled in trade. In 1894 he opened a fruit shop in Parliament Street in London.

The Emperor of China has a household consisting of 500 persons, including thirty bearers of state umbrellas, an equal number of fan bearers, thirty physicians and surgeons, seventy-five astrologers, seventy-six cooks and sixty priests.

King Edward VII is the uncle of the Emperor of Germany, will soon be the uncle of the Queen of Spain, is already the uncle of the Crown Prince of Roumania, the Czarina, the Crown Princess of Greece, and the Crown Princess of Sweden, and is the father of the Queen of Norway.

Paul Morton, president of the Equitable Assurance Society, was worried, when he first became Secretary of Navy, over the immense amount of name-signing he was obliged to do to letters and documents he could examine only in the most superficial way. This is the experience of every new Cabinet member. At first he tries to read everything, but soon finds that impossible and learns to rely on the subordinates who have prepared the routine matters for him. Of course, nothing that is great and important gets by without his full knowledge, but there are endless matters of routine that must be signed. A railroad friend came in to see Morton one day while he was busily signing his name. "Reminds me of a chap I knew in a railroad office out West," said the friend. "He had a busy day. Clerks were constantly coming and presenting papers for his signature. Finally, a man laid a paper on his desk. He signed it perfunctorily, without looking at it. 'That's a voucher,' said the man. 'Don't you want to examine it?' 'Heavens!' he shouted. 'Give it back to me! I didn't know it was a voucher. I thought it was an affidavit.'"

TO "ARGONAUT" SUBSCRIBERS.

The fire did not interrupt the publication of the "Argonaut." Every number has been posted to our mail subscribers, with the exception of those in the burnt district of San Francisco. These latter are requested to send their NEW ADDRESSES to the Argonaut Mailing Clerk, 25 Brown Avenue, San Jose.

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Club and Personal Gossip.

The San Francisco clubs made homeless by the fire are rapidly finding temporary quarters. The Bohemian Club has been housed at the residence of J. C. Wilson, 2171 Pacific avenue, for more than a week past. The Pacific Union Club has secured the Boyd residence at Washington and Octavia streets, and will make its temporary residence there. Meanwhile, the members of these clubs are being made to feel at home at the Cosmos Club, Sutter and Octavia, the only club of prominence which still has its old quarters.

Colonel A. G. Hawes, the insurance man, and member of the Bohemian Club, was seen on the street last week carrying in his hand his only salvage from the fire, the only relic of a collection of curios that had cost him upwards of $5,000. The salvage was a Mohamedan scimitar with Arabic inscriptions on the blade and a valuable jade handle for which Colonel Hawes paid 700 rupees in Calcutta.

"The Family" has opened its club doors again at 2360 Washington street, the former home of William L. Gerstle. The managers announce that inside of a week they will have a table d'hôte service.

The new clubhouse of the Pacific Union Club on Post and Stockton streets was burned to the ground, and the members have temporary quarters in the Alexander Boyd residence, on the corner of Washington and Octavia street. As the club owns the land, it will be necessary either to levy a heavy assessment for rebuilding, or to give over the land to the holders of the bonds and to lease quarters.

The Holluschickie Club and the Cosmos Club are the only two remaining club houses now left in San Francisco.

The officers of the Olympic Club have reconsidered the proposition of hiring the Hobart house on Van Ness avenue. Those in control of the house wished the club to put the building in repair, besides paying a large rental. This the club has refused to do.

On the Kdönprinz Wilhelm, which arrived on May 2nd at New York from Bremen, were fully 100 residents of San Francisco, who have lost heavily through the earthquake disaster. Many of them are prominent residents of San Francisco, who went to Europe on the outgoing trip of the Kronprinz and returned on the same ship, after hearing of the devastation. Several of them know that they have lost almost everything; others are still uncertain about their losses. Among the delegation was Jeremiah Lynch, a former State Senator of San Francisco, who, according to his belief, has lost a large sum. Moses A. Gunst, former Police Commissioner of San Francisco, was another of the delegation, which also included Lawrence McCreary, a prominent polo player of San Francisco; Mrs. James McNab, Mr. and Mrs. William Lewis, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Abrams, John Boyd, Albert Lansberg, Daniel Roth and Mrs. Roth, H. T. Teschemacher, son of a former Mayor of San Francisco, O. Brunner and W. P. Redington.

Louis A. Robertson, the poet, was helpless in his Post-street lodgings long after the disaster, imprisoned by locomotor ataxia. Friends carried him safely to the hospital at the Presidio when fire attacked his dwelling, and of all his literary possessions only the uncompleted manuscript of the revision of his Aztec drama "Montezuma" was saved. Later the stricken poet was taken to the City and County Hospital. There on the register you may read: "Louis A. Robertson, poet and dramatist, ward D, bed 10."

The death is announced on May 2nd of Ada Frances Reardon, widow of the late Judge T. B. Reardon. The deceased lady was a Miss Cowles, and was a sister of Mrs. Joseph D. Redding.

Washington society turned out in great force May 3rd in aid of the San Francisco sufferers at "Friendship," the country home of John R. McLean. There was an open-air performance of "Stephen and Chloe," a pastoral play by Mrs. Clifford Barney. There was fortune telling and gypsies and singing girls following hand organs, etc. As the swell set had undertaken the affair, the proceeds are expected to be large.

Major-General A. E. Bates, retired, has left Washington for San Francisco, where he is to assist in organizing and perfecting the system of auditing government accounts.

William Keith, the landscape artist, sustained a great loss in the recent fire, but takes his misfortune in a very philosophical manner. He says: "I lost all my pictures except a few; perhaps about twenty small ones were saved by friends. This was the accumulation of forty years of work. This is an awful loss. I had quite a number of pictures ready to be delivered. Among these was a picture of Jacob Schiff of New York. I can do more work in my studio here in Berkeley than when I was in the city. So many people came to see me there that I was considerably hindered."

Herman Oelrichs, went to Chicago on a scrap of paper, roughly torn, two inches square, but upon it in leadpencil were written these words: "Pass Herman Oelrichs and servant to Chicago upon all lines, this paper to serve in lieu of tickets.—E. H. Harriman." "I went to Oakland Tuesday morning," explained Mr. Oelrichs, "and there I saw Ned Harriman. 'I want to go to New York,' said I, 'and my money is all in the debris-covered cauls.' 'Take this paper,' Ned replied. Mr. Oelrichs said: "It was heaven and hell combined in San Francisco to produce chaos. Wednesday evening I went to take charge of Mrs. Eleanor Martin's house, 2040 Broadway. She is the mother of my niece's husband, Peter Martin, and is the Mrs. Astor of San Francisco. Thursday morning a squad of regulars came by, and I asked them to quarter in the house. I entertained sixty men and eleven officers the first six days." Mr. Oelrichs had fitted up apartments in the St. Francis Hotel packed with curios and rarities to the extent of $30,000. These were all burned.

Ward McAllister, the San Francisco lawyer and clubman, who has been missing since April 18th, was finally located in the Napa county hospital. His cousin, Hall McAllister, offered a reward of $100 for information concerning him.

George F. Marye, Jr., who has been living in Washington, D. C., since December with his family, at their home on Connecticut avenue, was one of the first Californians to start for San Francisco after hearing the terrible news.

Rudolph Spreckels has been elected president of the First National Bank, to succeed S. G. Murphy.

The "Burlingame set" has been among the heaviest losers in the San Francisco disaster. John Parrott and his family have retired to their 34,000-acre ranch at Chico and cancelled a trip to Europe. Charles W. Clark's house, the old Hobart home, went down in the crash and will have to be rebuilt. Eugene DeSabra was hard hit on un-insurable property. It is said that he may postpone the erection of his new $100,000 mansion. George Howard and J. H. P. Howard also cancelled European trips, as did Mrs. A. B. Ford, who had booked passage for a visit to her aged father, Sir Sidney Waterlow, in London.

Geo. F. Beveridge arrived from Mazatlan on the last steamer and gives a most startling account of how the news reached the Mexican town. "We—Colonel Daniel Burns, Ernest Stent, Senator Voorhies and myself—were enjoying a game of bridge when a messenger brought information that San Francisco had been totally destroyed by an earthquake. We lost no time in reaching the telegraph office and tried to wire to our families. We sent telegrams all over the country and waited in suspense for our answers. Receiving no replies to our various united efforts, in desperation we wired to New York, only to receive the startling announcement that '300,000 people had been killed by the earthquake and General Funston had asked permission to have the dead buried in the sea.' For that telegram we paid $56."

Rev. Dr. John Hemphill and his bride (nee Bessie Thornton), who were quietly married last week, are residing at their home on Fillmore street near Calvary Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Hemphill has long been pastor. Calvary Church was moved from its old location on Union Square (where the St. Francis Hotel now stands), about five years ago, and the present handsome stone edifice was erected under Dr. Hemphill's immediate supervision. It is one of few churches in San Francisco that stood the earthquake shock without serious damage.

Dr. Emmet Rixford lost his valuable library, his office furnishings, and his house on the corner of California and California streets. The house was dynamited and the ground opened in the very spot where he had buried some of his greatest treasures, which were burned.

Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Howell are guests of the A. S. Baldwins at their home in Presidio Terrace. The Howells lost all they had in their apartment at the St. Dunstan. Mrs. Howell's wedding gifts were in the ruins. Mr. Howell did manage, however, to collect a great deal of the silver they owned and they put it in a large package. In some unaccountable way a truck ran over the precious burden and much of it was destroyed.

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander and family have arrived at the Up-lands, San Mateo, from New York.

Leon Sloss and family are now on the Atlantic bound for home, and are expected to arrive here next week. Their return was advanced several weeks by the fire.

At a meeting of the Crocker Estate Company, composed of members of the Crocker family, it was decided to rehabilitate the properties of the company in this city as soon as George Crocker, who is in New York, shall have been consulted. Among the properties that are to be rebuilt on better lines are the Crocker Building, Sloane Building, Cosmopolitan and the Belden block.

The engagement has been announced of Miss May Scott of Alameda and Ernest McCandlish. Miss Scott is a daughter of George W. Scott of the firm of Scott & Van Arsdale. Mr. McCandlish is well known as a singer, being a prominent member of the Orpheus Club.

The California Relief Association of New York sent out three carloads of clothing for distribution. Miss Del Mar, as chairman of the California Artists' Relief Committee, announced that a sale of paintings, sculpture and objects d'art of various kinds contributed by artists would take place as soon as possible. Among the contributors already promised are Messrs. Weir, Peixotto, Wiggins, Bailann, Dangerfield, Saint-Gaudens, Brush, Dessar, McChesney, La Farge and Cox. Homer Davenport has contributed 1,000 of his original cartoons. Emil Carlson is president of the committee. He was formerly head of the San Francisco School of Design.

Among those at the New York hotels last week were Mr. and Mrs. Francis Carolan, who are guests at the St. Regis. H. A. Richardson of Santa Barbara is at the Waldorf-Astoria. At the Seville are Mr. and Mrs. M. Hussey, H. Hussey and Miss Hussey of San Francisco. Others from San Francisco last week were Mr. and Mrs. J. Tobin, at the York; Mr. and Mrs. W. Cope, at the Algonquin; J. Kirfe and Miss Kirfe, at the Gerard; Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Wendt, at the Herald Square. Los Angeles people in New York last week included Mr. and Mrs. J. Manerth, the Misses Manerth, and Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Swanwick, at the St. Denis; Mrs. E. B. Stewart, Mrs. J. I. Hall, and Miss Barnum, at the Imperial; and Dr. and Mrs. J. B. Rogers, at the Gilsey.

Among the San Franciscans hooked to embark from New York last week were: Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Berendsen and family, Mr. and Mrs. A. Cryer, Mr. and Mrs. Flsig, Martin Gulch, Martin Gastman, Miss Elsie Hinz, the Misses Koenig, Louis Lehr, Mrs. Stanesich, Mr. and Mrs. Milan G. Stanesich, Mr. and Mrs. Bernhard Blumenthal, Miss May Blumenthal, R. Bocqueraz, Mr. and Mrs. A. Gartenlaub, Mrs. J. Downey Harvey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Lipman, M. Mendelson, Miss Edith Mendelson, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Oxnard, Mr. and Mrs. G. Valverde, Mr. and Mrs. George Sale, P. Sale, R. S. Sale, the Misses Sale, Mr.

and Mrs. Julius Fay and family, Mr. and Mrs. Berthald Brommel, Mrs. Marie Gessler, Edwin Gessler, Miss Mathilde Meyer, Mrs. E. Schultz, Miss Martha Schultz and V. Carter-West.

Some well-known people on Europe-bound liners last week were Prince Andre Poniatowski, Mrs. Ogden Mills, Miss Beatrice Mills, Miss Gladys Mills and Mrs. William S. Cowles.

Recent cable advices say that Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Spreckels were at the Hotel Ritz in Paris. Other San Franciscans in Paris were: Mrs. P. Coleman, Mrs. E. K. Latham and the Misses Latham, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Pierce, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Wellman, Mrs. J. K. Hobbs, Mrs. H. Dutard and Mrs. W. Coleman. Paris arrivals from other California cities include: Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Haskins of Los Angeles, Mrs. John P. Jones and Miss Georgine Jones of Santa Monica and Mrs. Richard Wylie of Napa.

Two weddings of more than usual interest took place last week at Washington. Miss Marie McKenna, daughter of Justice Joseph McKenna of the Federal Supreme Court, became the bride of Davenport Brown of Boston, and Miss Adele Greely, daughter of General and Mrs. Greely, was married to Rev. Charles Lawrence Adams of Easthampton, Mass. In the absence of General Greely, who is on duty at San Francisco, the bride was escorted to the chancel by her elder brother, John Nesbit Greely.

An unofficial accounting of the losses sustained by the members of the California Club show that of the 500 enrolled more than 200 have lost all their possessions through fire. At the regular meeting held May 1st., it was voted to have all dues lapse for an indefinite period. Mrs. Aylett Cotton, the retiring president, will pass the gavel over to Mrs. J. W. Orr, the newly elected executive, at the end of this month, when the annual meeting will be held. The Hibernia Bank held the mortgage upon the handsome new clubhouse at 1750 Clay street, just burned. At the time the loan was negotiated the site was valued at $12,500. This and the building to be erected was regarded by the bank as good security for a loan of $25,000. The amount was further secured by an insurance of $18,000 in a Philadelphia company.

The 138th exhibition of the London Royal Academy opens on Monday, May 7th. Orin Peck of San Francisco has two large canvasses which are excellently placed. His success is more sensational, because few of the London critics ever heard of him before. Some think his training was French, while others suppose him to be a pupil of Hitchcock. All are wrong, for he studied figure painting in Munich and landscape painting from nature. His subjects are a Bavarian garden and the priestly ceremony of blessing flowers at Santa Barbara, Cal.

The directors of the Olympic Club announced yesterday that they had secured the Eugene Lent house, 1050 Eddy street, opposite Jefferson square, as the new home for the club and that in all probability they would take possession in ten days. The directors decided to fix the dues at $1 a month, pending the erection of the new clubhouse on the old Post-street site.

The Union League Club closed yesterday a year's lease of the I. W. Hellman residence at the corner of Sacramento and Franklin streets and the privilege was given of extending the lease another year if desired. Prosper Reiter, formerly of the Palace Hotel, has been engaged as steward and manager and the club will serve luncheon and dinner as of yore. Members of other clubs without a home will be made welcome at the Union League.

President George H. Pippy declares that when the Union League Club's debts are paid and the insurance collected, there will be a balance to the good of $50,000.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin, who left for New York en route to Europe a few days before the earthquake, have returned to the Coast and are at their Burlingame home.

Mrs. John R. Jarboe is at her place near Santa Cruz.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Aikin have gone to their country home at La Jata, near Howell Mountain, for three months.

Dr. H. J. Stewart has not left San Francisco, and intends to remain here. He will soon open his musical studio again, his former location at 1105 Bush street having been destroyed by fire.

Miss Frances Stewart is visiting at the home of Mrs. Isaac L. Requa, in Piedmont.

Sir Henry Howarth, who is retiring from Parliament, wrote a history of the Mongols, which led to a strange conversation as he was escorting a lady to dinner one evening. "I understand, Sir Henry, that you are fond of dogs; so am I!" "Dogs, madam? I really must plead guilty; I know nothing at all of them!" "Indeed! And they told me you had written a famous history of Mongrels!"

LITERARY NOTES.

Los Angeles Public Library.

San Francisco's catastrophe has put a new and greater responsibility on the Los Angeles Public Library, in the opinion of Librarian Charles F. Lummis. He has determined to ask for an appropriation of $150,000 for next year to meet this responsibility.

"Here is a very vital thing," said Mr. Lummis. "As near as I can learn, the libraries of the city of San Francisco have been practically destroyed by fire. Los Angeles must now relieve the intellectual hunger of the afflicted metropolis. The San Francisco libraries were depended upon not only by San Francisco and the universities at Berkeley and Palo Alto, but also by the students and industrial leaders of Oregon, Washington and in fact the whole Northwest for reference. The Los Angeles Library is practically the only considerable library of reference west of Denver. The reference library is different from the ordinary public library. People can get along without novels, but the reference library is a workshop which no professional man can afford to own complete for himself. Los Angeles is now the only place that can supply the source of reference. Architects will come here from the north for documents to help them rebuild San Francisco, or will send for them. The advanced students of the two universities will need assistance to gain their degrees and will wish to borrow books from us for the next two or three years. Appropriations here have been cut down to the lowest cent, limiting us to less than $10,000 for the purchase of all books. It will require $70,000 to run this library next year on the most ordinary basis. We will have to increase the number of our reference books, the racks to hold them, the staff to handle them; we will have to make extensive and somewhat expensive arrangements for inter-library loans—sending under proper safeguards to the small libraries of the North loan reference books for temporary use. We are in honor bound to provide thousands of special reference books for the architects, engineers and mechanics who will rebuild the Pacific metropolis, and for the large number of university students in the North. We ought to double our original reference stock. The Los Angeles Public Library eight years ago had but 48,000 volumes and most of them were novels and picture books. Today there are 123,000 volumes in the racks. The San Francisco Public Library had only 126,000, according to their report of last June. The other two institutions had about 70,000 each. If all those books have been destroyed, the gravity of the situation can be appreciated."

The unique and magnificent roof garden of the Los Angeles Public Library is the only one of the kind in America. There are 320 feet of rose hedges in this roof garden; sixty feet of heliotrope; sixty feet of geraniums; a vine-clad arbor eighty feet long, sixteen feet wide and ten feet high. In the center of the garden is a circular fountain ten feet in diameter. The roof garden area is 6400 square feet. The building is centrally located, is absolutely fireproof throughout; is faced with the finest white glazed terra cotta and drawn brass window sills and frames, with modern side-wall ventilators, two Otis plunger elevators, the first high-speed passenger elevators of this kind to be installed on this Coast; automatic sprinkler system and more net window glass to the amount of floor space than any library building in the world. There are 240 feet of ten-foot windows facing west on Hill street; 240 feet facing east, and 380 feet of ten-foot windows facing on the central light well, all this to 20,000 square feet of floor space.

San Francisco Public Library.

Librarian George T. Clark of the Public Library announces from headquarters, 2435 Sacramento street, that about 40,000 books were saved—a good working collection of standard reading matter, reference works and fiction. All books are being received at the branch libraries, 2435 Sacramento street, Sixteenth and Market streets, 2664 Mission street, and Fourth avenue and Clement street, Richmond district; also at the several deposit stations in the outlying districts. Books in the hands of borrowers should be returned as above.

The library trustees will meet and endeavor to effect an immediate resumption of the service, so that residents may, during the enforced leisure of day or evening, have reading matter to entertain them. This will be of invaluable service, particularly as the Public is the only lending library left, the Mechanics'-Mercantile and the Booklovers' having been wiped out.

Mechanics'-Mercantile Library.

With $150,000 cash in sight and good credit on which to borrow money, the trustees of the Mechanics' Institute are prepared to rebuild the library building and gather a new collection of books. "If our insurance is paid, as I have no doubt it will be," said Rudolph J. Taussig, president of the institute, recently, "we will at once put the money in books. This, with other funds we have on hand, will give us a library worth $150,000. Our new building will go up as soon as arrangements can be made for it, and we have decided that it will be the best policy to use our credit for this purpose. Unless the business center of the city should move up town, which seems very unlikely, no better location for a library than our Post-street lot could be found. The subject of rebuilding the Mechanics' Pavilion will also receive our early consideration, though at meetings of the trustees the chief matter now discussed is the new library. Of course, it will be impossible to replace some of the volumes that have been lost, especially a part of the collection acquired from the Mercantile Library, with its rare old editions and valuable records. But we are in first-class financial condition, and will not rest on our oars until the new library is at least as good as the old." A temporary library building will be erected on the Pavilion lot.

Strife among the heads of departments of McClure's Magazine has been going on for several weeks. It has now reached the point where it is practically certain the staff of the magazine will be thoroughly reorganized. Miss Ida M. Tarbell, Lincoln J. Steffens and Ray Stannard Baker will probably sever their connection with the magazine. No one connected with McClure's is willing to talk for publication, but it is learned on excellent authority the real source of all the trouble has been a difference of opinion as to who was or should be the real editor of McClure's Magazine. S. S. McClure, the president of the company, has decided notions on this subject. "I am editor of McClure's Magazine," he declared last week. "I have been its editor since its incorporation, and I shall continue to be its editor as long as I live." McClure resented the suggestion that the President's recent speech about "Muck Raking" and "Muck Rakers" had in any way affected his views of what a magazine ought to be or had any influence on the incidents that have led to the disagreements in the office of McClure's.

The third and final draft of the bill to codify the copyright laws of the United States is practically completed and will be submitted to Congress by the copyright commission in about ten days. Since the conference held some weeks ago in the library of Congress, a complete redraft of the proposed laws has been made. This has been submitted to representatives of all the interests and has met with their approval.

The London Times announces that it will offer some 600,000 new books for sale at prices that might make a dry-goods shop blush for shame. The best copyright novels will pass over the counter at about 20 cents each, and certain substantial volumes that have been sold at one pound net will go at 18 pence. The Times modestly disclaims any intention of making money by the scheme, but proposes to benefit the public by forcing the publishers to lower their prices.

A Tartar Times, a semi-weekly newspaper, published in Orenburg, Russia, and having a circulation in the southern part of that country and in Asia as far as eastern Turkestan, is a fact almost startling to those to whom the word Tartar simply suggests a raiding nomad. Its editor, says Arminius Vambervy, in a communication to the London Times, is a highly educated Tartar gentleman, Mohammed Fatih by name, whose aim is to win over his countrymen to modern civilization and to prepare them for liberty and constitutional rights.

SAN FRANCISCO!

She sits upon her seven hills,
All bare and blackened now,
A mourning veil of sable smoke
Obscures her stricken brow.
She weeps above her dead that lie
Uncounted in the gloom.
With ashes for a winding-sheet
And cinders for a tomb.

Where rows of charred and crumbling walls
Stand roofless to the sky,
For bread and water ceaselessly
Her homeless thousands cry;
With earthquake shocks that rent the rock
In fissures gaping wide,
And fire and famine, too, behold
A city crucified!

There's crape upon the Golden Gate
And sorrow in the land,
And all the nations of the earth
Extend a helping hand;
From East and West and North and South,
The long relief-trains go,
For every heart in every breast
Is melted by her woe.

But from the ruins at her feet,
Lo she will rise again;
The spirit bold of Forty-nine
Still burns in heart and brain.
A San Francisco newly built
And grander than before
Will crown with palaces of trade
Her seven hills once more.
—Minna Irving in Leslie's Weekly.

THE STRICKEN CITY.

I.
They will build it great, they will build it strong,
Its streets the children of men will throng;
It will be superb with its lofty domes
And its marble halls and its stately homes,
But never again can it ever be
The city I journeyed far to see.

II.
They will make it great, they will make it fair,
And fortune-seekers will gather there;
Its wharves will call to the wide world's fleets
And traffic will roar through its handsome streets,
But the hands of men can never restore
The far-famed city that is no more.

III.
They will leave no trace of its flame-swept hills
Of the twisted beams or the blackened sills,
And over the haunts where vice was bred
The realm of bountiful trade will spread,
But, however they build and whatever the cost,
They can never give back what the world has lost.

IV.
They will build with hope, they will build with pride,
They will build it long, they will build it wide;
With quenchless courage and splendid zeal
They will build a marvel of stone and steel,
But the city that stood by the wide,
blue bay
Forever and ever is swept away!

V.
They will build it, strong, they will build it well,
And a greater city than that which fell
Will gleam on the hills that are desolate,
And riches will stream through its Golden Gate;
But no man ever again may see
The city that was and has ceased to be!

—S. E. Kiser.

"BESIDE THE GOLDEN GATE."

I.
That fateful day the sea did take
His silver trumpet up to wake
The Mistress of the Keys,
His beauteous bride, who sleeping lay
Beside the door that guards the bay,
Amid her argosies,
And blew one long, sweet-cadenced call
Far echoing from Sierra's Wall:
"O Favorite of Fate!
The April dawn is in the skies,
The world hath need of thee; Arise!
Beside the Golden Gate."

II.
She rose; a song upon her lips,
And looked upon the lordly ships
Which round her lay at rest,
Which brought o'er many a thousand miles,
From far-off continents and isles,
The wealth of East and West;
And this she sang: "I take my toll
All roads that run, all waves that roll,
Their tribute, soon or late,
Shall bring to heap around my knees
The store from all the lands and seas
Beside the Golden Gate."

III.

Stalwart she stood, in splendid bloom
When on her fell the stroke of doom;
Her song unfinished died.
She saw her strong foundations rent,
An earthquake, like blind Samson bent
The pillars of her pride.
Her tallest turrets rocked and reeled,
Her staggering beifrles clamorous
pealed,
While flames in fiendish hate
Flogged thousands with their fiery scourge,
Chanting the burning city's dirge,
Beside the Golden Gate.

IV.

But far above that fierce uproar,
From every clime, from every shore,
Rang out one clarion cry:
"Spike all the switches, spin the wheels,
Speed all the steamers, steer the keels,
Lest San Francisco die."
Loaded with friendly help, they flew
O'er tracks of steel, o'er tides of blue,
From every town and State.
She heard; and raised her bleeding head,
"Thank God for human love," she
said,
Beside the Golden Gate.
—Robert McIntyre, in Los Angeles Times.

SAN FRANCISCO'S FATE.

With the wreck of her shattered glory,
Desolate, dire, complete;
With her landmarks grim and hoary
Strewn at her bleeding feet;
With the golden fruits of doing
Undone in a single day;
With the madden'd fates pursuing—
The butt of their ghastly play—
With misery dark and fearful
Borne upon every breeze;
With her children wan and tearful
Clinging around her knees,
While famine leers at the portal
And misery stalks within,
She turns with a will immortal
Her renaissance to begin.

Here's strength to the new-born city!
Here's hope to the valiant throng!
The world's great throbs of pity
Is turned to applauding song.
On! On! May thy dauntless spirit
Survive the ills of fate!
May a grander San Francisco
Rise Queen of the Golden Gate.
—John J. Wall.

THE GOLDEN CITY.

I.
Stricken she lies at her Western gate,
Bleeding and bruised and desolate.
Queen of the beckoning West, now charred
To a blackened heap and a smouldering shard,
Where the waves of the peaceful Pacific heave.
Smiling she stood but yester-eve,
Welding together, in golden clasp,
East and West in a friendly grasp.
Studding the sheen of the shimmering seas
With flitting and white-winged argo-
sies,
Standing where ocean her fair feet spent,
Gazed she afar to the Orient.
On! little she dreamed of the doom that fell,
Of the sickening shock and the re-king hell!
Stunned and bruised and the sport of Fate,
O, widowed Queen of the Golden Gate!

II.

Speed, Speed, O East, in helpful quest
Of thy stricken sister that bows in the West,
O North! O South! aloud she calls
From fiery flames and funeral palls,
Draining her chalice of rue and myrrh;
Speed, speed to her side and comfort her!

Give to the wealth of your pleanished stores

To the smitten who stand at your Western doors.

Far fling the cry from every home,
"O stricken sister, we come, we come!"

III.

Standing again at thine ocean's marge
I see through the mists a city large,
And stately and fair in the sun's bright sheen!

Thou risest again, O Western Queen!
For thy dauntless darling and sunlit
skies

Have brought thee ten thousand argo-
sies!

Rich laden with spoil of the mystic
East,

Thou spread'st thy board for the nation's feast.

And she who yester was desolate,
And scarred and stunned at her Golden Gate,

Now towers her pinnacles, spires and halls

And builds up again her imperial walls.
Fairer than ever thou sittest, O Queen,
With brodered garment, brave and serene!

For sea and Sierra, and valleys between

Empurpled with grape, and meadow green,

Pour into thy lap their bounteous
store,

And crown thy brow as they did of yore!

On the arm of thy God let thy future
lean;

Arise in thy might from thy dust, O Queen!

Fate.

"The sky is clouded, the rocks are bare;

The spray of the tempest is white in
the air;

The winds are out with waves at play,
And I shall not tempt the sea today.

"The trail is narrow, the wood is dim,
The panther clings to the arching limb;
And the lion's whelps are abroad at play.

And I shall not join in the chase today."

But the ship sailed safely over the sea,
And the hunters came from the chase
in glee;

And the town that was bulid upon a rock

Was swallowed up in the earthquake shock.

A Fallen City.

The following beautiful poem, written by John Greenleaf Whittier, after the great fire which swept Chicago in October, 1871, seems especially inspiring in this disastrous hour of San Francisco's history. It carries with it a message of hope, which may well be grasped by the homeless and forlorn of our stricken city:

Men said at vespers: "All is well!"
In one wild night the city fell;
Fell shrines of prayer and marts of gain

Before the fiery hurricane.

On three-score spires the sunset shone,
Where ghastly sunrise looked on none,
Men clasped each other's hands and
said:

"The City of the West is dead!"

Brave hearts who fought in slow retreat

The fiends of fire from street to street,
Turned powerless to the blinding glare
The dumb defiance of despair.

A sudden impulse thrilled each wire
That signalled round that sea of fire;
Swift words of cheer, warm heart throbs came;

In tears of pity died the flame!

From East, from West, from South, from North,

The messages of hope shot forth,
And underneath the severing wave
The world full-handed rushed to save.

Fair seemed tha old; but fairer still Tha new, the dreary void shall fill
With dearer bones than those o'er-thrown,

For love shall lay each corner-stone.

Rise, Stricken City! From thee throw
The asben sackcloth of thy woe;
And build as to Amphion's strain,
To songs of cheer, thy walls again!

How shriveled in thy hot distress
The primal sin of selfishness!
How instant rose, to take thy part,
The Angel in the human heart!

Ah, not in vain the flames that tossed
Above thy dreadful holocaust;
The Christ again has preached through thee

The Gospel of Humanity!

Then lift once more thy towers on high,

And fret with spires the western sky
To tell that God is yet with us
And love is still miraculous.

CURRENT VERSE.

Paraphrase of Byron's.

Biremes have traversed you, enchanted galleys,
Steam-driven bulks. Of all sea-faring kind,
Countless that climb your hills and rugged valleys,
Impress, O sea, who ever leaves behind.

Night on your bosom sets the stars
a-quiver;

Back to the morn the morning's smile
you throw;

You draw the heart and secret of the river,

Yet your dread secret, O sea, who shall know?

Earth's daisy-printed coverchief en-folding.

Tenderly marks where hushed her children lie;

But the dear lives yon cool vast depths are holding

Who reads, O sea, beneath your mirrored sky?

—Margaret Merington.

The Watchword.

Give of your mass of gold,
Send to the prostrate West
Some of that wealth untold
Dugged from her virgin breast.

Give!

Give of your meager store,
Send from your cupboard bare
Out to the wasted shore,
If but a pittance share.

Give!

Give of your brother heart
Quick of its golden glow.
Let the love cargo start
Out to the field of woe.

Give!

Give of your health and strength,
Give of your helping hand.
Over its breadth and length
Vieing with all the land.

Give.

Give of the healing light
Quick to the souls that grope;
Send to the hearts affright
Messages filled with Hope.

On the Ranch.

I. The Last of Winter.
Oh, not for us the primrose faint, the south wind's hush-a-low Down shining aisles of the beech-trees that knew us years ago!
Here there's a long, long silence and the dumbly falling snow.

The prairie rolls away, away, the hills are covered deep,
The water springs in the coulees are sleeping a frozen sleep,
The sun-dogs glimmer for a storm;
how long shall winter keep?

Among the hungry cattle 'tis weary work to ride
And see the weak-kneed mothers go stumbling side by side, Muzzling under the crusted snow for where new grass may hide.

There's not a blade of green yet, the last year's growth is rank.
Sodden and brown beneath the snow on hill and bottom and bank, Every horse is a brute this month, and every man is a crank.

Only the evening hours are good, when two can sit apart
Within the light of the fire they lit,
cursing the winter's smart;
The hand is warm in another hand, the heart is safe with a heart.

II. The First of Spring.
There was a sound of whistling wings
over the house last night,
And the wild duck dropped in the creek
below, resting upon his flight;
Now the mallard with his emerald neck is swimming round in the light.

A warm wind from the mountains came pouring like a tide,
The strong Chinook has broken the heart of winter's icy pride,
And the snow has all gone up like smoke from a prairie sunny and wide.

Here are gray buds of the crocus, but shut and slivery dim,
Along the creek there are mouse-ears
on the willows red and slim;
A blue tit feeds there upside down in the manner approved by him.

Hill snows melt and rush in stream-
e bubbling and dark as wine;
Cattle are drifting out of the hills—
well do we know that sign!
And soft clouds blowing across the blue have a beauty half divine.

New grass and sweet will soon be here,
and the patient herd grow strong,
They will forget the cruel frost and all the winter's wrong;
None can be glad as we are glad unless they have waited long.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Theatricals on the Coast.

The theatrical situation in San Francisco is paralyzed. Only one theater escaped the general destruction. That was the Chutes, opposite Golden Gate Park. It is in good condition, and the announcement is made that it will reopen as soon as electric lights are burning and a dependable car service can be established. The theater will play the Orpheum attractions.

The Orpheum people announce the probable construction on the old site of a temporary theater with a foundation capable of holding a fireproof building. Just when the theater is to be finished is problematical. Many other theatrical managers announce the rebuilding of their amusement places. The Tivoli, the Alcazar, the Columbia and Fischer's will be playing to large audiences again within nine months. It is not likely that the Grand Opera House will be rebuilt. This is on account of its rather out of the way location, isolated from the theatrical district.

Almost all the larger companies booked for California have canceled their dates. In this way the entire West will this year suffer from a dearth of first-class shows, for California was the mecca of all of them.
They relied on the profits of their engagements in the cities of the Golden State to offset the expense of the long overland tour. Cities as far east as Denver will be affected in consequence and as far north as Seattle and Tacoma.

In Oakland the Bell theater has already reopened. It is playing to crowded houses. The Liberty, badly damaged by the earthquake, is being repaired in a hurry, and announces its reopening about the 15th of May. The MacDonough will light its footlights again the first of the week, and the Elleford Company, San Jose favorites, will tread the boards. The Empire in Oakland was completely wrecked by the earthquake, but the Novelty was only slightly injured and will soon be playing to audiences. There is no doubt all the theaters will be well patronized by large crowds, who will in this way endeavor to relieve the strain and tension resulting from the recent fire and earthquake.

The theatrical situation is at present very much in the air. Three months from now, ten cent shows may be doing a fair business, but it will be a long time before a first-class theater can hope to open here with any kind of success. The theatrical business of the State has been dealt a very severe blow. Many of the first-class shows will not come out to the coast for some time, since they will have to sacrifice the San Francisco stand, usually the objective point of all coast tours.

Announcement made from the president's office of the State University is that Sarah Bernhardt will play in the Hearst Greek Theater on the afternoon of May 17th. Ten per cent of the proceeds of the performance are to go to the relief fund for the San Francisco refugees. The well-known classic drama "Phedre" will be presented.

The Alcazar Theater is to be revived in the unburnt district. Belasco and Mayer have secured a piece of property on the corner of, Sutter and Steiner streets and will erect a one-story fire-proof building. "We have secured permission from Mr. de Young, the owner of our old theater, to call the new building 'The Alcazar.'" Manager Belasco says. "All the old Alcazar favorites, including the bulk of the stock company, have been re-engaged and will present comedies as of yore. We expect to be running in about sixty days. Abe Edelman, the architect who designed the Belasco Theater in Los Angeles, is here from Los Angeles and will superintend the construction of the new building."

W. L. Greenbaum, who is handling the Bernhardt engagement, announces that the great actress and her company of 55 people are not at all daunted by the magnitude of the effort in the face of the disaster. She stated in New York that she had started for California and should keep to her plan in spite of earthquake and fire. Mme. Barnhardt will open on Monday night, May 15th, in Oakland at the Liberty playhouse, in La Sordere. On Tuesday, the 16th, she will give La Tosca, at the Wednesday matinee Camille and on Wednesday evening Sapho. All these performances will be given at the Liberty. On the afternoon of Thursday, May 18th, she will give Phedre at the Greek Theater at Berkeley.

Los Angeles is now the theatrical center of the Pacific Coast. Traveling companies playing in San Francisco, of course, returned as quickly as possible to New York. But the resident actors, and they were numbered by hundreds, have found Los Angeles a better haven than any other city.

End of the Opera Season.

Ernest Goerlitz, manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, returned to this city last week. He was met at the Oakland pier by Charles W. Strine, who was the San Francisco manager for the season which was so abruptly ended. Goerlitz stated that he was happy to report that every member of the company, two hundred and fifty strong, had been safely returned to New York.

"While the safe return of the entire company," said Goerlitz, "was a matter of general congratulation, the material losses of the organization resulting from the burning of the Grand Opera House will not fall short of a quarter of a million dollars. The complete equipment of the full tour repertoire of nineteen operas with their scenery, costumes, properties, electrical apparatus and all the music, which of itself is an almost invaluable item, was totally destroyed and will have to be replaced at an estimated cost of over $250,000.

"The insurance of this entire outfit, owing to the peculiarity of its construction, is only about $50,000. In addition to this, there is the loss of the preliminary local expenses, the enormous cost of transporting the company to and from the coast and the financial settlements with the artists, chorus, ballet, orchestra and staff."

The purpose of Goerlitz's return to San Francisco is to arrange the refunding of the advance sale for the unfulfilled portion of the company's engagement in San Francisco. Every dollar belonging to the public of San Francisco will be returned. It has been decided to open an office at a convenient location in the unburned district of the city, where all tickets presented or properly vouched for will be redeemed in full. Particulars will be announced in "The Argonaut" in due time.

The office will be kept open for thirty days.

New York's Next Opera Season.

It is really settled that New York is to have two grand opera houses in full blast next November to April. Mr. Conried will have a galaxy of stars such as even the Metropolitan Opera House has never seen, and his subscription list is the largest on record at this time of the year. And now comes Mr. Hammerstein with plans for a rival season at his new Manhattan Opera House, which alone would suffice a city less gluttonous, operatically speaking, than New York is. His performances are to begin on November 13th and last twenty weeks. The Conried performances do not begin till a week later—after the horse show.

Mr. Hammerstein's prospectus has six German operas—Gluck's "Armida," Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and "Fliegare," Plotow's "Martha," and Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" and "Prophete."

Besides these seven works by German composers there are in Mr. Hammerstein's list seven French operas—"Carmen," "Faust," "Mignon," "Fra Diavolo," "La Juive," "Romeo," and a stage version of Berlioz's "Faust," which will be of particular interest; and seventeen Italian operas—"Loreley," by Catalani; "Aida," "La Boheme," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Rigoletto," "Tosca," "La Traviata," "L'Elisir d'Amore," "Un Ballo in Maschera," "Puritani," "La Sonnambula," "La Favorita," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Ernani," and "I Pagliacci."

This preponderance of Italian opera is explained by the fact that Mr. Hammerstein has secured Melba and Bonci to head his forces. Then there is Edouard de Reszke, whom it will be a delight to hear again. Other singers engaged are the sopranos Gilbert-Lejeune, Mazurin, D'Arta, Tetrizzini, Trentini, Ferneti; the altos Bressler-Genell, Gaye, de Cisneros, Zaccaria; the tenors Dalmores, Bassi, Alcheffsky; the baritones and basses, Renaud, Sammarco, Ancona, Mandolfi, Brag, and Muguiroz. The conductors are to be the excellent Cleofante Campanni and Leonardo Campanari.

Richard Mansfield, the celebrated actor, has started a campaign for funds with which to rebuild San Francisco's famous Bohemian Club. Many actors of repute join him in the movement.

Imagine a whole continent that has never heard grand opera! Australia is in that predicament, according to the Sydney correspondent of the Musical Courier.

DEL MONTE OFFERS

Hotel Del Monte was very slightly injured by the recent disturbance, and is offering a welcome shelter to all San Franciscans. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

Whitewash.

[Inspired by Mr. Stephen Phillips' new poetical tragedy, which was understood, from preliminary announcements, to attempt "the rehabilitation of the character of Nero."]

Friends, Readers, Countrymen, lend me your ears!

I come to whitewash Nero, not to praise him.

His was the first of criminal careers

(Unless the lurid record of his years Wrongly portrays him).

Slain at the age of rising thirty-two,
He filled the Cup of Vice to overflowing;

Much that was better left unknown,
he knew

And what he didn't know, if tales be true,

Was not worth knowing.

But as a youth he was not wholly bad;
When he was crowned, men said to one another,

"By Jove! A worthy and a studious lad";

And so he was, until—oh passing sad!—

He lost his Mother!

That was the turning point. While she was there

He lived comparatively free from scandal;

He knew the sweetness of a Mother's care;

Felt the correcting arm, that did not spare

A Mother's sandal.

Who knows? Perchance, had she been near to guide,

His reign had been less lamentably shady;

But, on the morning of his regal pride,
With disconcerting suddenness, she died!

The poor old lady!

Oh, not to trespass on an orphan's grief,

'Twas from that time he took to paths of error

(Thinking, no doubt, that change would bring relief)

Made it a habit, and became, in brief,
A holy terror.

I say no more. But tho his deeds were dark

They hold a pathos that no crime can smother;

Young Nero would have doubtless made his mark

Had he not, in a mad, boyish lark Murdered his Mother!

—Punch.

A Song.

Sing a song of sixpence, a pocket full of rye,

Four-and-twenty key-holes dance before his eye;

When the door is opened, his wife begins to chide,

"Isn't this a pretty hour to let a fellow in."

—Life.

In Several States.

"O come with Me, my love," he said
"We'll seek some quiet, shady Del.
Where I can kiss a dainty Miss.
Ore, tell again of Cupid's spell

:"Tenn. times I love you, and I Wis.
You'd 'Ark. to me N. C. my heart
A-beating inwardly for you,
I swear from you Ill. never part."

"Oh, La.," said she, I'll Nev. Va. go.
I'll call Pa. Better let me be;
Besides, you only want my Mon.,
So don't get Ga. No Conn. D. C.?"
—Perrine Lambert, in Judge.

Tragedy of the Desert.

The elephant sat in the lemon tree,
A-swaying to and fro;
And a beautiful warbling song sang he
To the whale on the branob below—
Though a cold wind blew from the distant sea,
And the desert was deep in snow.

And this is the song that the elephant sung,

To the tenderly dreaming whale;
(For the month was May and the two were young,

And she loved his trunk as it swayed and swung
In the icy tropical gale—)

"Oh, come, my love, let us fly away
To a warmer clime than this,
On the palm-lined beaches of Baffin's Bay
Let us live in a lifelong bliss,
With no one to list to the words we say,
And no one to watch us kiss!"

But the whale was shy and she dropped her eye,
And she blushed a beautiful green;
And the elephant hopped from his perch on high
To the side of his bosom's queen;
And she heaved a sigh as he fluttered nigh,
Like a 30 h. p. machine.

Methods of Rebuilding San Francisco.

While there is no question that San Francisco will be rebuilt and that right speedily, there is much uncertainty as to the methods of rebuilding and the boundaries of business districts. It seems to be generally settled that steel-frame buildings stood the shock of the earthquake with practically no damage at all, and that they were much less injured by the fire than any other type of building. To such an extent has this impressed the minds of real estate owners that it is quite certain all who can will rebuild in steel-frame construction where the land is of such value or within such business boundaries as to justify the outlay.

Outside of these boundaries, as is but natural, land-owners will feel impelled to put up cheaper buildings. Here is where difficulties will arise—first, difficulties to the land-owners in deciding the type of building and construction; second, the character of the business which may grow up in the district where their land is situated. The municipal government is now permitting the erection, in any part of the city, of structures of wood, of corrugated iron, of galvanized iron, or of almost any material. The permission is merely a tacit one, however. No official authorization is granted and it is understood that at the expiration of a comparatively short period no buildings will be permitted which do not comply with the building laws formulated by the city.

What these new building laws will be is as yet doubtful. There is a marked difference of opinion as to limit of height. The Mayor and others seem inclined to confine the height of buildings to one and one-half times the width of the street on which they front. Architects and real estate owners incline to much greater heights. Doubtless the matter will result in a compromise, as is usual when there are divergent interests. A third element is composed of the gentlemen who are advocating the Burnham plan and the beautification of the city. They strongly urge a strict regulation of buildings, not only in height, but in other respects. They would have owners conform to certain architectural requirements, these to be formulated by a commission of architects. Thus there would be presented in the streets of San Francisco the same uniformity of facade to be observed on the boulevards of Paris, or on the Rue de Rivoli, for example.

A more modern instance is that to be noted in Vienna, much of which has been rebuilt since the destruction of the ancient ramparts. There is a beautiful group of buildings on one of the squares of Vienna, the central one of which is the City Hall. Extending for hundreds of feet to the right and to the left of this structure are other buildings of a uniform type of architecture, which lead up to and complement the central one. The effect is very beautiful and imposing. To the eye of the stranger it looks as if this magnificent pile of buildings composed a single municipal structure. But this is not the case. The City Hall occupies less than a third, probably, of the street frontage; the remaining buildings are the property of private individuals. They are occupied as apartment houses and for other purposes, but their outer aspect is architecturally identical with that of the town hall. The result is extremely effective from the standpoint of architectural beauty.

The land-owner in any American city, particularly in one which has just suffered so heavy a loss as San Francisco, does not feel inclined to give up his individual rights for purely municipal ornamentation. The spirit of individualism is much stronger in this country than in the Old World. But San Francisco has just received a very heavy blow, and she has had impressed upon her how helpless is the individual in the face of great public calamity; she now knows how vital it is that all of us should stand together. If the land-owners of San Francisco can yield some of their individual ideas at this time the result will make for a strong, safe and beautiful city. If each of them exercises his individual judgment, as was the case with the city's builders half a century ago, the effect will be measurably the same as in the city of the early fifties. The new San Francisco will not, of course, be constructed on the same lines; but, like the old city, it will probably be constructed on varying lines, and the effect will not make for either perpetuity or beauty.

These sentiments will doubtless sound distasteful to owners of land, who are imbued with the strong individualism characteristic of American land-owners. But there is another phase of the matter which possibly may appeal to them. Suppose we take a San Francisco city block 275 by 412 feet. Let us assume for purposes of argument that its six fifty-vara lots are divided into twelve building lots each 68 by 137 feet. Suppose that each of these twelve land-owners should construct a building, each man independent of the other. Suppose that each building should be modelled on the lines of the individual owner's taste, modified by those of his architect. Suppose each owner made his own excavations at his own time and in his own way. Suppose each owner prepared his own foundations at his own time and in his own way. Suppose that one owner dug down twenty feet for an ordinary building, his neighbor sixty feet for a sky-scraper. Suppose that each of the twelve owners obstinately refused to consent to any joint arrangement for light wells or light courts on the abutting rears of the buildings. What would be the result of such a course of action? Waiving all question of the architectural appearance of such a block of buildings, would it cost the twelve owners less or more? It would cost them infinitely more. Even if they utterly ignored all questions of architectural beauty or uniformity, co-operation would cost them very much less in purely material matters, such as digging the excavations and erecting the foundations.

Take the converse of the proposition. Suppose the twelve land-owners were to agree on uniform excavation and uniform construction of foundations. Even if they went no further than to let a single contract for the whole block, that alone would save them from 25 to 33 1-3 per cent on the cost of that part of the work. If they were indisposed to agree to a uniform architectural treatment of the facade, even in the rear a uniform system of treatment, with the resultant joint yards or light-wells, would add greatly to the value of their property as an income-bearing proposition, and would diminish the cost of internal and rear construction.

Here we have glanced at two stages of co-operative effort, and still have not touched the two vital questions of the height and of the architectural treatment of the facade. It is not probable that twelve men in San Francisco—or in any other American city—for the matter of that—could be made to agree on these points. But if they could only be made to see how much joint action in excavation and foundation would diminish the cost of covering their land with buildings, it might possibly lead to their consenting to a uniform scheme of architectural treatment.

The question of the boundaries of business and residence districts, of wholesale and retail districts, of up-town and down-town districts—all this is going to be a great gamble. It does not seem to us possible that the old lines of business boundaries will remain as they were before. But what the new ones are going to be no man can tell. Those who have the gift of foresight and who purchase or build in the chosen districts will profit largely by their action. Two pioneers, Adam and Kibbe, who many years ago purchased the tip of the gore opposite the Chronicle, out of this little triangle of land made a fortune.

Great fortunes will similarly be made in the new San Francisco. On the other hand, those who guess wrongly, and who put up costly buildings in districts which are destined to be deserted by the business for which they build, will find themselves destined to lose heavily. Great fortunes are to be made in the new San Francisco, but great fortunes are also destined to be lost.

The Silence of the Pulpit.

In the face of the great calamity that has come upon San Francisco one of the most striking incidents is the silence of the Pulpit. Twenty-five or thirty years ago unnumbered pulpiteers from countless pulpits would have thundered forth "I told you so." Every Boanerges, with voice of thunder and with loud-lunged anti-Babylonianisms would have apostrophized San Francisco as the Scarlet Woman sitting upon her many hills, puffed up with arrogance, flushed with pride, and drunken with the wine of lust. We would have been told that San Francisco was the wickedest city in the world; that the earthquake and the fire were the visitations of a justly offended God for the transgression of his ordinances; that as Sodom and Gomorrah, the evil cities of the plain, had been wiped out because there were not ten just men among them, so was San Francisco destroyed because there were only a few. In short, the stern and cruel Jehovah of the ancient Jews would have been held up to us by the old pulpiteers, instead of the less malevolent and more loving God of the modern clergymen.

People, however, have ceased to believe in the cruel and unjust Jehovah of the ancient Jews. They do not believe that God takes pleasure in smiting his helpless children. They do not believe that he turns the cruel forces of nature on hapless human beings to revenge himself upon them for transgressing laws, the breaking of which is due to the passions with which he himself created them, and which he himself could suppress within them, if he chose. In short, they no longer believe in the sulphur-and-brimstone and death-and-damnation discourses ladled out by the pulpiteers of a previous generation.

In the present juncture, however, the occupants of our modern pulpits have had very little to say. They have considered it unwise and inexpedient to assure the people that earthquakes are the revengeful acts of an offended God. Most of them have remained silent. Some of them have assured us in vague terms that such calamities lead to the "upbuilding of character." Others have dwelt upon such catastrophes as fostering "Charity, sympathy and benevolence" toward us in other communities. It is doubtless a good thing to inculcate these virtues in the minds and hearts of other communities, but we of San Francisco could readily refrain from educating others in this direction at so great a cost to ourselves. Other clergymen have dwelt upon this statement—with equal vagueness—that the Universe is ruled by God's laws, and that it is only by ignorance of his laws that we suffer. This would seem to imply that when we get wiser and know more about the laws of nature, we may be able to dodge earthquakes. But if God sends the earthquakes to the places where we are, would it not be impious to attempt to dodge them and thereby thwart the Divine will?

This is not intended to be disrespectful to the pulpit, but really under the circumstances we think those clerical gentlemen who were silent about the calamity played the wisest part.

The writer is not particularly pious, but he has observed that pious people just now are not particularly trustful. There have been a dozen or more lesser shocks since the big one of April 18th, and whenever a shock comes we have observed that the pious people always get outside before we do. They are not only more pious, but they sprout quicker. This lack of confidence on their part surprises and pains us. If we were more pious, we would feel more reposeful. People who sing "Rock of Ages, cleft for me" loudly and with much unction when in church, seem to have no taste for clefts in rocks in earthquake times.

Good Order Maintained in San Francisco.

One of the curious manifestations of the recent terrestrial, sociological and financial upheaval in San Francisco, has been the excellent order maintained. A month ago it would have been inconceivable that a community of nearly half a million people could suddenly be hurled into a primitive condition without reverting to primitive instincts. It might have been believed that these scores of thousands—of all ages, of all conditions, and of varying degrees of virtue or of vice—if suddenly thrown together, with all the safeguards of law and order removed, would find themselves infected with those reversionisms to barbarism which characterize the human race at such moments. But it did not seem to be so: on the contrary, there were scarcely any crimes, and few open manifestations of vice. Yet for weeks no civil or criminal courts have been held in San Francisco. When it is remembered that the daily grist of crime furnishes grinding for many mills of justice in ordinary times, this is remarkable.

What brought about this changed condition? Most people will ascribe it to the stern rule of the military. Doubtless this had much to do with it. We dwellers in a peaceful and stable Republic do not realize how powerful is the military arm. In the Old World the Army is called upon in every emergency: in the case of a great riot, a great fire, an inundation, an earthquake, an explosion, or a pestilence, the soldiers are at once called in: in the first case, to kill the living; in the latter case, to bury the dead. They are clothed with absolute power, and the docile European never lifts a protesting finger. But we free Americans do not feel the mighty power that is behind the military arm. We realize dimly that in times of war the Government has absolute control of us; that it may take a man and send him to the front; that if it uses his body on the firing line, it may use his property too if it sees fit. But since the War of 1812 no foreign enemy has set foot on American soil. The nearest approach to it was when the Confederate Army under General Lee invaded the soil of Pennsylvania, to be driven back after the bloody battles at Gettysburg. Hence it is that the necessity of enforcing military law is something so infrequent in this Republic as to seem extraordinary in American eyes.

But an object lesson in the power of the military arm has been furnished to San Francisco in the terrible weeks that have just passed. Many a well-to-do citizen has been ordered to remove garbage and to pile up bricks. Few resisted, and the treatment of the few who did deterred others from resistance. Doubtless the American citizens who, for the first time in their lives, were ordered to perform repulsive tasks against their will, will not soon forget the meaning of that stern phrase "martial law."

But there is another reason for the remarkable good order maintained in San Francisco during the past few weeks. It was a new regulation—one unique in the city's history. The measure to which we refer was the closing of the liquor saloons. For many weeks there has not been permitted to be sold in San Francisco a drop of liquor of any kind. Even in the drug stores it has been impossible to obtain liquor unless on the prescription of a physician. Even upon these documents the military authorities have looked askance, at times forbidding the sale of liquor even when prescribed by a physician. The enforced sobriety and the civic calm resulting from this order have amazed the State. The Chief of Police remarked that he did not believe San Francisco could be so peaceful a community under any circumstances, least of all the awful ones through which she had passed.

At the beginning of the third week, however, the thirst of the liquor-loving became too strong to be restrained any longer. As it was impossible to obtain liquor within the confines of San Francisco, they began seeking it elsewhere. The embargo on liquor was lifted in Oakland, and to that city the thirsty repaired. They returned from the hospitable drinking saloons of Alameda County saturated with liquor, thus successfully defying the anti-liquor ordinance of the San Francisco military authorities. Speedily the keepers of road-houses across the county line in San Mateo County became inspired with envy of the prosperous Oakland saloon-keepers, and passed the word throughout San Francisco that they were "Open for business." They too had been closed for a short time after the earthquake and fire. The first Sunday after this was known a crowd of many thousands of both sexes crossed the San Mateo County line, and after filling themselves with the vile booze of these roadside houses, returned to the City of San Francisco, poisoning the air with their foul breaths and making night hideous with their drunken cries.

The Chief of Police of San Francisco was powerless. He could not exercise any control over the San Mateo liquor dealers, and it was comparatively useless to punish the poor creatures whose drunkenness was the result of the liquor dealers' thrift. When the matter was reported to Military Headquarters, General Greeley did not consider himself restrained by the county lines which had terrified the San Francisco Chief of Police. He at once sent a strong military guard across the county line, admonished the saloon-keepers, shut up the saloon doors, and left guards in front of them to see that they were kept shut.

These direct methods of the Federal authorities, when brought into contact with county lines, are calculated to excite admiration among those used to the slow moving methods of inter-county and inter-state jurisdiction. We trust that General Greeley may not become involved in any trouble with the County of San Mateo, and that the county in question may not bring suit against the Federal Government in order to have him cashiered. His closing of the San Mateo saloons may be extra constitutional, but the fact remains that they are closed—shut tight.

Will San Francisco Be Remodelled?

Since the great fire this journal has duly chronicled the plans of those about to rebuild San Francisco. If it has incurred the criticism of lacking optimism concerning the Burnham plans, it is merely because we have thought that the people would not have money enough to carry out those plans. It must be borne in mind that about five-sixths of San Francisco has been wiped off the map; that the greater part of the property bearing the burdens of taxation lay in the burned district; that the part remaining is made up almost entirely of wooden residences; that in point of pecuniary value and inability to sustain taxation the remaining part is insignificant compared with the burned district; that San Francisco has been raising from her citizens over six million dollars a year by taxes; that one-sixth of the land cannot pay the six millions previously paid by the whole of it; that it will be extremely difficult to reduce the army of municipal employees; that even if the municipal expenses were cut down to four millions, it would still be a heavy tax; that probably the greatest success to be attained in the way of diminishing expenses will be a reduction to about five millions; that therefore the small remaining portion of the city's income-bearing property will have to pay five millions of dollars where previously the whole of the city paid only six millions.

These were the practical reasons, and not lack of optimism, which made us believe that the carrying out of the elaborate Burnham plans for beautifying the city would not materialize. Further, we thought that however much our citizens might be in favor of these plans, they lack the money for their realization. As the days pass by we are corroborated in this belief. The daily newspapers—which immediately after the fire were almost congratulating their readers because they had bare land to deal with in the new plan of beautifying the city—now are disposed to pooh-pooh the idea. "Utility before Beauty," they cry. Well, who can blame them? The publishers of dailies are large property owners in San Francisco, and therefore large tax payers. They do not look with enthusiasm on the idea of paying out about two or three times as much in taxes as they have previously done, with the sole end of making the city beautiful.

E. H. Hamilton, the leading special writer of the Examiner, certainly knows San Francisco thoroughly. Before, during and since the fire, he has been continually on the ground, and has met daily hundreds of citizens of all conditions—real estate owners, tenants, architects, builders, wholesalers, retailers, politicians and municipal employees. He says deliberately in cold type: "Those who set their hopes high on a complete remodelling of San Francisco are doomed to disappointment. I venture the prediction that San Francisco will grow up very much on its old lines, with here and there the possibility of widening a street."

Mr. Hamilton further says that the wide-spread belief that the business quarter will be rebuilt almost entirely of steel frame, modern, fire-proofed structures is erroneous, and that the fire limits—in which wooden buildings will not be permitted—will by no means be made to cover so large an area as is generally believed. The poorer property owners declare that forcing them to build Class A structures would mean confiscation. Therefore, he thinks it probable that the building ordinances at present in force will not be radically changed.

As for the removal of Chinatown, this journal has expressed some doubts as to its feasibility. We stated that we did not see how Chinese owners of real estate in fee simple could be forced to leave it against their will; that if any municipal ordinance should attack their right freely to use their land, the enforcement of such ordinance would speedily be made a Federal question; that it would be attacked by the Chinese Government as being against treaties which are part of the supreme law of the land; that the Federal Government would therefore set aside the San Francisco municipal ordinance.

Mr. Hamilton also believes that the removal of Chinatown is extremely doubtful. "The Chinese," he says, "do not want to move and some very influential property interests do not want them to move. There are twenty-five to fifty property owners in that district who cannot be kept from erecting buildings in which to sell Chinese goods if they so elect."

Concerning the widening of streets and the running of boulevards. Wm. F. Herrin commented on the similarity of the present situation with that of the great fire in London. "It is interesting," he said, in an interview, "to read a history of the London fire by the light of our own blaze. In London they talked of changing the plan of the city. The great architect, Sir Christopher Wren, stood ready to explain his plans. Yet while he was explaining his plans, the city grew up on the same old lines." This is a very significant incident. While the Burnham plans are being explained, the new San Francisco, in our opinion, will be run on substantially the old street lines.

Justice F. W. Henshaw also says pithily: "You will find that the people who are going to be taxed so heavily for necessities will not stand taxation for beautification on top of the other." And as corroborating the Argonaut's remarks about heavy taxes, the well-known real estate dealer, Henry P. Sontag—who is currently believed to represent large blocks of New York money seeking investment in real estate here—warns us all that "San Francisco must not get her taxes so high as to scare away outside capital." As home capitalists are already getting scared by the danger of high taxation it is easy to see how badly scared the outside capitalists will soon become.

Concerning the widening of streets, Mr. Hamilton has been able to hunt down only one rumor which may be considered as definitive. "So far as I have been able to learn," he says, "the only project for changing the city's lines that may be considered 'on its feet' is the one relating to the widening of Montgomery street between Market street and Montgomery avenue. In this case it is proposed to add twenty feet to the width of Montgomery street, the added width to come entirely from the western side. The Union Trust Building, the Mills Building and the Kohl Building all stand on the eastern line. It is proposed that the western side property owners donate to the city ten feet of the twenty taken from them, while the eastern side owners pay for the other ten feet.

Mr. Hamilton does not seem sanguine of any street widening proposition beside this, and does not speak enthusiastically of the chances even of this. We are inclined to go further. On the face of this proposition, we doubt very much whether the property owners on the western side would be inclined to agree to it. It is probable that not even a majority may agree to it. The experiences of street widening in San Francisco have not been happy. The widening of Kearny street left a tangle behind it. Dupont street was widened from Market street to Bush, a distance of less than fourteen hundred feet, and the resulting litigation clogged the calendars of the courts for a third of a century. It is there yet. Every possible untoward thing took place in this street widening scheme, including embezzling officials, defaulting bond holders and clouds on titles. To this day we doubt whether a property owner on the widened Dupont street line can give a perfectly clear title. Here is an interesting little sum in mental arithmetic: If widening a street for 1300 feet cost twice as many millions as was estimated, and if it clouded titles for thirty years, how much would it cost to widen a street three times as long, and how many decades of years would it take to clear the clouds on titles?

The Popularity of Mayor Schmitz.

Every day or two we pick up a paper from some California city and find a paragraph running like this: "This journal has frequently commented in harsh terms on Mayor Schmitz of San Francisco. In view of his heroic conduct during the recent disaster there, we wish to retract everything that we have said." Then will follow some lines or paragraphs of praises for the Mayor.

The Argonaut has never joined in the attacks on Mayor Schmitz which have been so numerous in the press both in and out of San Francisco. We have never supported his candidacy, because this journal always supports the Republican candidate when it can conscientiously do so, and Mayor Schmitz, although a Republican in politics, has not yet run on the Republican ticket. None the less, we have never printed a line attacking the Mayor's character, and we have had no sympathy with the numerous attacks that have been made upon him. We have always believed Mayor Schmitz to be a good citizen, an honest man, an upright official and a patriotic San Franciscan. We have never had any occasion to believe otherwise. Entertaining this favorable opinion of him, it has gratified us extremely to see how in the great fire he has borne himself in such a manner as to win golden opinions from all sorts of men. We have not seen a line in print or heard a word in conversation criticising the Mayor harshly for his conduct during the recent dreadful disaster; in fact, we have heard nothing of him that was not eulogistic.

The Citizens' Relief Committee, which is a large and representative body has been loud in its praises of the Mayor. This is all the more remarkable when one considers the differences of opinion that must arise in such a committee when presided over by the city's Chief Magistrate. The Associated Real Estate men of San Francisco adopted a series of resolutions praising the Mayor which were probably the most eulogistic ever presented to a Mayor in an American city. All of these real estate men signed their names to that document and yet more than two-thirds of them fought him bitterly when he was a candidate for Mayor.

We do not know whether Mayor Schmitz is or is not sensitive. Politicians should not be sensitive. But we do know that during the last municipal campaign he was the worst abused man of whom we have ever had knowledge in San Francisco. At the time we said and we believed that the overwhelming majority which was given to him and to his ticket—which ticket he swept into office largely through his personal popularity—was due to disgust with the newspaper abuse of him. This abuse brought about a public reaction. But the Mayor ever since has acted most magnanimously. He has, so far as we know, refrained from attempting to revenge himself on his detractors. None the less, it must be very sweet to him, after the campaign of calumny which was waged against him, to hear even his bitter enemies come forward and praise him loudly for his conduct during the recent misfortunes which have fallen so heavily on San Francisco.

Foreign Attempts to Send Relief.

It is quite evident that President Roosevelt's attempt to turn back the relief so sympathetically proffered to California by many foreign governments is meeting with strong disapproval. This feeling is shown not only in California, but in the countries that have experienced the rebuff as well. It is our belief that this wave of disapproval will not be confined to our stricken State, but will extend to other portions of the Republic. When the Citizens' General Relief Committee, under the Presidency of Mayor Schmitz, was sitting on May 9th, a telegram addressed to the Mayor was received, reading thus:

"Canadian Parliament has voted $100,000, which has been declined by President Roosevelt. It is still awaiting acceptance. Will you take it if offered directly?"

This dispatch was received with loud applause by the Citizens' Committee, and the Mayor was authorized by the Finance Committee to send the following reply:

"Your telegram received. Our Finance Committee will accept and receive your generous contribution if offered direct. Accept our grateful acknowledgments."

Further to show disapproval of the President's action, the following dispatches passed between San Francisco and Paris:

"Lazard Freres Company, Paris. The Government at Washington refuses to accept foreign contributions. Distress in California is very great. Can you start subscriptions to Relief Committee here direct? RAPHAEL WEILL."

The banking house of Lazard Freres in Paris is an old established institution which formerly had a branch in San Francisco. The relations of Raphael Weill, the sender of the dispatch, are very close with the Paris banking house. Within a few hours he received the following reply:

"The American Chamber of Commerce has opened a subscription which so far amounts to 120,000 franc of which 75,000 francs have already been forwarded by mail to Mayor Schmitz."

In acknowledgment of this, Mayor Schmitz sent the following cable to the Paris banking firm:

"Your telegram notifying remittance of funds received. Accept the sincere thanks of the citizens of San Francisco."

Throughout all this correspondence and the comment it has caused, there has been no open word of disapproval in print concerning the action of the President. There has been not a little in private converse, but the respect which is felt for the President personally, as well as for his high station officially, has repressed much severe, not to say bitter, criticism concerning his action. But what has most wounded the afflicted citizens of California is that his action was not purely a personal one, carrying with it, only the personal and individual responsibility of a private citizen's action. On the other hand, it was official, and had the effect, as we foreshadowed in these columns last week, of stopping up the sources of intercontinental benevolence among the friends of this country in the Old World. It has had the same effect in the New World, for that matter, for the Canadian offer to contribute $100,000 was refused by President Roosevelt. This refusal caused a prolonged debate in the Dominion Parliament. The money was ready and the Canadians were anxious to send it. They thought, however, that when the President of the United States refused to accept such a subscription, it would not be proper for the Canadian Government to send it direct to San Francisco, as there are (diplomatically) no means of communication between a community of the Federal Union and a foreign government. It was therefore proposed that the money be sent to San Francisco to be expended exclusively on the relief of Canadians here. It was urged that President Roosevelt might permit prosperous Canadians at home to send money to destitute Canadians abroad. But the House was still bent on sending the money direct to California for the benefit of the sufferers in general, without restricting it to those of Canadian birth. At last accounts the well-meaning and benevolent Dominion Parliament was still busily engaged in trying to see how it could send money to San Francisco without insulting President Roosevelt.

Limiting the Height of Buildings.

A very animated discussion is going on among the various committees on the revision of the building laws. The Fire Department officials think that the fire limits prohibiting wooden buildings should be largely extended. On the other hand, architects and real estate owners think that the fire limits should be left as they are or else very slightly extended. The small property owners are, many of them, unable to build in costly materials, and if such restrictions are imposed they will not be able to build at all. Naturally the architects are disposed to agree with them. As for the Fire Department officials they wish to make the city more secure against future conflagrations and they are convinced that rebuilding the city on the old lines and of the old materials will expose it to the danger of being burned down again in the same old way. In this they are right, but these ideas are not popular. Fire Marshal Towe points out that most of the large cities in the East can secure within a very brief period material assistance in the shape of fire engines and firemen from adjacent towns; that San Francisco can rely on no such aid. During the big fire in Boston he said within an hour thirty-two engines and a thousand feet of extra hose were rushed to Boston from other towns, while San Francisco during the recent fire got only three engines from Oakland. Thus San Francisco is entirely dependent on herself for fire protection. The Fire Marshal closed by an ominous remark that if they were going to "throw the height of buildings wide open, San Francisco would be obliged to have a twenty-five story Fire Department."

Exaggeration of California Relief Fund.

Every day that we pick up an Eastern paper we see the amount of the California Relief Fund contributed in Eastern cities set down variously at from sixteen to twenty millions of dollars. As we write, a daily comes to hand from Cleveland which puts it at "about twenty-one million dollars." We should like very much to know where these newspapers get their figures from. As we write, the exact sum recorded by the San Francisco Committee of Relief and the Red Cross Society (which is working with the San Francisco Committee) is $5,120,015.91. In addition to this is to be included a portion of the sum of $2,500,000 appropriated by Congress. But a great portion of this was expended for transportation and subsistence of troops ordered here and for blankets and tents. Of this sum only $300,000 in cash reached the San Francisco Relief Committee, and the part of it expended for food by the Government is less than one-fifth of the whole. But waiving all these details, the difference between five millions and twenty-one millions is sixteen millions of dollars. We do not think it well to look a gift horse in the mouth, and we of California are infinitely grateful to our brothers of the East for the more than five millions they have sent us. But we wish the Eastern newspapers would stop assuring everybody that they have sent us twenty-one millions when we have received only five.

Punishment Fitting the Crime.

Ever since the ruins of San Francisco have cooled, those portions of the city containing the pawnbroker shops, minor jewelry establishments, and Chinese bazaars have been assiduously frequented, night and day, by hordes of looters, men, women and children. They spend their time in raking over the ruins for melted gold and silver, and such articles of bronze and other metal as may be sold for "souvenirs." The Federal troops in charge of that district have had much difficulty in controlling them. Our khaki-clad regulars have very simple methods of punishment: these consist of either shooting the grave offenders, or prodding with the bayonet the minor ones. The regulars were puzzled, however, over the case of the women, and finally withdrew from the matter, contenting themselves with arresting the offenders and turning them over to the police.

The police are not such bloody-minded men as the soldiers, and being nearer to the people, they understand better how to handle them. The police hit upon the happy idea of instituting a scheme of punishment which would not only be corrective, but would be profitable. The male offenders were at once set to work clearing up debris and removing bricks, wires, pipes, slag, cinders and ashes, and cleaning out vaults in Chinatown. The soldiers with their bayonets were entrusted with the job of seeing that the looters did it.

Everybody enjoyed it hugely except the looters. No one of them was ever seen to appear in the district again. As for the women looters, they also were utilized. The laundries in San Francisco have been shut down for weeks, and even millionaires walk freely on the streets with dirty shirts. As for the police and firemen, clean shirts with them are merely a memory. Therefore the women looters have been set to work washing the dishes, pots, pans and kettles of the Commissary Department of the Police, and likewise laundering the soiled linen and underclothing which is the accumulation of several weeks.

It is needless to state that the female offenders, after one trial of this new method of punishment, are never seen in the burned district again.

TO "ARGONAUT" SUBSCRIBERS.

The fire did not interrupt the publication of the "Argonaut." Every number has been posted to our mail subscribers, with the exception of those in the burnt district of San Francisco. These latter are requested to send their NEW ADDRESSES to the Argonaut Mailing Clerk, 25 Brown Avenue, San Jose.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Publisher's Kindly Letter.

NEW YORK, May 7, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Together, with the whole world, we have thought of you and your unfortunate neighbors for many weeks and you have our utmost sympathy.

Just as soon as you are able to get on your feet again and are ready to issue the Argonaut, please let us know and we will do our best to help along the good work in the advertising line. We believe that the new San Francisco will afford a wonderfully productive field for us, and we shall be glad to co-operate with you to some extent in supplying books to the populace.

Assuring you of our sympathy, and wishing you all success,

Very truly yours,

McCLURE, PHILLIPS & CO.

A Generous Offer.

LOS ANGELES, May 10, '06.

Editor Argonaut: I have had EVERY copy of the Argonaut up to the fire. I have always READ every copy. For years I sent them East after reading them. Since 1892 I have been saving them, intending to bind them—in fact, some of them have been sewed preparatory to putting them into covers; but if you are short of this portion of your file, and want them, they are yours.

Cordially,

IDA H. M. STROWBRIDGE.

We are greatly obliged for this generous offer, but it would be imposing on good nature to accept it. Perhaps some subscriber will leave us a file in his will, as this journal is distinctly unfitted for reading in the other world.—Editor Argonaut.

The Old Forty-Nine Spirit.

FORT DEARBORN NATIONAL BANK.

CHICAGO, Illinois, May 10, 1906.

Editor Argonaut, San Jose, California—Gentlemen: I received the Argonaut of May 5, and want to congratulate you on your ability to get the paper out so promptly under such trying circumstances. I cannot begin to tell you how I enjoyed reading it, and I sympathize with you from the bottom of my heart.

San Francisco was the finest city in the United States, a dreadful loss to California and our country.

You can't down the old '49 spirit out there, and she will be rebuilt and the world will take its hat off to her. You are all right.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES FERNALD.

Recently of the Fire Center.

An Old Reader Is a New Subscriber.

SANDY HILL, New York, May 5, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Since I first became acquainted with the Argonaut in the seventies at the Reading Room of Harvard College I have desired to have the reading of it regularly, and whenever possible, when in New York and Boston, have purchased copies, and have kept in touch with it in city reading rooms. The number of periodicals, however, is so great that I have never become a subscriber.

You will find inclosed New York draft for one dollar, for which you will send the Argonaut, commencing with the first number after the recent disaster in your city, and continuing such time as it will pay for.

Very truly yours,

GRENVILLE M. INGALSBE.

The Argonaut Was Regular; the Mails Were Not.

NEW YORK, May 9, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I wish to apologize most humbly in "sack cloth and ashes" for my thoughtless letter of several days ago, calling your attention to the fact that I was not receiving the Argonaut. At the moment the reason why did not occur to me. It is, however, a tribute to your intensely interesting journal that I missed it so keenly as to forget for the moment the terrible misfortune which overcame the city of San Francisco.

Hoping that you may speedily get on your feet again and that your future success will be infinitely greater than in the past, I am,

Very truly yours,

ROBERT FROTHINGHAM.

We Are Still in the Ring.

DENVER, Colorado, April 26, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I am presuming you will get in shape to resume the publication of the Argonaut at an early date, in some manner, as I am lost without the paper. I shall be pleased to hear from you in "any old way." My subscription expires in June, and I am desirous of paying up at once or helping in any other way within my power. If I can help you in any way please inform me. Trusting this will find you "still in the ring."

Yours very faithfully,

E. P. VARIAN.

The Argonaut Is Missed.

1 West 34th Street, New York City, May 5, 1906.

Editor Argonaut, San Francisco: Just before your terrible calamity I sent an order and a remittance by money order of two dollars, for an advertisement in the Argonaut. Please consider the order cancelled, and also the debt. I am suddenly ordered away on an indefinite vacation, and therefore have no need of advertising longer. May I say that I hope the Argonaut will soon recover from whatever losses it may have sustained. Of all the critical journals, I almost think we should miss it the most, for the fearlessness and freshness of its point of view.

Very truly yours,

RUTH GAINES.

After the Clouds.

GRAND VIEW, Arizona, May 9, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: After the harrowing and dreadful impressions of last month I took refuge from our quivering Mother Earth and found consolation from my sorrows in admiration of other parts of the globe. Coming back to the living, I beg you to send me your paper to 2617 Laguna street, San Francisco. We are all Californians by birth and by adoption. We will, therefore, take part in the reconstruction of our unfortunate but beautiful city. That she is unfortunate is all the more reason that we should cherish her. With the history of our city the Argonaut has been closely interwoven for many years. May both of them, like the Phoenix, rise from their ashes. Remember, "Post nubile, Phoebus."

Yours respectfully,

DR. EUSTOJIO CALDERON.

A Quarter-Century Subscriber.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 14, '06.

Editor Argonaut: From No. 1 to the last number of the Argonaut I have been a constant purchaser of the greatest American journal. In common with thousands of your other readers it gladdened my heart to see the first copy after the great calamity. For more than a quarter of a century boys from the same family have served me with the paper. As each one grew to working age, a new brother was introduced as his successor. I regret to say the last one—about 9 years of age—has not shown up for the past three weeks, but I trust will make his weekly rounds next Saturday. I shall hail with infinite delight the first copy in the old form. The matter is there at present, if the looks are not as bright and crisp as in the days of yore.

Very sincerely,

CHARLES H. BLINN.

The Habit of Reading the Argonaut.

LONDON, PARIS & AMERICAN BANK, LTD.,

1806 Pacific Ave., San Francisco, May 8, 1906.

Dear Argonaut: A copy of your issue of May 5 is at hand, but I failed to receive those subsequent to earthquake. As I have never missed reading a number for nearly twenty years, I feel that it is too late a day to form a bad habit, so I would thank you if you would mail me the missing issues and oblige.

Yours truly,

JOHN E. CAZES.

A Reader Since 1877 Offers Us His Files.

THE REALTY SYNDICATE.

OAKLAND, Cal., May 14, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have been a consistent reader of the Argonaut since the first number appeared, and have on hand four bound volumes, to-wit: Nos. 2-3-4-5, which you are welcome to in starting your new library of reference, should you desire the same.

I know where there are fifteen bound volumes here in Oakland, but whether you can get them or not I can not say.

Hope your next issue will not be quite so pessimistic as last Saturday's.

Sincerely yours,

SAMUEL J. TAYLOR.

To Mr. Taylor, as to others of our readers who have so kindly offered us their files, we return our earnest thanks. We shall make note of these and the other volumes, with the hope that we may succeed in otherwise making up files without imposing on the great kindness of those readers who have offered us theirs.—Editor Argonaut.

closed them up, and put a sentry before the door. The other case was a personal experience, but I have been requested to withhold it until the excitement is over lest the man be lynched. But these exceptions dwindle and disappear before the abounding kindness and helpfulness of hundreds of thousands, some homeless, but willing to spare an asparagus stalk, others more fortunate and almost ashamed of being so.

I went over the city today. It is the Forum and the Palatine Hill on a colossal scale: miles of walls, arches, solitary columns: hills that look like cemeteries, where a few days ago a people that was learning to be as frivolous as older communities and losing all individuality, was entertaining in some of the most sumptuous houses in the world. There is a touch of romance about those hills and valleys of shattered palaces, for many, when they saw the hopelessness of fighting the flames, excavated and buried their treasures. How they will find them is another matter, for never was there a city so shorn of its landmarks. Nor is it a pleasant place to search for treasure at present. I was in a semi-demolished corner grocery store, seated on a counter, very tired from a tramp and waiting for a promised automobile, when two severe shocks came and threw down several tottering walls.

But while we are all excited over the prospect of the new and "most beautiful city in America," there are few of us that were born and brought up here that will not regret the old San Francisco, which, if ugly, was the most individual and interesting of cities, full of queer landmarks, traditions, and associations. Quite aside from sentiment, there has never been anything like it, and never will be again. A city constructed all on one plan may be a thing of beauty, but it can never have the richness of interest of a city that has grown from an Indian pueblo, through the days of Spanish dons and "Forty-miners" to a great cosmopolitan city with a bit of Hong-kong in its middle and of Italy on its skirts: with old shacks and "mansions" of the "fifties" crowding the severe structures of stone and marble and brick, as modern as the "hustle" of its people.

It is not to be denied that under all the buoyancy and activity, the hopefulness and vivid interest in the future, is an abiding sense of horror. Those that were in San Francisco during not only the earthquake, but the subsequent days of flight before fire, and who looked upon such scenes of death and despair and abominable desolation as in their well-ordered commonplace lives they had never dreamed of, must carry with them for many years a grim feeling of impotence and philosophy. Rich men must have received a mental shock comparable only to the earthquake itself, and socialists must have observed that Nature accomplished in twenty-eight seconds what they have failed to do in half a century. I do not see how it can do other than good. Frivolity, the most unpardonable and far-reaching of all vices, is at an end in San Francisco for years to come. Rich women, who have been cooking in the streets in an oven made from their fallen chimneys, and may have to do their own washing until frightened servants can be induced to return to the city, who have been confined with as little ceremony and shelter as the women of wandering tribes, and the men who stand in line for hours for their portion of bread and potatoes, look back upon the ordinary routine of their idle lives with a mixture of wonder and contempt. Old people, who vegetated in corners and feared draughts, are active and interested for the first time in a quarter of a century. Even dyspeptics are cured, for everybody, even the normally fed, is hungry all the time.

The Palace and the Sharon Estate.

H. L. Wright, a London barrister, is due in San Francisco to consult with the Sharon Estate Company about rebuilding the Palace Hotel and other properties owned by that company. Barrister Wright represents Lady Hesketh of London and Fred Sharon of Paris. He is empowered by them to consult with Colonel J. C. Kirkpatrick and W. F. Herrin as to the best policy to pursue as to the rehabilitation of the Palace Hotel, the Grand Hotel, the Langham Hotel, on Ellis and Mason streets, and other properties owned by the Sharon estate. En route Barrister Wright will consult with United States Senator Newlands of Nevada. He is to meet Senator Newlands in New York. Senator Newlands' children by his first wife, who was a daughter of Senator Sharon, own a third interest in the Sharon Estate Company; one-third interests are held by Lady Hesketh and Fred Sharon. W. F. Herrin is President of the Sharon Estate Company. He is also the chief counsel of the Harriman railroads on this Coast. Colonel J. C. Kirkpatrick is the active manager of all the Sharon Estate properties out here.

Colonel Kirkpatrick, manager of the Palace Hotel, is thus reported in an interview: "There will be a new Palace, and of course a better one. The site is as yet undecided, but F. W. Sharon has cabled me that he would like to build on the old site. He arrives here soon with Henry L. Wright, of Manchester, England, representative of Lady Hesketh, one of the owners of the hotel. It will take over two years to rebuild the Palace, and meanwhile I do not think any attempt will be made to open another hotel of the same name. I cannot say definitely what the loss was through the destruction of the Palace: but it paid good interest on $6,000,000, so I suppose the loss may be put at that figure. The ground upon which it stood was valued at $2,500,000. During the past three or four years I spent nearly half a million for furniture and other fittings. As you probably know, we were about ready, when the fire came, to begin an addition of two stories to the hotel. When the new Palace is built it will be something magnificent in size and appointments. The stockholders have faith in the future of San Francisco."

F. W. Leadbetter of Portland was appointed commissioner by Governor Chamberlain to represent the State of Oregon in the relief work. Mr. Leadbetter tells of many unpleasant experiences of various prominent persons during the fire. Adolph Busch, the millionaire brewer of St. Louis, was among the guests at the St. Francis Hotel, and in order to escape with his trunks and personal belongings he was compelled to pay $800 for the hire of an automobile. Mr. Busch was accompanied by his family. When the guests began to leave the St. Francis Hotel because of the approaching fire, Mr. Busch found an expressman who offered to move his trunks for $50. Mr. Busch thought the charge exorbitant and refused to pay it. But the fire approached with such rapidity that finally Mr. Busch was only too willing to pay the owner of an automobile $800 for its use.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The inclination of the San Francisco papers of the day, each to go their competitors one better, is well demonstrated by orders issued by the Call and Chronicle respectively. French of the Chronicle on the Wednesday evening after the earthquake: "The Chronicle men will meet at the Chronicle tomorrow at 1, if there is any Chronicle." McNaught of the Call, ordered that: "Call men will meet tomorrow at the Fairmount at 1, if there is any tomorrow."

On the morning of the earthquake a fashionable Eastern woman who was living at the St. Francis came down to breakfast attired in her nastiest morning gown. Noticing the confusion prevailing she asked:

"Why, what's the matter?"

"Didn't you feel the earthquake?"

"Certainly, but I thought you had such things in San Francisco all the time."

Justice F. W. Henshaw tells this earthquake story. In Redwood City a hotel was wrecked and many persons were pinioned in the wreckage, although there were no fatalities. As the bystanders were busy getting out those in danger a breezy voice was heard from the depths exclaiming:

"Here, help me out first, can't you? I'm an Eastern man and I'm not used to this like you Californians."

One day Senator Hoar learned that a friend in Worcester, who had been thought to have appendicitis, was in reality suffering from acute indigestion.

Whereupon the Senator smiled genially. "Really," said he, "that's good news. I rejoice for my friend that the trouble lies in the table of contents, rather than in the appendix."

Senator Beveridge was making an impassioned speech. In the midst of one of his most flowery periods, the venerable Senator Pettus, of Alabama, arose.

"Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?" asked the presiding officer.

"Certainly," said Senator Beveridge. "I am always glad to yield to the Senator from Alabama, who never interrupts without shedding knowledge on the subject which is under discussion, and who always adorns every speech into which he may come with his rare and graceful humor. What does the Senator from Alabama desire to ask me?"

"Nothing," said Senator Pettus solemnly. "I move that we adjourn."

A chemist who for many years was the manager of a concern in Massachusetts manufacturing various high-grade explosives, recently revisited the place of his former employment.

During a talk with his old friends of the institution, he made inquiry with reference to a certain colleague by the name of Jenkins.

"By the way," said the chemist, "what has become of Jenkins? Fine fellow."

"Fine chap, indeed!" agreed the foreman, "and very skillful in the use of chemicals. But a little absent-minded—Jenkins. See that discoloration on the wall over there?"

"Why, yes; but what has that to do with Jenkins?"

"That is Jenkins."

A New York lawyer tells of the neat retort made by a youthful physician to the sarcastic references of counsel in a case tried in that city.

It was during the cross-examination of the young physician that the counsel made his disagreeable remarks touching the improbability that so juvenile a practitioner should thoroughly understand his profession.

"You claim to be acquainted with the various symptoms attending concussion of the brain?" asked the lawyer.

"I do."

"We will take a concrete case," continued the counsel. "If my learned friend, counsel for the defense, and myself were to bang our heads together, should we get concussion of the brain?"

The young physician smiled bitterly. "The probabilities are," he replied, "that counsel for the defense would."

Norman Hapgood, the journalist and essayist, was discussing American newspapers.

"It is not enough that our papers shall tell the truth," he said. "Truth telling in itself is not particularly wise nor praiseworthy. Indeed, it is sometimes the reverse."

"Thus a young man called on a young lady one spring morning very early. He had his automobile along. He wanted to give the young lady a morning spin through the country."

"A little girl, the young lady's niece, answered the bell."

"Is your auntie in?" said the young man.

"Yes, sir," said the little girl.

"That's good. Where is she?" he went on.

"She's upstairs," said the little girl, "in her nightgown, looking over the balustrade."

A wealthy American's aunt had died in Australia, and, wishing to have her buried in the family lot in her native town, he cabled for the remains to be sent to America. When the coffin arrived he was amazed to discover a soldier in the full uniform of a General. He cabled his astonishment at the error and received this concise explanation:

"Keep the General. Your aunt has been accidentally buried with full military honors."

The recent visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Palace of King Theebaw, at Mandalay, recalls the circumstance by which he learned to speak English. His father one day inspected a mission school at Rangoon, and the missionary in charge urged him to encourage the work by sending one of his sons to the school. The King replied that he would be very glad to do so, and asked, "What age should the boy be?"

"About fifteen, your Majesty."

Immediately the King turned to his Prime Minister. "Have I a son of about fifteen?"

"Oh, yes; many, your Majesty," was the reply.

And Theebaw was selected.

Professor John Stuart Blackie, of Edinburgh, being suddenly called away by an important summons one day, posted this notice on his classroom door for his students:

"Professor Blackie will be unable to meet his classes today." Some waggish student came along and rubbed out the "c" from the word classes. The professor, reaching home that evening, saw the erasure, chuckled, and promptly erased the letter "l." His students ever afterward had great respect for their teacher!

One of the most famous of Tom Reed's retorts was made at the expense of Springer of Illinois. The "Maine Giant" had just read one of Springer's own speeches in refutation of the latter's argument, just concluded. The Illinoisan launched into philosophy upon the privilege of progressive thinkers to change their opinions.

"I honor them for it," he continued. "An honest man is the noblest work of God. As for me, Mr. Chairman, in the words of an eminent statesman, I would rather be right than be President."

"The gentleman from Illinois needn't worry, Mr. Chairman," drawled Reed, "he'll never be ei—ther!"

TWO PICTURES OF SAN FRANCISCO.

A Cowardly Stab at the Stricken City.

The dreadful catastrophe which swept over San Francisco has brought forth varying comment from the Eastern press. Most of it is sympathetic and kindly. There is not wanting, however, some of the other kind. The annexed article headed "The Naked Truth About San Francisco," was printed as the leading editorial in the Cleveland (O.) Press, of April 30, 1906. It was done in cold blood, for it was written twelve days after the fire:

Physically and morally San Francisco was built on mud.

Much of lower Market-st was on made ground—old cans, refuse, muck lifted from the harbor and dumped over behind piles. The city hall was in what was once swamps and later sand lots. Fine roadways had taken the place of creeks or estuaries of the swamps and tide flats. The quaking earth rocked and toppled over the buildings erected on sponge.

Not owning her own waterworks, the city burned when the emergency came under which she must depend upon the equipment and structural conscientiousness of corporations.

Leaving the theologians to quarrel over the proposition that this catastrophe was a vengeful visitation of divine wrath, it is a fact that no modern city better deserved the fate of Gomorrah than beautiful San Francisco.

She was notorious for her harboring and laxity toward the social evil—white, black, yellow and brown.

She had more murders per 1000 than any other city in the nation.

She was the only big city wherein a man could safely kill another in the prize ring, and there had been four such killings.

She was the only city where lottery tickets were peddled from house to house, office to office.

She had one saloon for every 250 citizens, one church for every 2500.

She averaged one suicide a day.

She handled over 800 cases of insanity the past 14 months.

She harbored unspeakable Chinese and Japanese infamies that would not be tolerated a day in China or Japan.

She was the haven for every race horse gambler and prize ring tough in the country.

Her conspicuous wickednesses were not only tolerated by the authorities, but practically ignored by the ministers.

When the seismic shock came, the main terror was as to what the vicious elements would do. The city was afraid of itself and all fled who could. Men trembled less for the houses and stores than for their women and children, the legitimate prey of the vicious and pestilence, until Funston began to shoot and hang.

On the second day, when the ground shook with more earthquake and the dynamiting of buildings, while the flames threw a curtain of blood-red over everything, and volumes of smoke charged up and down the business thoroughfares, the street railway platforms of Market-st were covered with men dead drunk—scores of them, cursing and howling. They knew the wickedness of the city and thought God was striking it from above and below.

The great majority of San Franciscans were as good people as could be found anywhere else on earth. The public conscience was asleep. Good business men winked at one or another species of sin because it meant gain to them. The administration was for politics only and had not yet learned that it is good politics to rely on the good sense, love of justice and decency of the whole people. The local press was either too cowardly or too neutral, or too directly interested to stir for a moral awakening. Vice ruled while the public conscience slept.

If the foregoing accusations were true—and they are false—what a time to choose to print them when San Francisco was lying prone in dust and ashes, her citizens standing in long lines, waiting for the bread of charity! But as they are not true, but false, what a time to choose for bespattering with the muck of slander a stricken American city!

Another Picture of San Francisco.

In strong contrast to the foregoing infamous calumny, we find in the Philadelphia Public Ledger a sympathetic article headed "The old and the new." It too is the leading editorial, but very different in tone. It is evidently written by one who knew the old San Francisco, and loved her:

Where San Francisco lies prone in her ashes, and looks up to its desolated hills, will arise a new and splendid city. Yet when it has been builded, and the Litterness of the present time forgotten, then will abide a sense of loss. The old San Francisco is no more, and never can it be recalled save as a memory. The local color, atmosphere, that which might be termed temperament, vanished with the clustered houses, as rich in tradition as the ancient missions in whose cloisters worshiped the Spanish padre "before the Gringo came."

While many Americans knew San Francisco, more of them knew Paris, London and Rome. To most of them this fair city, of their own land was as a place distant and foreign. But such as entered it, and learned of its people and their ways, learned to love it. Unique, it was almost grotesque perhaps, certainly defiant of precedent in its customs, its pleasures, its manner of living. One who had stood on an eminence there, beholding a vision of ocean, bay and circling mountains, had seen the billowing fog banks roll in through the Golden Gate, crowning the abrupt slopes of Sausalito until in the sky there seemed a range of fantastic mountains, in their phantom valleys shifting lakes that changed tints with the sun, remembered ever after a panorama beautiful and appealing. This picture no fury of rocking earth may destroy.

But the scenic impressiveness only prepared the mind for appreciation of that part of San Francisco which has been swept into history, and which hardly may be described. It was a very essence, a subtle difference, not so much in mental attitude and moral perception and warmth of fellowship—although all of these quickly might be discerned—as in the form of the expressions these qualities had taken. One of San Francisco's charms was in its defiance of precedent. There were hills to be conquered, and San Francisco's expanding traffic hurled itself at the face of them. It went up and up, with no thought of finding a way around. So it happened that on some of the streets the steepness was too great for horses. In the centre there are cable roads, and on either side of the rails grass grows through the cobbles. The earlier structures on the level were put together in haste. For the most part they remained essentially unchanged until they fell with a crash. True, they had become stained by time, unkempt, dwarfed by new neighbors, but nobody desired to efface them. Away from the business section houses appeared on the various hills, perched precariously near the brink; houses reached by long flights and grown over with roses. The bathing fogs touched them with gray. Moss grew on their roofs. In the little, lofty yards calla lilies bloomed with the profusion of weeds. But inside these homes what hospitality! as inside the rickety restaurants down toward the water front there was cheer. The "two bit" dinner of the Italian or Mexican chef, in New York would have cost ten times as much. Those whom they drew into comradeship, no matter from what rank in Bohemia, or of Philistines astray, were made acquainted with a pervasive equality not witnessed elsewhere in civilization.

The natural beauty of the site, the quaintness of the commercial and social development of which it became the centre, attracted the poet and the artist. It incited them to paint the attractions and to sing the praises of their chosen habitat. For the outside world, who cared? Surely not they. They lived in a world of their own, and it was good enough. Now and then some member of the group went to the larger world outside, and perchance found fame, but the heart of the wanderer turned back to the gray and shadowy city. Here Stevenson paused before going to the islands to die, and made his home in a rookery. Happy and content was he, as he sat for hours in Portsmouth Square, where now a monument to his memory has been jarred askew. Here young Norris gathered the inspiration for his books. Here, too, in an older day, Bret Harte did his best work, and Twain found his real beginning.

On another plane—that of the clubs—there prevailed a similar habit. Pleasure was courted; to offer the stranger greeting was part of the code. To instruct him that however desirable a place he had come from it must be less desirable than San Francisco was a matter of course; never done aggressively, but with the final word that admitted no denial. This higher Bohemia has suffered, too, but it can survive. The club may rebuild, with the stores, the offices and the mansions, and be better equipped than ever. The spirit of the club has not been crushed. It is in the humbler walks that the blow has fallen. The antique structure that no fire ordinance would permit in a modern city; the elevated cottage that the architect never dreamed; the uprising street, ending against a cliff, all these the march of improvement will obliterate, scattering the people to whom they were dear, and making all things new, precise, according to rule.

Even the absence of Chinatown will be a loss. There never will be in America such another. Garish with gold and purple; rich in secrets the police had failed to fathom; its people retaining the dress and traits of the Orient: honeycombed with subterranean passages: full of strange sights and sounds and smells, with the contrasts of riches and squalor, industry and vice, it was alone of its kind. It occupied some of the best territory, and long had been wanted for other purposes. Now the Chinese really must go, and the odor of sandalwood and opium, the stores of scented drugs, inwrought vases and carved ivories sought by every traveler, be sought elsewhere.

The people of San Francisco know the shock of calamity, but they do not know defeat. They will have their city again. It cannot be the old city, nor suggestive of the old. Disaster seems to have swept away the barriers that afforded pleasing isolation. The new San Francisco will be as other prosperous cities, its distinctiveness only that which springs from its site as an outpost overlooking the Pacific.

The Religious Press on Our Disaster.

The views of many of the religious papers throughout the country are collected by the Literary Digest. In condensed form they may be thus set down:

While the religious papers all over the country are at one in seeking some spiritual lesson in the great disaster that has befallen San Francisco, there is a wide range in their findings as to the religious aspect of the calamity. Many merely hail it, as faith has for so long hailed the mischances of human life, as another opportunity for unquestioning submission to a benign but inscrutable will. A large part of the world, as the editor of The Christian Register (Unitarian, Boston,) remarks, has entirely escaped from the belief that such an event is a judgment of the Almighty, intended to punish people for their sins and to warn them of a more dreadful doom if they do not repent. "Such a calamity," bluntly asserts The Presbyterian Banner (Pittsburg), "has no connection with human sin, but is cosmic in its origin." "Undoubtedly the cause was purely physical," says The Baptist Commonwealth (Philadelphia), which considers the opposite idea that it was a punishment from God on account of the wickedness of the city "not at all satisfactory." For, as this paper naively remarks, very wicked as San Francisco was, "it is not the only city of its kind." Nor, moreover, was it the only sufferer, since "the earthquake devastated several small cities that have not been at all corrupt." This would not have happened, argues The Commonwealth, if God had singled out San Francisco for punishment. "Was it a judgment on San Francisco?" asks Zion's Herald (Methodist, Boston), and goes on to say that "the question cannot be answered by any human wisdom at present at command." The same non-committal position is taken by The Michigan Christian Advocate (Methodist, Detroit), which says:

"To say that the disaster which overtook San Francisco was a divine visitation on account of its sins is to presume to know more than any mortal does. Some affect to believe that Chicago and New York will soon be overthrown in the same way. When they are, it will be time enough for the prophets of vengeance to claim a superhuman power of forecast."

Even more indefinite are the words of the New York Observer (Evangelical): "It might be hasty and unwarrantable to call the disaster a special retributive providence, but it is not impossible that it may have been in some sense a visitation of divine judgment." To The Lutheran Observer (Lancaster) the heartrending disaster is "part of the awful problem of human suffering—a problem whose solution only God can show us when our eyes are cleared of all earthly mists." The Signs of the Times (Seventh Day Adventist, Mountain View, Cal.) recognizes in the earthquake another premonition of the second coming of the Lord.

We find the famous evangelist, the Rev. Dr. Torrey, and the editor of The New World, a Roman Catholic weekly of Chicago, united in the view that the disaster was sent by God as a direct punishment to "the great and wicked city of San Francisco." "It is to my mind one of the wickedest cities in this country," says Dr. Torrey, "and the Lord has taken a solemn way of speaking to its inhabitants." Says The New World:

"God rules in the storm, the volcanic eruption, the tidal wave, and the earthquake. He is the Lord and Master of nature and its laws, as well as of the supernatural sphere. But the pygmy ministers of Chicago in their vapid, and to some extent blasphemous, utterances last Sunday morning on the San Francisco cataclysm attempted to dethrone God in His own universe. Not even Tyndall, sitting with crossed legs on the summit of the Alpine Matterhorn, contemplated nature's independence of divine control to a more extravagant degree than our Chicago Protestant divines. One fellow argued from the Book of Job that God does not punish sin by temporal afflictions. . . . But when we remember that only a few years ago on Good Friday night of all the nights of the year many of the wealthy citizens of San Francisco assembled together with lewd women in one of the most luxurious mansions of the city and carried their hellish orgies so far that they kicked the globes off the chandeliers, we shall be inclined at least to abstain from asserting that subterranean gases, 'faults,' and other seismic agencies were the principal and only cause of nature's convulsions."

Such views as these move The Truth Seeker (free thought, New York) to satirical comment. They would attribute, it points out, everything bad to God and everything good to man. "It must be man who will rebuild the city: all God did was to destroy it." He shook the buildings down, set the fires, burned people to death, broke the water-mains, destroyed the food, and drove people into the parks where they caught the measles, typhoid fever and other diseases. "But God did not send the soldiers to protect them. That was Funston. He did not repair the water-mains. That was the company. He will not rebuild the city. That is up to the steel-workers and carpenters." Such, it urges, is the absurd position into which such views force one.

Other papers find the real lesson of the disaster in the revelation it has afforded of the ties of sympathy and help that bind this country and the whole world into unity. It teaches us, says The Baptist Commonwealth, that "there is in men an infinite amount of sympathy and brotherly kindness which only needs a great crisis to call it into activity."

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

VANITY FAIR.

Not long ago, one of the leading commercial houses in this country published in a daily paper a full-page advertisement of its spring fashions in gowns. It is a house noted for its advertisements, which are considered so attractive to customers that this particular account of the spring supply of gowns was evidently written with a full knowledge of what would prove most interesting to the average American woman. In part, following is the inducement held out to prospective purchasers of clothing to wear in the spring and summer of the present year: "When, in 1863, the Empress Eugenie took the artist dressmakers of Paris under her patronage, France had her second birth as the originator of Style for the world. All the glory of her splendid history gave inspiration to those who strove to make the Second Empire as magnificent as the First. These brilliant pages have been scanned for the motif of the dresses of the present year. True, Paquin is still dreaming of the First Empire and has produced some exquisite costumes after this period. Others, including Baer, have caught their inspiration from the Directoire, and the gowns are marvels of beauty. But the fluffy skirt, the exquisite flounces, the short jackets and short sleeves of the days of 'Sixty-five are the dominant features of the styles of Nineteen Hundred and Six." As a key to American taste in dress this advertisement is most interesting (says the Craftsman). It is the boast of the nation that the American woman is individual and independent, and also that she has a natural instinct for dress. The average woman who loves pretty things—and what woman does not?—meekly accepts at its face value the assertion that France is the originator of style for the world, and never stops to inquire of herself whether or not she thinks that styles originated in France under the conditions that prevailed in the days of the Empress Eugenie, and designed to suit the very crude tastes of a showy and extravagant court of parvenus playing at royalty, are really suited to the needs of the twentieth century American woman. She knows, if she happens to be one of the thousands of business women who earn their daily bread as honestly and capably as the men with whom they work, that frills and flounces and long, dragging skirts are as out of place in an office as would be a cocked hat, sword and lace ruffles in place of the man's plain sack suit, and yet, if the silly, inconvenient styles of 1865 are announced as the choice of Paris, it is ten to one that her clothing will show an attempt at imitating them, even while her soul longs for the comfort of the plain, trim, immaculately laundered shirtwaist and short skirt that are suited to her work and her surroundings.

With the so-called "fashionable" woman it is even worse, because she has money and leisure to indulge in any extravagance of fancy. When sensible or beautiful fashions happen to rule, as they do occasionally, she is in great luck, but when the commercial interests decree that they shall pass, she makes no effort to hold what belongs to her and what she really likes, for she "must look like other people."

Two or three years ago, the craze for athletics brought with it garments in which a woman could really move about freely and enjoy life. Her waist grew to normal size, her lungs expanded and her feet had a chance. Women said joyously: "No more tight lacing or high-heeled shoes or skirts that sweep the streets. We will never go back to them after this." Such sentiments were dangerous. Something had to be done. There were whispers of crinoline—dear to manufacturers and shopkeepers because of the forty yards or so required to make the kind of dress that goes with it, but that was a step too far and taken a little too soon. It was beyond even the fashionable woman, so the styles of 1830—hideous and uncomfortable beyond measure—came in. Skirts were once more held up with both hands, waists were squeezed into the old dimensions, and heels three inches high were the only proper thing in footwear.

And women accepted the change. True, they murmured and rebelled, and the great army of business women succeeded in forcing some modifications, but in the main the new vogue prevailed and changes have been rung on it ever since.

In a lecture Friday before the Academy of Medicine in Paris, Professor Metchnikoff, the great Russian bacteriologist, declared that he had discovered the microbe which causes the hair to turn gray. He said that he had also found a remedy by which this microbe could be exterminated. This he declared could be accomplished with a hot iron. "Gray hair," he said, "is a disease. It is caused by the superactivity of a certain living cell or microbe inside each individual hair that feeds on the pigment or coloring matter. It is the absorption of this pigment by the microbe that causes gray hair. A comparative low degree of heat is fatal to this cell or microbe. In fact, I have discovered an iron heated to 60 degrees centigrade or 140 degrees Fahrenheit will kill it and restore the natural color of the hair. Apart from that, sudden great emotion, as is generally known, will cause the hair to turn gray in a night. This I find is because fear or sorrow has a strange power over the pigment."

Miss Jean Reid, daughter of the American Ambassador, left Dorchester House, her father's London residence, May 10, for a week's change of air in Ireland, as she has not been well of late. Her doctors say that unless she shakes off the effects of the influenza she is suffering from, she cannot face the fatigues of a London season, but must pass the summer in the country. She is energetic, and last week insisted on going to Lady Granby's royal party, at which Princess Ena was the chief guest. It would require a very strong constitution to withstand without injury the constant strain of social duties the Ambassador's daughter has undergone, and it was decided she must be more careful in the future.

Getting a man to witness a marriage ceremony at long distance by looking through two windows and across an area is a rather novel way of obtaining a witness, but it served the purpose last week of legally and securely tying the matrimonial knot that made Manuel Piries and Grace Sophia Schuster one. The ceremony was performed in the law office of Justice Waldemar Seton, on the third floor of the Commercial building. W. W. Espey, a real estate agent, was at work at his desk, across the area, and Justice Seton asked him to look across while he made the couple one. The mother of the bride was the other witness. When the knot had been tied Espey noted that the groom failed to kiss the bride. "Hi, there, young man!" he shouted across the area, "you forgot to kiss the bride." "She won't hold still long enough," shouted back the groom. Then Judge Seton brought the marriage certificate around to Espey and secured his signature.

The Tailor and Cutter omits to send a representative to Burlington House to criticize the Royal Academy from a sartorial viewpoint this year. Its critic sadly declares contemporary painters cannot see the details of clothing, and in consequence utterly fail to produce any art that will last. In Sargent's portrait of Lord Roberts the top button on the tunic is completely missing. The tunic has no buttonholes and the breeches have no seams. Formerly tailors thought well of Sargent, but now the only satisfactory academician is Sculptor William John, whose seams, buttonholes, lapels, etc., in modern figure are irreproachable.

Dr. Somerville Hastings, lecturer at the London Institute of Hygiene, speaking the other day on "Cleanliness Is Next to Godliness," said that people were much cleaner now than in the reigns of Queens Mary and Elizabeth, when the washing of clothes was unknown. Cotton was hardly in use and linen was expensive. The poor wore rough woolen garments, which were never washed, and the better classes adorned themselves with silks and velvets, which were dyed when they would no longer pass muster in regard to cleanliness. It is recorded that James I. never washed either hands or face during the period he posed as the wisest fool in Christendom, but confined his cleanliness within the narrow limits of wiping his finger-tips upon a damp napkin.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

Notes by a Frank Book Crank.

"Letters of a Diplomat's Wife" is written by Mary King Waddington. (Scribner's.) She is an American woman, who married a French statesman. These memoirs relate principally to his life in Moscow, as Special Ambassador for three weeks at the coronation of Alexander III. in 1881; and for ten years in London (1883 to 1893) as French Ambassador.

The memoirs are very naïf, at times almost trivial, and the writer's use of French phrases is rather wearisome; she uses French for the most ordinary phrases. To speak of the "Journée de l'Assomption" in London seems absurd; there is no particular reason for giving the French name to a religious festival in England which has a perfectly well recognized English name of its own.

Still, the memoirs are interesting. The life led by the members of these diplomatic circles must be a very charming one. Mme. Waddington has an agreeable circle around her always in her own embassy. The house of the French Embassy at Albert Gate is in one of the best and most delightful locations in London. She is received everywhere most hospitably and when she and her husband leave London they are sincerely regretted. Some sixty ladies unite in presenting Mme. Waddington with a beautiful jewel as a souvenir.

William Henry Waddington died in 1894 at the age of 68. He was the son of a rich English manufacturer, hence his English name.

A new edition has just been issued of "Reminiscences of Peace and War," by Mrs. Roger A. Pryor. (MacMillan.) The book is a very good sketch of life in Washington under Pierce and Buchanan. The writer is a typical Southern woman—attaching vast importance to the frivolities of life, such as the dinners and teas of Washington and even the White House affairs; yet under it all she is a sterling wife and mother, warm-hearted, and passionately devoted to her husband and children. The book is quite ingenuous in places, as where the writer expresses her strong admiration for the beauty of the White House and the paintings in the Capitol.

"The Private Soldier Under Washington," by Chas. Knowles Bolton. (Scribner's) discusses the private soldier—his enlistment and arms; officer and private, and their relations; camp duties; amusements; hospitals; prison ships.

The same trouble Paul Jones fought against in the Continental navy existed in the Continental army—the idea of equality, the "rights of man," etc., interfered with discipline. The New England troops were particularly unruly in this regard. There were many mutinies—six Pennsylvania regiments mutinied. The British General Clinton offered them better food and clothes (the cause of the mutiny) and their back pay. They wavered, but finally decided to refuse, and killed the British envoys. According to the writer, the civilian citizens received wagonloads of wounded Continental soldiers with sour looks, and hastened them on to the next town under pretence of poverty. The patriot farmers hid their cattle and hens when the Continental army approached. The people objected strenuously to the Continental soldiers being quartered on them.

Toward the end of the Revolution, "patriotism seemed nonexistent," says the author. When the war was over, in 1783, the poor wretches released from the British prison-ships in New York harbor begged in New York streets; they were coldly received; those who begged enough money to get home found that there were fifty men for every job, and there was no work for them to do. Altogether, the book—which is taken from documents of the time—paints an unpleasant picture.

"The Fat of the Land," by John W. Streeter, M. D. (Macmillan) is the story of a doctor who gave up practice through impaired health. He leaves the city and buys an abandoned farm; he runs it on the "intensive farming" plan; uses manures, "infected soil" for alfalfa, fattens his hogs, raises high-priced cows, hens, etc. Result—luxurious living and large profits. It sounds amazing to any one who knows anything about farming. But to such a one the interest disappears when it is learned that it is all fiction. It is related that he wrote the book while shut up in his room convalescing from a severe illness.

Library and Miscellaneous.

A report on the condition of the San Francisco Free Public Library shows that on April 17 there were 166,344 volumes in the main library and branches, 128,300 belonging to the main library in the City Hall. At present 21,000 volumes remain in the branches, and there are supposed to be about 2000 volumes held by borrowers from the main library. The buildings remaining are the McCreery and Fillmore street branches. The McCreery building is valued at $50,000. The Fillmore street building is valued at $3000. The Free Public Library has acquired all of the block bounded by Van Ness avenue, Franklin, Hayes and Fell streets, and also owns a building site on Sixth avenue. Library bonds to the amount of $739,800 have been sold and $620.00 has been expended out of this sum for purchase of the block mentioned. The bonds remaining unsold amount to $907,200. The library is entitled to $41,500 insurance and $25,985.23 in taxes already collected. The Free Public Library Trustees have reduced the salary list from $3600 per month to about $1200, retaining only such employees as the board deems necessary for the restoration of the library.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Carl Schurz died at his home in New York City, May 14. At the bedside were a son, Carl L., and two daughters, Marianne and Agatha; Edward L. Pretorius, Schurz' business partner, and Drs. Jacobi and Strauss.

Born in the village of Libelar, near Cologne, in 1829, Schurz became interested in the revolutionary movement in Germany while attending the University of Bonn, and when the uprising came in 1849 he served as a private in the ranks of the insurgents, and fled to Switzerland soon after his marriage to Margaret Mayer, the daughter of a prominent merchant, in 1852.

Schurz came to this country, locating first at Philadelphia. He went to Spain as United States Minister in 1861, later resigning to return and serve in the Civil War, during which he earned the title of Major General. In 1869 he was elected to the United States Senate from Missouri. He became estranged from the Republican party and retired from the Senate in 1875. He was one of the organizers of the Liberal party in 1872, and presided over the convention at Cincinnati which nominated Horace Greeley for President. He supported the national Republican ticket in 1876, and in the year following became Secretary of the Interior in the Cabinet of President Hayes. He had a beautiful summer home at Lake George, and there a large part of his declining years were spent with his books, his music, of which he was passionately fond, and his memoirs.

The candidacy of Edward Rosewater, proprietor of the Omaha Bee, for the Republican nomination for United States Senator at the coming State Republican Convention is announced in a signed article by his son, Victor Rosewater, managing editor. Mr. Rosewater is at present in Rome as the official representative of the United States at the Universal Postal Congress.

The fund for Miss Ethel Bret Harte, only surviving daughter of the distinguished American writer, has been closed at $5000, an annuity of $130 has been bought for her, and she has been started in business in a London typewriting bureau. The sum of $670 remaining from the fund has been placed to her credit in bank. Miss Harte went on the stage, but her health failed. The committee which raised the fund included George Meredith, Sir George Newnes, Sir Francis Burnand, Sir Gilbert Parker, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Hall Caine, G. R. Sims, Clement Shorter and Beerbohm Tree.

The Castellane case was taken up again in Paris, May 11, for the purpose of learning if it was possible to reconcile the parties. Both Count Boni and the Countess (formerly Anna Gould) appeared in court. The latter was accompanied by her counsel, Edmond Kelley. The hearing disclosed that there was no chance of a reconciliation, the Countess insisting on an absolute divorce. This concluded the formal preliminaries. The Countess' bill asking for absolute divorce will now be filed, the papers will be served and the case will proceed at once.

Embassador and Mrs. Charlemagne Tower returned to Berlin, May 11, from a vacation in southern Europe, including Constantinople. Upon learning of their arrival at the Turkish capital the Sultan sent for Mr. and Mrs. Tower, met them at the door, offered his arm to Mrs. Tower, escorted her to a seat, and spent half an hour with them, talking about American affairs, in which Mr. Tower found His Majesty to be surprisingly well informed. He conferred on Mrs. Tower the Grand Cross of the Shefakat, which is an order for women, meaning "devotion to duty." Mrs. Tower is a daughter of G. Frank Smith of San Francisco.

The announcement is published that S. S. McClure has purchased all of the interest formerly held by John S. Phillips in McClure's Magazine and in the book-publishing firm of McClure, Phillips & Co. Oscar W. Brady has been elected treasurer of both companies to succeed Phillips. McClure declined to make any statement as to the significance of the change.

In a cabled communication to the New York Herald, the legal wife of Maxim Gorky indignantly denounces the chilly manner in which the people of the United States have treated Gorky because he tried to pass off as his wife his mistress, Mlle. Andreiva, the Russian actress. Gorky's wife, who is at Yalta, Crimea, Russia, cables in part: "I am very indignant at the intrusion into the personal and intimate life of a man, and astonished that Americans, citizens of a free country, enjoying such large political liberties, are not free from prejudices dead already even with us in Russia." Gorky, with Mlle. Andreiva, who is known as Mme. Gorky, is still residing with Mr. and Mrs. John Martin on Grymes Hill, Staten Island. His son, Nicolai Peshkoff, and his secretary, M. Bourenine, live near by.

On account of the coming wedding of Alfonso, King of Spain, and Princess Ena, now called Victoria, President Roosevelt has chosen Mr. F. W. Whitridge of New York to be his special embassador to Madrid for that event. Honors like this are rare. Mr. Whitridge is a prominent lawyer and a director of several corporations, but almost unknown to the public. He has lived in New York City, in one house, for twenty-five years, and spends his summers in the Scottish Highlands, where he owns an estate. There he lives a strenuous outdoor life, oftentimes walking twenty-miles a day over the mountains. The special ambassador is an acquaintance of President Roosevelt, a personal friend of Secretary Root, and wholly immersed in his business and recreation. He is a great traveler, and Spain is about the only civilized country he has never visited. Mr. Whitridge is a native of New Bedford, Mass., and a graduate of Amherst and of Columbia Law School. His wife is a daughter of Matthew Arnold.

Fougere, a famous Parisian dancer, who has made and spent several fortunes, was convicted at the Clerkenwell sessions, in London, last week, together with her husband, Albert Girod, a French actor, of shoplifting in London drapery stores. Sentence was deferred.

The pope will this year present the gold rose to Princess Ena of Battenberg. The golden rose is a symbol in wrought gold which is blessed by the pope with much ceremony on mid-Lent Sunday. It is presented by the pope to some prince or princess whom he desires especially to honor.

Mr. Louis James combines with the talent for practical joking a temper of the kind that not infrequently is observed to go with it. Some time ago the proprietor of a Texas hotel he had just left requested him by telegraph to return certain sheets and towels which, as the message read, had been "taken by mistake." Mr. James brought suit for libel, as newspaper readers will remember.

Shortly after that he was taking a one-night stand in a Western town in which the proprietor of the hotel was a friend of his. He was delayed in his arrival, and, as he had to leave for the next stand at the end of the performance, he went to the general washroom instead of to his own apartments. The proprietor politely but persistently begged him to go upstairs to wash, urging that no charge would be made for the rooms.

When Mr. James opened the door he discovered the reason. The towels were lashed to the rack with a clothesline, the soap was nailed to the washstand, and a huge anchor suspended from the head of the bed held the pillow-shams firmly in place. Mr. James tells the story on himself, and professes gratitude for the fact that he yielded to the proprietor's entreaties.

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Notes About the Clubs.

The Olympic Club directors decided that the dues from April 18 to June 1 would be waived, and that commencing on June 1 the club dues would be reduced to $2 per month. The lease of the Lent house at 1050 Eddy street was approved and signed. It is the intention of the directors to open the club on Saturday, the 19th inst. There are rooms for twenty-five members to be apportioned, and Prosper Reiter, Superintendent of the club, will be at the new premises on Wednesday, the 16th, to rent the rooms to applicants who are on hand. The members who resided in the old club have been given rooms. The directors have decided to reduce the initiation fee to $25 for the present. The directors appointed George J. Wellington, one of their number, to attend to the adjustment of the insurance on the club's property, which amounted to $235,000.

As soon as Jefferson Square is cleared of refugees the Olympics arrange a programme of athletic events for the amusement of the public. Boxing, wrestling and other events will be arranged. The square is big enough for a 100-yard sprint. A. B. Gibson, who had charge of the gymnasium, and his wife, will be placed in charge of the new clubhouse.

That unique organization, "The Cabinet," whose excursions, theatre parties, banquets, political discussions and round table at the Palace Hotel have made it famous, has announced a reunion for this week at the Claremont Country Club, the fashionable club of Oakland and Berkeley. The following order has been sent out: "A reunion and food and drink distribution for relief of survivors of the Cabinet will be held at the Claremont Country Club, Oakland. Bread line forms at 6:30 p. m. Any attire saved from the disaster, from pajamas out, allowable."

At a recent meeting of the Board of Directors of the Bohemian Club it was decided to open the beautiful redwood grove near Guerneville early in the season to permit members and their families to camp there during the summer. This privilege, it is understood, will be available until the jinks time in August. There will be no formal and elaborate midsummer jinks this year, but a gathering of an informal character. While the camp is open the railroad will be asked to put on a "husband's train," so that the trip can be made from Saturday to Monday without inconvenience.

The Family Club has taken a lease of the Gordon Blanding house, northeast corner of Clay and Franklin streets, for one year, with privilege of renewal, for $500 per month. The house contains fourteen bedrooms, and is magnificently furnished. The club dues have been reduced from $5 to $2.50 a month. The house was considerably damaged by the dynamiting across the street, but it will be ready for occupancy about June 1, when the club will be housed more comfortably than ever before.

Despondent because of poor health and insomnia Thomas Binny, an employe of Balfour, Guthrie & Co.'s San Francisco office, committed suicide by shooting himself at the Portland Hotel, Oregon, on May 10. He had been in poor health for some time, and after the San Francisco fire, went to Portland for medical treatment. He had suffered a nervous breakdown. Binny was about 45 years old, and was a native of Scotland. He was not married, and had no near relatives. He was employed by the San Francisco office of Balfour, Guthrie & Co. for twenty years. He was a leading member of the Pacific-Union Club of San Francisco, of which he had been Secretary and Director. He was also a prominent member of the San Francisco Golf and Country Club.

Californians in the East.

Recent Los Angeles arrivals in New York City include: Mr. and Mrs. A. Weid and Miss Milner, who are guests at the Hoffman; Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Carpenter and Miss Carpenter, at the Algonquin; Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Guthrie, at the Navarre, and Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Walton, at the Herald Square.

Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Fitch of Sacramento are registered at the Broadway Central, and Miss Johnson of Pasadena is at the Imperial, New York City.

San Franciscans who have been in New York in the last few days are: Mr. and Mrs. K. Heyman and Mrs. A. G. Blakeley, who registered at the Herald Square; Mr. and Mrs. F. F. Devereaux and Miss Tracy, at the Algonquin; Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Lent, Mrs. J. B. Fox and Mrs. M. J. Maloney at the Grand Union; Mrs. G. C. Harris and the Misses Job, at the Astor; Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Rand, at the Victoria; Mr. and Mrs. A. Abrams, at the Savoy; Mr. and Mrs. F. Gerard, at the Gilsey; Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Hutchings, at the Empire, and Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Opie at the Gerard.

Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs, who has been a guest of Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish at Garrison the last few days, has returned to New York City.

Mr. Thomas Magee has gone East and is endeavoring to interest New York capital in San Francisco real estate investments.

Among those who arrived in New York from abroad last week was Dr. Theodore Rethers, chief surgeon of St. Mary's Hospital, who cut his vacation short to hasten back to San Francisco. He remained in New York over night only.

W. Wilson of San Francisco is a recent arrival at the St. Regis Hotel, New York City.

Among the San Franciscans recently registered at the Hotel Netherland, New York City, are Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Gunst, Mr. and Mrs. G. Cohen and Miss Cohen.

C. M. Odder has been at the Manhattan Hotel in New York recently.

Several well-known San Franciscans who have been in Europe arrived in New York May 10 on their way back to the Coast. Mrs. Frank Norris, widow of the author of "The Pit" and "The Octopus," was met at the pier by Lloyd Osbourne. Bartley Oliver, his wife and their eight children, who were guests at the reception in the White House last October, when President Roosevelt congratulated Mrs. Oliver upon her large family, returned also, having cut their intended two years' tour of the world to a bare six months' trip. Other returning San Franciscans were Major Charles L. Tilden and H. B. Sullivan. Both were volunteers in the Philippine army.

Mrs. Anna Feldman of San Francisco, who returned to New York from abroad this week, was a sufferer from both Vesuvius and the San Francisco calamity. She was driven out of Naples by the eruption of Vesuvius and learned on arriving here that her home in San Francisco had been destroyed by fire.

Adolph Goldberg has recently arrived from New York and Europe.

Across the Bay.

Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels and their family will remain in Oakland for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Driscoll and their little son will remain in Oakland for a part of the summer. Mr. Driscoll's mother, Mrs. J. M. Driscoll, will be their guest for a while.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. C. Henshaw and their daughters will spend the summer in Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. R. Allen and Miss Gertrude Allen have taken a cottage in Piedmont for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Courtney Ford are temporarily located in Oakland.

Notwithstanding the fact that the mind of the general public is not bent on amusement at the present time, the coming of Sarah Bernhardt was deemed of sufficient importance to bring out a line of ticket buyers nearly half a block long at the Liberty Playhouse in Oakland. Among those who secured seats were: Mrs. E. L. Hume, Mrs. A. S. Monges, Charles A. Jewel, Cecil A. Robinson, Lieutenant P. N. Olsted, United States Navy; Captain C. J. Lancaster, W. G. Taylor, Mrs. J. Blossom, F. C. Marsten, Dr. Colc. M. Porter, S. M. Ewing, W. G. Parson, G. L. Downing, S. C. Haight, E. Dunne, A. R. Gwinn, Mrs. Rutledge, H. G. Morrow, Miss Stein, C. Rodini, F. Redington, George Gross, Carl Plaut, Oscar Luning, Russ Lukens, J. Hardenburg, H. P. Dalton, Oscar Franke, W. A. McKee, F. de Ojeda, J. Stokes, R. E. Muller, F. B. Potter, J. Sal Ewing, Charles A. Rutherford, Tom C. Grant.

Miss Lucie King has been the guest of Mrs. William Carson.

Mr. and Mrs. Gus Costigan are residing temporarily in Oakland.

Mrs. Oscar Long, of Piedmont, has been actively engaged in Red Cross relief work in Oakland. Her efforts have been actively seconded by Mrs. Van Pelt, Mrs. A. D. Thompson, Mrs. Joseph Mathews and Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding.

Mr. and Mrs. William Magee and their children are at picturesque "Alden Farm," the home of the Magees, near Fruitvale.

Mrs. Remi Chabot has rented her large residence on Madison street, and with Miss Clare Chabot is planning to spend the summer at St. Helena.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Dieckmann are with the Robert Knights, and Dr. and Mrs. J. P. Dunn are for the present at Dr. Dunn's old home.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Brigham have rented their large Oak street residence in Oakland and with their children have gone to Los Gatos to spend the summer months.

Mr. and Mrs. John Landers and Miss Pearl Landers have taken a house in Belvedere.

Miss Alice Hager and Miss Ethyl Hager have gone to San Rafael for a part of the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Latham McMullin are guests of Mr. and Mrs. James H. Follis in San Rafael.

Colonel and Mrs. M. H. Hecht have gone to Baltimore for an extended visit. Their daughters, Mrs. L. Gerstle and Mrs. Will Gerstle, are living at the Gerstle summer place in San Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. John L. Howard have called off for the present their European trip, and Mr. Howard was one of those who started for San Francisco as soon as the news of the great earthquake was telegraphed to the world.

Henry Payot has retired from the firm of Payot, Upham & Co., and its business will be carried on hereafter by Mr. Upham Sr. and his sons, Isaac and Benjamin Upham. The Isaac Uphams junior have a picturesque home at Piedmont, in which they are now entertaining their relatives.

Southern California.

Mr. and Mrs. Rush McComas (nee Marie Louise Parrott) have returned to Santa Barbara from a prolonged visit to San Francisco and vicinity.

Mr. Theodore Wores, the artist, and his sister, have been visiting at Santa Barbara. Mr. Wores is another San Francisco sufferer who will make Los Angeles his home for the present. While he was fortunate in having a number of pictures in Los Angeles at the time of the earthquake, others had been left in his northern studio. These, with a valuable collection of objects of art gathered through many years of travel in all parts of the world, were completely destroyed. He has received commissions to paint portraits of three prominent women of Los Angeles. His contributions to the Los Angeles spring show consist of "Don Quixote," "Under the Southern Cross," "A Moonlight Scene in Honolulu," and "The Iris Gardens of Hori Kiri."

Mrs. A. N. Towne and Mrs. Clinton E. Worden, of San Francisco, are guests of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Newhall at their home in Los Angeles.

Mr. and Mrs. William May Garland and Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Newhall, who planned to spend the summer in Europe, have indefinitely postponed their journey.

Sacramento.

Mrs. A. J. Hull, of San Francisco, has been the guest of Mrs. J. H. McKune at Sacramento.

Miss Edna McClatchy will visit in San Francisco with Miss Barbara Small, who has been her guest in Sacramento for the past two weeks.

Judge and Mrs. T. B. McFarland and Miss Jennie McFarland, who have been visiting Mrs. J. H. McKune at Sacramento, have returned to San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Hoskinson, of Sacramento, have with them Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Taylor, of San Francisco. Mr. Taylor at one time spent some years in Sacramento.

Since the San Francisco fire a number of publications have located in Sacramento. Dr. C. H. Blemer will publish there "The Live Stock and Poultry Journal," a monthly of which he is the editor. "Camera Craft," a monthly publication devoted to the art of photography, will also be issued in Sacramento.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

The engagement is announced of Miss Grace Reynolds, daughter of Mrs. M. A. Reynolds and the late Frank B. Reynolds, to Mr. Edgar A. Collins. A sister of Miss Reynolds married Francis L. Bosqui. Mr. Collins is of English parentage and is at present manager of the Combination mine at Goldfield, Nev. The marriage will take place in September.

At Menlo Park, on May 9, Miss Katherine Clark, elder daughter of the late Colonel Z. P. Clark, was married to A. P. Redding of Menlo, Secretary of the Pacific Surety Company. Miss Elise Clark, sister of the bride, was her only attendant, and Ralston Hamilton was the groom's best man. The couple left on the evening train for the south.

Brigadier General Evan Miles, U. S. A., retired, has gone to Colville, Washington, to reside.

Mrs. Wm. C. Peyton, of 1812 Broadway, San Francisco, has gone to Wilmington, Delaware, to visit Mrs. Eugene du Pont.

Mr. and Mrs. John Simpson, with their daughter, Miss Edith Simpson, have remained at their residence in San Francisco, but are preparing to leave for the country.

Edward M. Greenway is preparing to leave for a visit to New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kemble have gone to Fresno.

Mr. and Mrs. William Randolph Hearst and their little son have arrived from the East, and are at the Hacienda, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst's beautiful home near Pleasanton, where they expect to spend some weeks. Mr. Hearst is planning to rebuild the Examiner building immediately.

Joseph Greenbaum, the portraitist, has an order for the portrait of John Wigmore of Los Angeles. While working in Granville Redmond's studio he finished two ideal heads, "Priscilla" and "Beatrice," which are hung in the Blanchard gallery, Los Angeles, and began another, "La Charmeuse." Later he is contemplating a sketching trip to Catalina.

Jeremiah Lynch arrived from Paris last week. "We Californians in Paris," he said in an interview, "did not know of the disaster until Thursday, the 19th. Paris is eight hours later than San Francisco. Dispatches came saying that what was left of the city by the earthquake had been destroyed by fire, that the Cliff House had slipped into the sea; that the United States squadron was sunk in the Bay of San Francisco, and that the dead numbered from five to ten thousand. I sent wire after wire, as did many others in Paris, but no one could get a word in reply. I think the first dispatch received in Paris was on Friday, from Raphael Weill to his partner. The banks refused to cash our letters of credit, and most of us had hardly money enough to pay our hotel bills. A dozen Californians, including myself, with automobiles, sent them to be sold. The automobile market in Paris is depressed at present."

Joseph Ghirardelli, of San Francisco, died last Friday evening, at his home in Oakland, following an attack of ptomaine poisoning, aggravated by the shock of the earthquake and fire. He leaves two children, Joseph N. Ghirardelli, and Miss Carmen Ghirardelli. He was a native of San Francisco, 53 years of age. He married twenty years ago Miss Ellen Frances Barstow, a daughter of D. P. Barstow, a pioneer California lawyer.

Christopher R. Corning, the well-known mining engineer, who has spent much time in San Francisco and who has many friends there, recently returned to his New York home from a visit to California.

Recent foreign advices say that Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Postley and Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Postley are at Monte Carlo.

Mr. and Mrs. James Denman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Goodman, and Charles Stepp have reached Paris.

Governor and Mrs. Carter, of Hawaii, are domiciled at Del Monte and they will remain there a month longer. They are much impressed with Monterey and its surroundings.

Horace G. Platt, the well-known San Francisco clubman and President of the Pacific Improvement Company, and A. D. Shepard, Secretary of the same company, are at Del Monte. They will remain for several days looking over the interests of their company at Monterey and Pacific Grove.

The Waldorf-Astoria has become a popular hostelry for the Nevada mine operators and during the past week a great number of leading Nevada gold fields pioneers at present visiting in the city give the big hotel the look of the ill-fated Palace Hotel of San Francisco, which was the popular gathering place of the big Nevada owners.

Waldo Story, the sculptor, who has been spending some time in California, has sailed from New York. He returns to his home, in Rome, where he has a studio.

Henry J. Crocker recently shipped his valuable collection of postage stamps to London to be exhibited at the International Philatelic Exhibition the end of this month, thus saving it from the fire. It is said that the collection of Hawaiian stamps alone is valued $45,000.

Charles Webb Howard, President of the Spring Valley Water Company, last week sent his resignation to the Board of Directors of his company and the resignation was accepted. Captain A. H. Payson was elected to fill the vacancy and Joseph M. Quay was elected Vice President. Mr. Howard has for some time been ill and feels that he is not capable of coping with the great amount of work to be done in reconstructing the water system. Captain A. H. Payson, the newly elected President, is one of the most prominent capitalists of the Pacific Coast. He helps to direct several of the largest financial institutions in this city. He has been actively engaged in the management of affairs on the coast of the Santa Fe system, being Vice President of the company and the head resident official on this coast. He is a director and large stock owner in the gas and water companies in this city and in the Bank of California. He has also taken an active interest in the management of the Parrott estate. He is married to a daughter of Mrs. Abby Parrott and the late John Parrott. Captain Payson is a retired army officer; he graduated with honors at West Point, entering the engineer corps. J. M. Quay is a well-known financier and capitalist of San Francisco. He is a director in a number of the leading corporations of the city, and very prominent in financial circles.

The wedding of Miss Henrietta de Witt Allen and Rev. Dr. Edward Dodd, of Boston, will be quietly celebrated about the end of July in the chapel at Ross Valley, Mrs. Henry F. Allen and her family having taken the Ver Mehr cottage there for four months. Dr. Dodd came to San Francisco from his Eastern home immediately after the earthquake for a brief visit, but returned this week.

Hon. T. T. Dargie has been reappointed Postmaster at Oakland. Mr. Dargie's administration has been one of the most successful in the history of the Oakland postoffice. Mr. Dargie is a great friend of Secretary Metcalf, and his reappointment was indorsed by both Senators Perkins and Flint. Mr. Dargie is a brother of William E. Dargie, editor and proprietor of the Oakland "Tribune."

Mrs. Francis Carolan was in Paris when last heard from. Mr. Carolan, who was in New York at the time of the earthquake, returned at once to this coast to look after his large interests here.

Miss Maizie Griswold, assistant editor of "Sunset," and Edward Emerson, war correspondent and lecturer, were married on May 16th at the home of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson on Hyde street, San Francisco.

Mise Jane Swigert, daughter of Colonel S. M. Swigert, United States Army, retired, was married on the evening of May 10th to Lieutenant Augustine McIntyre, of the Artillery Corps. The wedding was a quiet one, with none but near relatives present. It took place at the home of the bride's sister, the wife of Lieutenant W. P. Hazzard, at the Presidio. Chaplain P. J. Hart performed the ceremony. Lieutenant McIntyre is temporarily stationed at the Presidio.

George M. Pinney, well known in mining circles twenty-five years ago, died in his seventy-fifth year at the home of his son in New York City, May 13. He was one of the first men to go to California gold fields in 1849. He was interested in mining in Montana and California for many years and amassed a fortune. He leaves a widow, one son, George M. Pinney, and two married daughters.

Mrs. A. P. Hotaling is at Sleepy Hollow, the country residence in Marin county of Richard M. Hotaling.

Mrs. Louis B. Brechemin, wife of Colonel Brechemin, United States Army, is with her son, Dr. Louis B. Brechemin Jr., United States Army, at Fort Baker.

Jerome B. Landfield left a week ago for the East and Europe, to be gone five or six months.

Dr. and Mrs. J. Wilson Shiels are living at 2175 Pacific avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. John D. Spreckels Jr. are at San Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore F. Payne have left New York, where they have been spending the winter, and will soon open their home at Menlo.

The Press Club will be reopened at an early date. President John McNaught has called a special meeting of the board of managers. The house at 2016 Pine street has been considered and will be inspected by a special committee.

The University Club has leased the adjacent residences of F. W. Dohrmann and Dr. Fischel at 1815 and 1817 California street. Thomas J. Barbour is contemplating a trip East.

Enrique Grau, Peruvian Consul, who has made his residence for a number of years at the Bohemian Club, was a heavy loser in the fire. He is now living at the corner of Webster and Jackson streets.

The Builders.

All are architects of Fate
Working in these walls of Time;
Some with massive deeds and great,
Some with ornaments of rhyme.

Nothing useless is, or low;
Each thing in its place is best;
And what seems but idle show
Strengthens and supports the rest.

For the structure that we raise,
Time, is with materials filled;
Our to-days and yesterday's
Are the blocks with which we build.

Truly shape and fashion these;
Leave no yawning gaps between;
Think not, because no man sees,
Such things remain unseen.

In the elder days of Art,
Builders wrought with greatest care
Each minute and unseen part;
For the gods see everywhere.

Let us do our work as well,
Both the unseen and the seen;
Make the house where gods may dwell,
Beautiful, entire, and clean.

Else our lives are incomplete,
Standing in these walls of Time,
Broken stairways, where the feet
Stumble as they seek to climb.

Build today, then, strong and sure,
With a firm and ample base:
And ascending and secure
Shall tomorrow find its place.

Thus alone can we attain
To those turrets, where the eye
Sees the world as one vast plain,
And one boundless reach of sky.

—H. W. Longfellow.

London After the Great Fire.

At length th' Almighty cast a pitying eye
And mercy softly touched his melting breast;
He saw the town's one-half in rubbish lie,

And eager flames drive on to store
the rest.

An hollow crystal pyramid he takes,
In firmamental water dip't above;
Of it a broad extinguisher he makes,
And hoods the flames that to their quarry drove.

The vanquished Fires withdraw from every place,
Or full with feeding sink into a sleep;
Each household genius shows again his face,
And from the hearths the little Lares creep.

By such degrees the spreading gladness grew
In every heart which fear had froze before
The standing streets with so much joy they view
That with less grief the perished they deplore.

Not with more constancy the Jews, of old
By Cyrus from rewarded exile sent,
Their royal city did in dust behold,
Or with more vigor to rebuild it went.

The utmost malice of the stars is past,
And two dire comets, which have scourged the town,
In their own plague and fire have breathed the last
Or dimly in their sinking sockets frown.

Methinks already from this chymic flame,
I see a city of more precious mould:
Rich as the town which gives the Indies name,
With silver paved, and all divine with gold.

Already laboring with a mighty fate,
She shakes the rubbish from her mounting brow,
And seems to have renewed her charter's date,
Which heaven will to the death of Time allow.

More great than human now, and more august,
Now deified she from her fires does rise:
Her widening streets on new foundations trust,
And opening into larger parts she flies.

Before, she like some shepherdess did show,
Who sat to hate her by a river's side;
Not answering to her fame, but rude and low,
Nor taught the heauteous arts of modern pride.

Now like a maiden queen she will behold,
From her high turrets, hourly suitors come;

The East with lucense, and the West with gold,
Will stand like suppliants to receive her doom.

The wealthy Tagus and the wealthier Rhine,
The glory of their towns no more shall hoast.

And Seyne, that would with Belgian rivers join,
Shall find her lustre stain'd, and traffic lost.

The venturesome merchant, who design'd more far,
And touches on our hospitable shore,
Charmed with the splendor of this Northern star,

Shall here unlade him and depart no more,
Thus to the western wealth through storms we go.

But now, the Cape once doubled, fear no more;

A constant trade-wind will securely blow.

And gently lay us on the spicy shore.

—John Dryden.

San Francisco.

Serene, indifferent of fate.

Thou sitteth at the Western gate.

Upon thy height, so lately won
Still slant the banners of the sun.

Thou seest the white seas strike their tents,

O warden of two continents!

And, scornful of the peace that flies
Thy angry wings and sullen skies,

Thou drainest all things, small or great,

To thee beside the Western gate.

O lion's whelp, that hidest fast
In jungle growth of spire and mast!

I know thy cunning and thy greed
Thy hard high lust and wilful deed.

And all thy glory loves to tell
Of specious gifts material.

Drop down O fleecy fog, and hide
Her skeptic sneer and all her pride!

Wrap her, O fog, in gown and hood
Of her Franciscan brotherhood.

Hide me her faults, her sin and blame;
With thy gray mantle cloak her shame!

So shall she, cowed, sit and pray
Till morning bears her sins away.

Then rise, O fleecy fog, and raise
The glory of her coming days;

Be as the cloud that flecks the seas
Above her smoky argosies;

When forms familiar shall give place
To stranger speech and newer face;

When all her throes and anxious fears
Lie hushed in the repose of years;

When art shall raise and culture lift
The sensual joys and meaner thrift;

And all fulfilled the vision we
Who watch and wait shall never see;

Who in the morning of her race,
Toiled fair or meanly in our place;

But, yielding to the common lot,
Lie unrecorded and forgot.

—Bret Harte.

Carl Joubert, one of the most strenuous English advocates of Russian freedom, died the other day in London. It is said that his real name was A. W. C. Grote and that he was a descendant of the historian of Greece. The name of Joubert he adopted because it was that of his mother before marriage. She was a member of the well-known Dutch South African family of that name. Carl Joubert first went to Russia about twenty years ago and found such an attraction in the country and its people that he practically became a Russian.

When Andrew Carnegie first spoke of taking up golf he was advised by Baillie MacKenzie, of Edinburgh, to lay out a golf course at Skibo castle. "If you take to golf," said the baillie, "you will add ten years to your life." "Do you say so?" said Mr. Carnegie. "If you can add ten years to my life I will make you a present of $2,000,000." "Well," replied the canny magistrate, "I can't just exactly do that, but I'll play you for the $2,000,000 over your own green." The offer was not accepted.

DEL MONTE OFFERS

Hotel Del Monte was very slightly injured by the recent disturbance, and is offering a welcome shelter to all San Franciscans. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

A PERMANENT HOME. CURRENT VERSE.

Niagara, by Florence Wilkinson.

The water talked to the turbine
At the intake's couchant knee:
Brother, thy mouth is darkness
Devouring me.

I rush at the whirl of thy hiding;
I pour and spend
Through the wheel-pit's nether tempest.

Brother, the end?
Before fierce days of tent and javelin,
Before the cloudy kings of Ur,
Before the Breath upon the waters,
My splendors were.

Red hurricanes of roving worlds.
Huge wallow of the uncharted Sea,
The formless births of fluid stars,
Remember me.

A glacial dawn, the smoke of rainbows
The swiftness of the canyoned west,
The steadfast column of white volcanoes.

Leap from my breast.

But now, subterranean, mirthless.
I tug and strain,
Beating out a dance thou hast taught me
With penstock, cylinder, vane.
I am more delicate than moonlight,
Grave as the thunder's rocking brow
I am genesis, revelation,
Yet less than thou.

By this I adjure thee, brother,
Beware to offend!
For the least, the dumbfounded, the conquered,
Shall judge in the end.

The turbine talked to the man
At the switchboard's cryptic key:
Brother, thy touch is whirlwind
Consuming me.

I revolve at the pulse of thy finger.
Millions of power I flash
For the muted and ceaseless cables
And the engine's crash.
Like Samson, fettered, blindfolded,
I sweat at my craft;
But I build a temple I know not,
Driver and ring and shaft.

Wheat-field and tunnel and furnace,
They tremble and are aware.
But beyond thou compellest me, brother,
er,
Beyond these, where?
Singing like sunrise on battle,
I travail as hills that bow:
I am wind and fire of prophecy,
Yet less than thou.

By this I adjure thee, brother,
Be slow to offend!
For the least, the blindfolded, the
conquered,
Shall judge in the end.

The man strove with his maker
At the clang of the power-house
door:
Lord, Lord, Thou art unsearchable,
Troubling me sore.

I have thrust my spade to the caverns;
I have yoked the cataract;
I have counted the steps of the planets.
What thing have I lacked?
I am come to a goodly country.
Where, putting my hand to the plow,
I have not considered the lilies,
Am I less than Thou?

The maker spake with the man
At the terminal-house of the line:
For delight wouldst thou have desolation,

O brother mine,
And flaunt on the highway of nations
A byword and sign?

Have I fashioned thee then in my image
And quickened thy spirit of old,
If thou spoil my garments of wonder
For a handful of gold?
I wrought for thy glittering possession
The waterfall's glorious lust;
It is genesis, revelation,—
Wilt thou grind it to dust?

Niagara, the genius of freedom,
A creature for base command!
Thy soul is the pottage thou sellest:
Withhold thy hand.
Or take him and hind him and make him

A magnificent slave if thou must—
But remember that beauty is treasure
And gold is dust.

They Got Together.

A Denver young man, who works in a railroad office, was calling on a Capitol Hill girl whom he likes very much, the other evening, and they were in the parlor alone. They were sitting about like this:

Young man. Girl.
The caller had not been up for a week and the girl was taking him to task for his apparent neglect of her.
"Why haven't you been up, Tom?" she asked. "Have you been ill?"
"Yes," he replied; "I had some sort of stomach trouble. I'm much better now. The doctor says, however, that I must keep away from sweet things, but—"

Here he hesitated.
"But what?" she asked.
"But I just couldn't keep away from you if I tried," he said. A moment later they were sitting about like this:
Youngman Girl

DIES TRAE.

Day of wrath! O day of mourning!
See! Once more the Cross returning!
Heaven and earth in ashes burning!

Oh! What fear man's bosom rendeth
When from Heaven the Judge descendeth,
On whose sentence all dependeth!

Wondrous sound the Trumpet singeth,
Through earth's sepulchres it ringeth,
All before the throne it bringeth!

Death is struck, and Nature quaking,
All creation is awaking,
To its Judge an answer making!

Lo, the Book, exactly worded!
Wherein all hath been recorded;
Thence shall judgment be awarded.

When the Judge His seat attaineth,
And each hidden deed arraigneth,
Nothing unavenged remaineth.

What shall I, frail man, be pleading,
Who for me be interceding,
When the just are mercy reeding?

King of Majesty tremendous,
Who dost free salvation send us,
Fount of pity! then befriend us!

Think! Kind Jesus, my salvation

Caused Thy wondrous incarnation;
Leave me not to reprobation!

Faint and weary Thou hast sought me
On the Cross of suffering thought me,
Shall such grace be vainly brought me

Righteous Judge of retribution,
Grant thy gift of absolution,
Ere that reck'ning day's conclusion!

Guiltily, now I pour my moaning,
All my shame with anguish owning
Spare, O God, Thy suppliant groaning

Thou the sinful woman savedst,
Thou the dying thief forgavest;
And to me a hope vouchsafest!

Worthless are my prayers and sighing,
Yet, good Lord, in grace complying,
Rescue me from fires undying!

With Thy favor'd sheep, oh place me
Nor among the goats aghast me;
But to thy right hand upraise me.

While the wicked are confounded,
Doomed to flames of woe unbounded,
Call me, with Thy saints surrounded

Low I kneel with heart submission;
See, like ashes, my contrition;
Help me, in my last condition!

Ah! that Day of tears and mourning
From the dust of earth returning,
Man for judgment must prepare him
Spare, O God, in mercy spare him!

Lord, who didst our souls redeem,
Grant a blessed Requiem! Amen.

A Kentuckian was talking sadly of Colonel H. G. Toler, the noted horse man, who recently died in Wichita.

"Colonel Toler raised John R. Gentry and many other famous horses," said the Kentuckian. "The turf has suffered a great loss in him. A better judge of horseflesh and a pleasant man you'd never find."

"I used to love to watch him studying horses. He was very keen. He was at his best then."

"A rich tailor once brought him to see a new acquisition, a trotter of doubtful quality, for which, however, $4500 had been paid."

"The tailor was full of enthusiasm about his horse. He little knew he had been done."

"Look at him," he cried. "There's a horse for you. Look at them legs!"

"Very pretty," said Colonel Toler, grinning. "Very nice legs, indeed. But don't they bag a bit at the knees?"

A persevering youth had called several times at the home of a young lady, to be met each time with a "not at home." Upon one occasion he had seen her go in just before he reached the gate. His ring was answered by her small brother.

"Jimmy, I'd like to see your sister," the determined young man said.

"She ain't at home," Jimmy said, surveying him disdainfully.

"But I just saw her come in," the youth protested.

"Can't help that. Tell you what I'll do, though," Jimmy said, condescendingly. "You give me your pack of cigarettes, and I'll send her down."

"You are too young to smoke, Jimmy."

"Do I get 'em?" Jimmy said, aggressively, half closing the door.

"Here they are!" was the conciliating reply, and the box was handed over. Leaving the visitor seated in the parlor Jimmy disappeared, to return in a few minutes.

"She'll be down soon," he said.

"How did you work that, Jimmy?" the youth inquired.

The boy surveyed him with an amused grin.

"Aw, I told her it was the fellow she's engaged to," he said.—Minneapolis Journal.

Eminent Financier—"Doc, I'm going to take out another million dollar policy. As the company's medical director, you'll testify, of course, as to my perfect health?" Insurance Physicist—"Certainly." Eminent Financier—"And by the way, Doc, I've been cited aked investigator from the West, a fellow who's totally ignorant of our Eastern financial ethics. As my family physician, just write me a memo, will you, that I'm threatened with pneumonia or appendicitis, and can't possibly appear?"—Puck.

STAGE GOSSIP.

The Orpheum is to open May 20 at the Chutes Theater. It will present a one act version of Carmen, adapted for vaudeville purposes by Miss Marie Doran. Miss Bergere is supported by her company of six people. Mosher, Houghton and Mosher, comedy and trick cyclists, will offer the act that has made them famous, and Eva Mudge, "the military maid," will be a novel attraction. In many costumes, all suggestive of the regular army, she sings all sorts of patriotic songs. Kenno, Walsh and Melrose will present an act and Caprice Lynn and Fal give the "daintiest girl act in vaudeville." Clifford and Burke, black face comedians, have several new song hits. Armstrong and Holly give their piece of fun, "The Expressman." The always interesting Orpheum Motion Pictures, complete the bill. E. M. Rosner with his Hungarian orchestra will play for the first time his new march "Greater San Francisco," dedicated to Mayor Schmitz. A matinee will be given at the Orpheum every day except Monday. A down town box office is located at Donlon's drug store, corner of Fillmore and Sutter streets, where seats may be reserved one week in advance, daily, between nine a. m. and five p. m. The usual Orpheum popular prices will prevail.

The Tivoli company will go to Seattle for an eight weeks' engagement at the Grand Theater, arrangements having been closed with William R. Russell, the capitalist owner of the Grand and Third avenue playhouses in that city. The Tivoli name will be dropped. George Lask will have charge of the stage and Frank W. Healy of the business end.

After the Seattle run, an engagement may be filled at Portland and then the company will take to the road.

A two-story steel frame building, the Empire Theater, has begun in San Jose. The theater will be a first-class vaudeville house under the direction of William Weston, of the Empire Theater in San Francisco.

The new building will be of the mission style of architecture. It will have a frontage of 68 feet and a depth of 100 feet. It will have a seating capacity of 1000. The Empire Theater Company's directors are as follows: Ed Ackerman, San Francisco, 825; William A. Weston, San Jose, 824; Hal A. Curtis, San Francisco, 825; I. H. Wise, San Francisco, 825; E. M. Rosenthal, San Jose, 1.

Harrison Grey Fiske announces that arrangements are almost completed for a new playhouse in the vicinity of Times square to be the permanent home of Mrs. Fiske and the Manhattan company. It will be ready to open early in the autumn of 1907. Fiske's lease of the Manhattan Theater ends on June 1st next. To provide a suitable stage for Mrs. Fiske next season a contract has been signed with the Schuberts for the Lyric Theater from September 10th for twenty weeks.

Mrs. Joseph Grismer, better known in the theatrical world as Phoebe Davies, is due here from New York, in charge of a car of clothing and a portion of the cash proceeds of the big benefit performance held at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York on the 4th instant. The big benefit was the most notable affair of the kind ever given in the United States, and yielded something like $25,000, which will go to relieve the needs of theatrical people and police who suffered in the recent conflagration. The police of New York sold 14,000 tickets for the benefit performance, and in addition tickets $4000 was realized from the sale of flowers, programmes and souvenirs. The performance began at 11 o'clock in the morning and the programme was not concluded until 2 o'clock the following morning.

Actors in distress will receive financial assistance by applying to the committee named below. Mr. George Osbourne of the committee will be found at the General Passenger Office, Southern Pacific Company, second floor south end Ferry building, foot of Market Street, San Francisco, daily (except Saturdays and Sundays), from 12 noon to 3 p. m.; Saturdays, 12 to 1 p. m. M. Meyerfeld Jr., Joseph Gottlob, George Osbourne, M. E. Mayer, W. H. Leahy, Committee.

The incapacity of most successful actors—a few prominent exceptions to the rule can, of course, be instanced by everybody—to hold on to the money which came to them so easily is notorious. Sir Henry Irving, who enjoyed a golden prosperity for many years, left a comparatively small sum behind him at his death, and now a sort of semi-official announcement is made by the gentlemen who have assumed the task of raising a jubilee fund for that irresistible actress Ellen Terry, that "recent managerial speculations have made havoc of her savings."

Mr. W. L. Courtney has just completed a stage version of Robert Louis Stevenson's story "Markheim" for Mr. H. B. Irving, who is now busily engaged rehearsing the piece for immediate production at the London Lyric, as a prelude to "Mauricette." "Markheim" is included in the volume entitled "Merry Men and Other Tales and Fables."

More than $20,000 was realized at a benefit performance in aid of the San Francisco sufferers May 5th at the Metropolitan Opera House. The benefit was under the auspices of the Theatrical Managers' Association and it was decided that the proceeds should go to the destitute actors and policemen of the stricken city.

The preparations for the celebration of Ellen Terry's jubilee continue in London, the shilling subscription scheme leaving the Tribune to conduct it in its own fashion. About 35,000 shillings had been subscribed at latest accounts, which is a respectable showing considering the fact that the Tribune is a new paper, but scarcely reflects the true extent of Miss Terry's popularity, and certainly falls very far short of the sum necessary to provide her with a comfortable annuity. The testimonial performance which the associated managers are organizing is likely to have brilliant artistic and substantial financial results. It will take place next month, in all probability, in Drury Lane Theater, whose boards have been trodden by so many generations of famous actors. It is probable that one of the chief features of the programme will be a play in which all the chief parts will be assumed by various members of the Terry family. But nothing has been definitely decided on yet, except that the entertainment shall be as attractive and as memorable as it is possible to make it.

The memorial to Mrs. G. H. Gilbert, given at the Knickerbocker Theater on April 11th, brought out a crowd of admirers of the old actress and added the sum of $3,600 to the fund being raised for the window to be placed in Bloomingdale Reformed Church.

Mme. Marcella Sembrich has postponed her departure for Europe in order to give a song recital at Carnegie Hall on Monday afternoon, May 17th, in aid of the chorus and orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who suffered so much through the recent catastrophe in San Francisco. The members of the orchestra have lost their instruments and are thus deprived of their means of livelihood and the members of the chorus are destitute. Mme. Sembrich has undertaken this concert out of sympathy for her colleagues and the proceeds, which will be distributed to the orchestra and chorus by her, are not a part of the fund that may be raised subsequently.

Many of the prominent American residents of London are among the box-holders for the opera season which begins at Covent Garden this week and continues until mid-summer. The season itself bids fair to be as brilliant, artistically and socially, as any of its predecessors. Among the artists engaged are Caruso and Scotti, recently from the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and Melba, Battistini and Destima. The repertoire arranged for the season calls for several Wagnerian productions and four of Verdi's compositions.

Nat Goodwin, in describing an unsuccessful play, said:

"Why, one night, during this company's Western tour, the box office man was aroused from a nap in the middle of the first act by an odd sound.

"He yawned and looked out of the box, and there before him stood a little boy, weeping bitterly.

"What is the matter, my little one?" he asked.

"The boy, holding up a check, said: 'I want my money back!'

"Why do you want your money back?" asked the box office man in surprise.

"Because," sobbed the boy, 'I'm afraid to sit up in the gallery all alone.'"

The Rev. J. J. Curran, Treasurer of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, was talking in Wilkes-barre about St. Patrick's day. From this subject, turning naturally to the subject of bulls, he said:

"An Englishman was once traveling in the south of Ireland, when he came to a village called Skibbereen.

"The name struck him as very peculiar and odd, and he asked a villager why the town was so called.

"Sure," the villager replied, 'I thought even an Englishman could have seen the reason for that. It's called Skibbereen to distinguish it from other places of the same name.'"

A recently published biography of James Russell Lowell says of a famous incident of the poet's college life: "Throughout his senior year his unexcused absences from recitations and chapel exercises increased in number until they reached a total that even now is startling to an academically trained reader. Finally, so the story runs, there came a characteristic ebullition, during one of his infrequent appearances at evening prayers, that brought matters to a head. Having been elected in the morning poet of his class, Lowell had spent the day in ambrosial jubilation. At prayers that evening, being still jubilant, he arose in his seat and bowed low to the right and to the left. Coming at the end of a long career of consistent negligence, this breach of decorum was not to be passed in silence." Lowell was, as a consequence suspended.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Deacon Brown.

A plous man was Deacon Brown,
He never raged or swore;
A cyclone blew his kitchen down
And through his orchard tore.
But when he rose up somewhat dazed
And took a long full breath and gazed

Upon the havoc that was wrought,
He uttered not a single shrill,
Profane remark about it. Still,
I wonder what he thought?

The deacon's gray mare ran away
And badly scattered things;
The road was littered up that day
With hubs and spokes and springs.
The deacon crawled out from the wreck

And felt his brow and rubbed his neck.

And when the foamy mare
He kept his thin lips tightly shut
And stood there saying nothing. But
I wonder what he thought?

The deacon had a daughter who Eloped, one moonless night,
With Ebenezer Pettigrew,
A shiftless, worthless wight.
The deacon did not chase the pair;
Next day he sat with rumpled hair
And furrowed brow and saying naught;
Sometimes he clenched his fists, 'tis true,
And many a long, deep sigh he drew,
I wonder what he thought?

The Perfidious Poets.

The flowers of spring,
The vines that cling—
Such are the things the poets sing.

They prate of rills
And wooded hills
But not of measles or of chills.

They yawp of rocks
And playful flocks
But ne'er a word of chicken-pox.

They note each bud,
Each bovine cud
Yet never do they mention mud!

O'er alder clumps
Enthuse these chumps
Who have no time for croups or mumps.

The leafy spot
They laud a lot—
The farmer's bull concerns them not.

The tiny vale
They wildly hail.
We trespass, and we go to jail.

So I declare
And roundly swear
The bards are not upon the square!

Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Star.

Life's Tragedies.

How strange is life! A most uncertain thing,
Dependent on the wiles and whims of Fate;
How much more joy its passing hours would bring
If one was destined never to be late.
Tonight, alone, 'midst other thoughts I pause
And ruminate before my ember fire;
I lost the girl I love the best because
I had to stop to mend a punctured tire.

How true the things we crave are just ahead—
Invitingly they beckon out of reach—
But when far down life's speedway we have sped
We find some other fellow's captured each.
Then undismayed we throw in our high gear
No weak compression thwarts our keen desire;
Yet ever when we feel the prize is near
We have to stop and mend a punctured tire.

And thus my life has been a broken thread.

For when I'm running swift and sure

I find

Some object seems immovable ahead,

And I put on the brakes and fail behind.

But in the end, when all life's cares

I drop,

And I shall run my auto-chariot of fire,

I hope I shall not then be forced to stop

Outside the Gate and mend a punc-tured tire.—Puck.

The Argonaut.

LVIII. No. 1524.

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 26, 1906.

Price, 10 Cents.

NOTICE.

As soon as the necessary permits can be secured and the debris cleared away, work will begin at once on reconstructing the Argonaut's former quarters at 246 Sutter Street, San Francisco. In the meantime, the Editorial and Business Offices will be maintained at TWENTY-FIVE BROWN AVENUE, SAN JOSE, CAL. Address all business communications there to The Argonaut Publishing Co., Jerome A. Hart, President.

The news trade can secure the Argonaut from the SAN FRANCISCO NEWS CO., No. 1711 SAN PABLO AVENUE, OAKLAND.

The paper will be on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco and by the Dennison News Co., on its boats and trains.

ENTERED AT THE POSTOFFICE IN SAN FRANCISCO AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

How About the Insurance Companies?

The insurance situation in San Francisco remains in an unsatisfactory condition. The local agents have acted in a manner to perturb and alarm the policy holders. In addition to leaving San Francisco for Oakland, where many policy holders could not follow them, many of them have adopted the plan of leaving letters unanswered, eluding and evading personal interviews, and generally acting in a way to indicate that they are trying to avoid not only liability, but even an acknowledgement that they had accepted risks from the policy holders. This attitude on their part has finally brought about a visit from the sub-committee of the Citizens' General Committee which was not wholly satisfactory. The insurance agents stated that they would "pay their legal liabilities," but they did not construe "legal," and they did not give any intimation as to when they would pay.

State Insurance Commissioner Wolfe states that he believes their policy will result in nullifying the claims of many policy holders who may not succeed in giving them notice of loss and in filing their proofs of claims within the period fixed by the companies. He therefore has served upon all the companies a formal notice of the destruction of the burnt district of San Francisco, carefully defining its boundaries, and has informed them that he is the agent of every policy holder within the burnt district. Thus he proposes to prevent the nullifying of claims of policy holders who may find themselves juggled out of their dues by craft or chicanery.

Immediately after the conflagration, doubt was expressed by many concerning the intent of the British companies to pay. As the days pass, these doubts seem to be removed. The attitude of the British companies may be thus summed up: they will pay no earthquake damages; they will pay fire damages not caused by earthquake; they will pay no damages for dynamite destruction if they can help themselves. If, however, the courts hold that dynamite was used as water would have been—to check the flames—they will pay. In short, they will confine themselves to their strict legal liability. They plead in excuse that their stockholders will hold the directors to a strict legal accounting for any moneys paid out for losses not covered by their policies. Furthermore, they allege that the reinsurance companies in Great Britain will hold the original directors also liable personally for any damages paid out on losses not strictly according to the letter of their policies.

But behind all this is the fact that while the British companies will pay no more than their legal liabilities, THEY WILL PAY.

How about the American companies? We regret that we cannot make a report even as favorable as the foregoing. It begins to look as if the crooked record left by the life insurance companies of America was going to be paralleled by the fire insurance companies of America. The course of the Traders company of Chicago has created a most unpleasant impression. This company seemed to be in so favorable condition that it arouses grave doubts as to what may be the condition of smaller and weaker companies. On Dec. 31, 1905, its surplus was $1,344,723.

On May 4th the company made application for a receiver. In New York and Chicago, the day previous, brokers were busy replacing insurance written for the Traders in other companies. A number of companies failed to get any of this replaced business. Some of the companies passed by were considered perfectly sound before the San Francisco fire. All the brokers and agents concerned refuse to give a list of the companies which were passed by. They say that they wish to protect the names of all the companies they can. In New York and Boston financial circles, however, it is whispered that there are between thirty and fifty companies which were passed by in the replacing of the Trader's business; that each of these companies is in the same position as the Traders before it asked for a receiver; that, like the Traders, each one of them has endeavored to assuage the stockholders to raise a protection fund; that if the fund be raised these companies will be able to stand up; that if they fail to raise such a fund, as the Traders failed to do, they will have to go to the wall. The Traders had been considered one of the strongest companies in the West. All of its stockholders are men of large wealth. It was given out the day before the failure that each stockholder was to be assessed $200 in order to meet the San Francisco losses. It now looks as if this were merely a piece of flimflam for the purpose of heading off possible legal proceedings.

Offers of Bound Volumes From Generous Subscribers.

The Argonaut continues to receive from its subscribers most kindly offers of their files of bound volumes. We are much moved by the generosity of these offers, for people who take the trouble to preserve and bind copies of a periodical usually set some store by them. We have, therefore, felt that to accept these offers would, in a way, be imposing on the good nature of those who offered them. We have contented ourselves with making notes of the numbers and dates of these files, with the possible hope in the future of completing some sets from various quarters and making arrangements for their transfer.

It is very much to be regretted that so many files were destroyed in the libraries of San Francisco by the great fire. Only a short time before the catastrophe the editor of this journal had decided to donate complete sets of bound volumes to a number of the leading libraries of the country. He had already given complete files to some libraries not in a position to purchase them, and had assisted in making up incomplete files in richer and better endowed institutions. This was the case with the fine library of Stanford University, whose librarian some time ago informed us that their Argonaut file was incomplete. We took pleasure in supplying the missing numbers, bound and unbound, without any charge. Reflecting on these facts, it occurred to the editor that some twenty-five or thirty files of bound volumes would be of infinitely greater value to the world in the libraries of the country than reposing in the dust and gloom of warehouses. It was with this in mind that he had a number of cases packed for shipping to the country, where at his leisure he could correspond with such libraries as would care to receive them. Unfortunately, as previously narrated, these cases were not packed until the 17th of April, and these volumes also fell a prey to the flames. Here is another lesson, if one were needed, of the unwisdom of procrastination. These volumes extended over nearly thirty years of California's history; they were indexed volumes, the first period briefly, the last period copiously. Yet these which contained so much material valuable to the historian and the student, by a delay of twenty-four hours in shipping, were not saved, and are now dust and ashes.

Let us return to the generous offers of our subscribers. On reflection, we have come to this conclusion: We are indisposed to accept from them the offer of their bound volumes. If they have taken the trouble to keep and bind them, we think they would now like to keep them. But, doubtless, many of our readers have accumulated unbound numbers of the Argonaut. Many have intended to bind them, but have failed to do so, by reason of not keeping the numbers continuous. Others have simply put the numbers aside in attics or lumber rooms, with no particular end in view concerning them. To these subscribers then we address ourselves. We do not think that these loose and disconnected numbers can be very highly prized by them. Yet to us they would be invaluable. Would it be too much to ask of all subscribers of the Argonaut who happen to have loose and unbound copies of this journal, for which they do not greatly care, to forward the same to us? They may be sent by Wells-Fargo Express addressed "Editor Argonaut, 25 Brown Avenue, San Jose, Cal. Collect." If the trouble be taken to mark them "Newspapers" it will diminish the transportation charge made to us by the express company. If any of our readers have such numbers, and will go to the trouble to forward them to us in this manner, we would be infinitely grateful.

The Argonaut Corrected and Rebuked.

Some weeks ago Mr. A. Hartuppe McKee, writing from Paree, penned a protest concerning certain provincial locutions perpetrated in these columns. Stress of other matters for the time being prevented us from acknowledging Mr. A. Hartkee MacUppe's courteous letter. At the time we were engaged in regulating the destiny of the Old World nations at the Algenciras conference. The moment we got that settled we were forced to turn with a sigh to managing the railway rate bill in the American Congress. Even now we fear that we cannot give to Mr. A. KeeMac Uppehart such time as under other circumstances we would cheerfully accord him, for it is absolutely necessary that we should devote ourselves to attempting to repair the ravages of earthquake and fire.

In the interim, however, between these graver matters, we shall be pleased to take up for a few pleasant moments the discussion of hats, bonnets, "lingerie," "modistes," "chiffons," frubbles, fluffs, fashions and frivolities, so delicately touched upon by Mr. A. Upkee MacHart. But before doing so let us print the note written to us from far Paree:

PARIS, March 24, 1906.
Editor Argonaut: In the Argonaut of February 10, 1906, you speak of the "Gobelin tapestry often presented by the French nation as a wedding gift." You probably mean "Gobelins tapestry." The word "Gobelins" is the name of a family of dyers, who, in the fifteenth century, established themselves in the Faubourg St. Marcel, Paris. In the following century they added to their dye works a tapestry manufactory, the product of the looms since that time being known as "Gobelins." Your error is a very common one with many American periodicals and daily newspapers—almost as common as the incorrect use of the word "modiste" for "dressmaker." The "modiste" is a maker and a designer of hats—a milliner pure and simple, and has nothing to do with dressmaking. A dressmaker is a "couturiere."

Very truly,

A. HARTUPPE MCKEE.

We are desolated to differ with Mr. A. Hartuppe McKee. We did not mean "Gobelins tapestry." Neither is the word "Gobelins" the "name of a family of dyers." It may be the term applied to a number of these famous dyers, added together—aggregated or agglutinated Gobelins, as it were. But it is not "the NAME of the family:" that is "GOBELIN"—la famille Gobelin. We regret also to differ with Mr. A. KeeMac Uppehart when he says the product of their loom since that time is known as "GobelinS." A number of units or integers of their products might be so known, but is not; neither is their "product." Mr. A. UppeMac KeHart may or may not know that even an individual, when he becomes famous in France, is often pluralized: videlicet "Les Moliere," "Les Voltaire;" there was but one of each, and each died childless: there was no little Poquelin, no infant Arouet. There was a Jean Gobelin, who begat little Gobelins. There was a Jean Poquelin (alias Moliere), but he left no little Poquelins. There was an Arouet Junior ("le jeune"—therefore "Arouet le Jenne"—therefore AROUET, LJ.—hence the anagram UOLTAJRE, who lived and died under the pseudonym "Voltaire." Thus, although there was a junior Arouet, he sired no sons, and there never was any Voltaire Junior. Still, in France the plural article is often prefixed to his as well as Moliere's name.

If this be so in the case of an individual, how much the more in the case of a famous family. It was owing to their fame rather than to their plurality that the famous family of dyers became known as "Les Gobelins." Owing to the slight mental confusion which many worthy people carry from the cradle to the grave (not only about numbers, but about genders, and everything else), some, doubtless, may have confused the term "Les Gobelins," the pluralized FAMILY, with "Les Gobelins" the PLACE whence comes the pluralized product. Possibly this confusion may even have affected the mind of our good friend Mr. A. HartMac Uppekee. The establishment is generally known in France as "La Manufacture des Gobelins." This does not mean "the manufacture of gobelins" (which word here to Mr. A. HartKee MacUppe would apparently mean "tapestries"), but it means "The Manufactory of the Gobelins"—or, as we should say in English, "The Manufactory of the Robinsons," if there were several Robinsons.

If Mr. Keeuppe HartMac does not believe this, we beg to point out to him that the "Manufactory of the Gobelins" is situated on the "Avenue of the Gobelins." Even if he confuses the phrase "Manufacture des Gobelins" to mean the manufacture of things, or objects, or products called "gobelins," he could scarcely apply the same reasoning to the name of an avenue. It is simply the "Avenue of the Gobelins," or avenue of the individuals of the Gobelin family.

Purely in the interests of the eternal verities, and not wishing in any way to attack the accuracy of Mr. A. Hartuppe McKee, we beg also to point out to him that the family of dyers, about whose name we differ, did not "in the fifteenth century establish themselves in the Faubourg St. Marcel." They established themselves in the Faubourg St. Marceau. True, the difference between "cel" and "ceau" is only so-so, but still there is a difference.

We now come to the tenth line of the exhortation delivered to the Argonaut by Mr. A. Hartkee McUppe. "Your error is a very common one with many American newspapers,"—he writes—"almost as common as the incorrect use of the word 'modiste' for 'dressmaker.' The 'modiste' is a maker and designer of hats—a milliner pure and simple, and has nothing to do with dressmaking. A dressmaker is a 'couturiere.'"

Defly as it is joined on to the first portion of Mr. KeeMac Uppehart's blast, this dissertation on dressmakers somewhat startled us. Had we been guilty of this crass neologism? On a careful reading, however, we find that it is merely by implication that Mr. A. Uppekee MacHart has accused us of this high crime and misdemeanor. The Argonaut has not sinned in this regard. Its skirts are clear. But we must be careful, because "this is a very common error with many American newspapers." This reminds us of a certain self-possessed Richard III., when a scared super spoiled his cue by rushing on and shouting, "Your Majesty, we have taken the Duke of Buckingham and cut off his head." To which the crook-backed King replied, "Indeed? Gadzooks, and by my halldome I had you not donè so, I would have said, 'OFF WITH HIS HEAD! So much for Buckingham!'" Thus if we had used the word "modiste" for "dressmaker," Mr. A. UppeMac Keehart would have proved to us that the use was incorrect.

Far be it from us to cast reflections on a gentleman who evidently possesses so intimate a knowledge of "dressmaking" as Mr. HartKee MacUppe. He says: "A 'modiste' is a maker and designer of hats, a milliner pure and simple, and has nothing to do with dressmaking. A 'dressmaker' is a 'couturiere.'" We will not enter into a discussion of the exact technical meaning of the word "modiste." There is no doubt that it has come to be used for a maker and vendor of women's hats, and that the words "modes," "modiste," "marchand modiste" are susceptible of varying definitions. There are in fact "marchand modistes" who do not sell hats, but who deal in lingerie or u—d—r—cl—th—g, to put it in the coarser English term at which our modest pen recoils.

But is a dressmaker a "couturiere"?

A painful task is now before us. It is our duty to inform Mr. A. Keemac Uppehart that a dressmaker is NOT a "couturiere." A "couturiere" is a seamstress: "coudre," sew; "coudre," seam: this is as exact a translation as can be made from one language into another. But what gives us most pain is to see that Mr. A. Hartkee McUppe should use such a vulgar word as "dressmaker." Dressmakers are no longer known in the best families. The most exclusive ladies nowadays have, "seamstresses" come to their houses to sew. They would never dream of having their walking gowns, ball gowns, or dinner gowns made at home by a "dressmaker." They may consent occasionally to call in a seamstress—a humble person, who works entirely upon garments reputed not to see the light of day. Madame's cook or her maid may bring in a "dressmaker" by the day to make her dresses, but Madame's gowns are never made by a "dressmaker." In short, a very rich, very swell, very exclusive, and very blue-blooded lady of the present day never utters the word "dressmaker," and does not know what it means. Of course her cloth gowns are made by a "ladies' tailor." In Paree—where, we believe, Mr. A. Uppekee MasHart lives—they are called "tailleur pour dames." Even Milady's silk gowns are also made by the tailor, but none of her outer gowns are ever made by a "dressmaker"; the term has fallen so utterly low that it is only used by people who are utterly impossible, and who never are received in polite society. We very much fear, from his use of this term, that Mr. A. UppeMac KeeHart must at some dreary period have lived in small Western cities in Injvann or Mizzouraw before he went to Paree.

But do not be cast down, MacUppe! Sursum corda, Uppehart! Pardon the blunders of the wild and woolly Westerners, O Uppe-Kee of Paree! and do not forget that

The Gobelins 'll ketch you,

ef you

Organization for San Francisco Policy Holders.

The grave anxiety which has permeated all classes of policy holders in San Francisco touching the conditions and intentions of the fire insurance companies has brought forth a sound suggestion from the San Francisco Examiner. That journal advises the policy holders to organize, and assures them of its earnest support in case they do. The Examiner does not go into details, but the Argonaut would like to suggest that the organization be made in the form of an incorporation. That is the only way in which men can be held together for serious ends. Let us assume, merely for argument, that there are twenty thousand fire insurance policy holders in San Francisco. Suppose the movement for incorporation were begun. All of these men and women, without exception, are seriously alarmed. All of them fear that their just damages will be much cut down; many of them fear that their insurance moneys will be cut in half; and the less cheerful among them are beginning to doubt whether they will get anything at all. Would such a body of men and women hesitate at enrolling themselves in a corporation which would safeguard their moneys, which would at least prevent them from being robbed, which would give them the assurance that their interests were in the hands of both insurance actuaries and attorneys who could cope with the actuaries and attorneys employed by the insurance companies? What hope has the small property owner, say with a policy of $2,000, against the serried lines of the great insurance companies? None at all. If he be ignorant and poor he may be scared out of a just and honest claim. Even men who are keen-witted and rich are beginning to think seriously of placing the adjustment of their insurance in the hands of experienced attorneys, fearing some underhand business, they scarcely know what.

The Hearst newspapers have always shown a disposition to stand on the side of the people as against the corporations. We are aware that many newspapers set this down to selfish motives. We will not enter into that discussion. This journal has not assumed toward Mr. Hearst the unfriendly attitude which has characterized so many newspapers. If he were as selfish and unprincipled as many newspapers and people profess to believe, we do not see why he should spend his millions in printing newspapers in behalf of the common people. He could very easily spend his money, as many millionaires do, in trying to get away what money the common people have. This cannot be said of him. We believe that if the Hearst newspapers were to start such a movement the people would rally around it with the utmost confidence. What is more, we believe that many rich men in California—or men who were rich a month ago—would stop sneering at Mr. Hearst and his newspapers, and would be glad to join in such a movement, and save what they can from the wreck of their fortunes.

Therefore we urge upon Mr. Hearst that he initiate such a movement. With his powerful chain of newspapers throughout the country to back them up, an incorporated organization of many thousands of policy holders could so direct their campaign against the insurance companies as to bring them speedily to terms. Individual liability exists in California and doubtless in other States as well. Even if all the insurance companies should go into voluntary liquidation, a large corporation of policy holders, controlling great resources and backed by powerful newspapers, could soon succeed in forcing the stockholders in many States to meet their just obligations.

What say you, Mr. Hearst? If you are a friend of the plain people, in what better way could you make all of the people friendly to you than to aid them now?

The Optimism of Our Sister Cities.

The appearance of a pretty picture in an Eastern weekly now lying on our desk has convinced us that those readers are right who believe that we do not publish enough optimistic editorials. This picture is entitled "The New San Francisco." It represents a beautiful female figure standing on one of the headlands of the Golden Gate. Over the bosom of the broad Pacific there float toward her countless argosies of ships with billowing sails.

(As a matter of fact, there are no such things as argosies; "countless ships" would get into trouble with the Custom House; the sea-borne commerce of the world is not carried in lime-juicers or American clippers with lofty masts, but in those marine tea-kettles called ocean tramps.)

But we diverge. The beautiful female figure is gazing seaward at the landbound argosies, a pleased smile on her scarlet lips, while her fine eyes are lighted up with anticipation and her cheeks are flushed with excitement. In her hand she holds a new mural crown made up of towering sky-scrapers and reinforced concrete buildings of the most approved modern construction. The colors of sea and sky are like those of a Turner sea-scape, and the picture is chromatic and beautiful. The pretty lady in it does not look at all like the grimy, hollow-eyed figure, weeping bitterly, who is crouched in the ashes amid the blackened ruins by the Golden Gate.

Yet how much better it is to print such rosy colored pictures than to publish things as they really are. When we saw this lovely chromo, and thought how much better it made people feel than gazing on the reality, we reflected with pain that we had discussed these matters from a different point of view. Still there is some excuse for us. When a man sees a city of steel skeletons, of tottering, windowless walls, of vast mounds of twisted steel and iron girders and beams—when he gazes on such a ruin, the ruin of what used to be a city, the ruin of a city where he was born and where he had lived nearly all his life—he may be pardoned for a slight tinge of melancholy.

But we have heard so much of the necessity for optimism that we have come to the conclusion that such feelings are weak and unmanly. We are going to be good and cheer up. Cherries are ripe.

It is related of a Scottish editor that he once employed a writing young man to come down from London to Glasgow. He informed the Cockney that he wanted him to write humorous editorials. "I joke myself," said the editorial Scot, "but I realize that I joke wi' deefficulty." So it is with us. With San Francisco's ruins obsessing us like a nightmare it is difficult for us to write optimistic editorials. But write them we must, say our friends.

Give us a little time.

If we may not write them ourselves, however, we may at least copy some optimistic editorials.

It is Rochefoucauld who says that people always take a certain amount of comfort out of the misfortunes of their friends. The Argonaut has been much struck by the calmness, the resignation, the fortitude with which the misfortunes of San Francisco have been borne—by Los Angeles, by San Diego, by Oakland, and by Portland. We have also been much impressed by the optimism with which these sister cities contemplate the effects of the disaster on the future—that is, on the future of San Francisco.

We will therefore copy a few optimistic editorials. We have mislaid them, and therefore are forced to quote from memory. But they so deeply impressed us that they are probably reasonably accurate. In the Oakland Clarion of a recent date we found the following chunk of optimism:

"It is quite evident that it will require years instead of months to clear away the debris in San Francisco. Weeks have passed, and the work has scarcely begun. It took fifty years to bring the vast amount of brick and mortar, steel and iron, into the present burned district. Surely the people of San Francisco should not grow impatient; in a matter of five or ten years they can easily clear it away.

"In the meantime Oakland offers to them every inducement for comfortable, healthful habitations and admirable facilities for doing business of every kind. She has the finest waterfront on San Francisco harbor, far superior to that of the late city of San Francisco. Oakland is the terminal point of two great transcontinental railroads, and will shortly be the terminal point of a third. Already some hundreds of merchants of the late city of San Francisco have established themselves in our midst, most of whom will remain.

"None the less, San Francisco must cheer up. True, she will never be the first city on the Coast again; that title is destined to remain with Oakland. But she may rest assured of the fact that she will always be the second city. Oakland will loyally assist her stricken sister city to keep ahead of Los Angeles in the procession.

"In the meantime, the former residents and business men of San Francisco are assured that there are many desirable sites for business establishments and private residences still to be obtained in Oakland on the most reasonable terms."

We found another optimistic editorial in a recent number of the Sacramento Capital, which ran as follows:

"While the sympathy of Sacramento goes forth in bountiful measure to her stricken sister city, San Francisco, we cannot help but call attention to the fact that the great interior valley of the State was practically free from the effects of the recent earthquake. It was highly localized in character, confined almost entirely to the region around the bay. Oakland, San Jose and other cities there suffered severely, while the shock on the peninsula where San Francisco stands was of the most terrifying description. Nothing like it has ever been known in the history of California.

"Why was this shock not felt in Sacramento? This is the reason. It is evident that the vast bed of alluvial soil between the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range mountains acts as a sort of buffer, thus protecting us from the dreadful shocks which have desolated San Francisco in the past, and which, alas, may also destroy it in the future. When we think of the dreadful fate which San Francisco barely escaped in the recent dreadful cataclysm, and when we reflect that their inevitable doom, like the sword of Damocles, hangs over the heads of the unfortunate dwellers down at the bay, we can scarcely restrain our tears.

"Still, there is a remedy for all those who are not absolutely forced to remain in that city. Why not come to Sacramento? The climate is excellent—a little warm in summer, but what of that? Among our ninety-seven varieties of mosquitoes, we point with pride to the fact that the Malaria Mosquito, the Anopheles, and the Yellow Fever Mosquito, the Stegomyia, are utterly unknown. All of our mosquitoes are house-broken, and most of them stay out on the lawn all the time. Sacramento is proud of her mosquitoes.

"Infinitely superior as are the advantages of Sacramento as a place for residence and business compared with the cloudy, bleak, foggy city of San Francisco with its awful earthquakes and its dreadful fires, still we trust that our afflicted fellow-citizens will not grow despondent. Let them cheer up. In the course of ten or fifteen years they will doubtless clear away the debris, and probably inside of a generation they will have rebuilt their city almost as good as it was before. Do not despair."

In the Los Angeles Times-Herald we found a scientific optimistic editorial, which we partly reproduce here:

"A total absence in Los Angeles of any tremors of the earth, no matter how slight, during the recent dreadful cataclysm which destroyed San Francisco, has attracted much attention among the favored dwellers here. When they read the accounts of what took place in San Francisco it fairly makes their blood run cold. Credible narratives are told of six-story hotels telescoping on themselves and sinking down in the bowels of the earth; cracks six feet wide and a hundred feet deep are still to be seen on Market street; the seawall on the waterfront split off from the mainland and fell into the bay; out in the Mission District some of the streets which formerly were straight are now bent in the form of the letter S; Nob Hill was split fairly in twain, and the United Railroads Company is now using the enormous earthquake crevice through that hill as a railway cutting for its track. These statements have been suppressed or minimized by the journals of San Francisco, but they are entirely true. We are informed on the best of authority that the estimate of four hundred dead is false, and that the authorities threw several thousand bodies into the ocean near Baker's Beach, whence they floated out to sea.

"We have interviewed Professor Honk, the famous geologist, and asked his opinion concerning the reason for our freedom from any earthquake shocks in or around Los Angeles. The professor informs us that a vast bed of Miocene shale surrounds this city, running to a depth of probably twenty miles. In the post-Jurassic Time it is evident that glacial action eroded the old red sandstone moraines; hence accordean pleats were made in the selva or edging of the folds of the mountains. [This word "folds" comes from the Spanish "faldas," showing that even in the old Colonial or Spanish times and in her Mexican days Los Angeles was entirely free from earthquake shocks.] In the Quaternary Period, or Age of Man, the Mesozoic ooze saturated or impregnated this shale. This, taken in conjunction with the accordeon pleats, constitute a vast buffer, which prevents the awful earthquake shocks of the cataclysmic zone surrounding San Francisco from extending to this favored neighborhood.

"On the other hand, as Professor Honk points out, San Francisco is probably one of the most awful specimens of metamorphic catastrophism known to geologists. In a very recent geological period it is quite evident that the land under the present Bay of San Francisco suddenly sunk, and the peninsula was at once thrown up violently into the air. The islands in San Francisco harbor are the tops of sunken mountains which once rose high above the Coast Range. What has occurred before may occur again. Much as we regret the recent dreadful disaster in San Francisco, we greatly fear that it will be repeated on an even more cataclysmic scale. Suppose the phenomenon should be reversed—suppose the bottom of the bay should suddenly rise up—suppose Goat Island, Alcatraz Island, and Angel Island should begin to rock and wiggle—suppose the bay should suddenly run violently down through the Golden Gate into the sea, like the herd of swine in the Bible, what would happen to San Francisco then?

"Ah, what indeed!

"But far be it from us to indulge in gloomy or pessimistic pictures. Rather let us take an optimistic view. We believe in optimism. San Francisco will doubtless some day recover from this awful, this crushing blow. In twenty-five or thirty years she will surely be able to clear away the debris. In the course of one or two generations she will probably again build herself up. But she must never again hope to occupy the position of Queen City of the Pacific. That title of Queen City belongs to Los Angeles—to the City of Our Lady the Queen of the Angels, which title is handed down by right of lineal descent from the Spanish days.

"As for that poor, petty, punky little San Francisco bedroom across the bay, sometimes called Oakland, its arrogance and impudence in presuming to think that it has any show in getting San Francisco's business only makes us Angelenos laugh. And as for Seattle, Tacoma and Portland, we would like them all to know that Los Angeles IS IT.

"Turning from these material questions to more emotional ones, let us again assure our stricken sister city of the keen sympathy felt for her by Los Angeles, and our belief that San Francisco will recover before the century's end. But do not be in a hurry. Be calm. Take it coolly. And San Francisco will probably again some day be the second city of California."

Another optimistic editorial we discovered in the columns of the San Diego Pacific:

When Juan Cabeza de Cavaca sailed around Port Loma what did he see? He saw San Diego. But what else did he see? He saw the Cuyamaca mountains. Are they volcanic? No. What else did he see? He saw the desert. Did he see any earthquake indications? No, of course, he didn't. All the records of all the explorers who have visited San Diego from the earliest times to the present show that the thermometer has always stood at 70 degrees Fahrenheit, and that earthquakes have been unknown. Vasco Nunes de Balboa, San Juan Capistrano, Fray Antonio Agapida, El Último Suspiro del Moro, Martiornes de Sancho Panza—all of these visited San Diego: Did any of them say anything about earthquakes? Not a word. There was the intrepid Don Fulano de Coronado, after whom was named the present fine hotel (summer rates $4.00 a day, see ad. on page 4); did he ever say anything about earthquakes? No, of course not. Why? Because there were none.

"When the recent disaster destroyed the unfortunate city of San Francisco the people of San Diego did not even know that an earthquake had occurred. This unbroken record of an earthquakeless earth comes down, as will be seen, from the earliest times. All the Spanish explorers tell the same story. In short, in San Diego in historic times there never has been an earthquake.

[WHAT WAS THAT? Did you feel that? Was it a shock? There's the SECOND SHOCK. Get into the doorway; it's the safest place—After you—no—never mind, I'll go out by the window. Yes, that was a corker. I see you have brought out your note-book, Miss Smith. We'll just finish the article out here, if you don't mind, in the open air. No pencils, eh? Well, I wouldn't go back in the house if I were you. Here, I have several pencils in my pocket; you may have them. Can't catch hold of them, you say? Well, just grab a-holt. My hand is a little shaky this morning, for a fact. Ha! Ha! Ha! Let me see, where did I leave off? Read the last few words. Oh, yes.]

"In historic times there never has been an earthquake in San Diego. So great is the distance between it and the shaking city of San Francisco that the effects of any shock there could scarcely have been felt here. It is hundreds of miles away. But, furthermore, the geologic conditions existing are such that the earth movements coming from the dreadful cataclysmic or earthquake zone surrounding San Francisco are taken up, and lose themselves before reaching this fortunate spot.

"The dwellers in San Diego, blessed as they are with the finest climate in the world, and free from the tornadoes and cyclones of the East and awful earthquakes like those which have destroyed San Francisco, should not forget to sympathize with their stricken fellow-citizens of that city in their calamity. True, San Diego is destined to profit by the destruction of San Francisco, for we have the finest harbor on the coast. But purely material considerations like these should not cause us for a moment to fail in lack of sympathy for the late city of San Francisco. The scattered inhabitants of that hamlet which was once a city may always be sure of receiving a warm welcome when they come to San Diego."

Another optimistic and theologic editorial we find in a recent number of the Portland Tripod:

"There are not a few people in the State of Oregon who take a somewhat harsh view of the recent destruction of San Francisco. They say that it is a judgment of God on San Francisco because she was an evil city. There may be something in this, but we are disposed to consider it too severe a view. It is true that Oregon was populated almost entirely by God-fearing and religious immigrants from the better part of the Western Reserve. San Francisco, on the other hand, was populated almost entirely by Sidney convicts, murderers, thieves, thugs, black-legs, gamblers and disreputable persons generally, male and female. These facts are notorious—anybody can find them in Bret Harte's stories. Oregon has always looked with horror on the dreadful moral conditions which prevail in San Francisco. That perished city, in many respects, was like the evil cities of the plain. Therefore it is that our people entertain these harsh views of which we speak, looking upon the destruction of San Francisco as a direct judgment from God.

"Waiving this disputed point, how shall we explain the utter freedom from earthquakes characterizing Oregon and particularly Portland? For it is a fact that earthquakes are almost entirely unknown in this favored land. The terrible cataclysm which destroyed San Francisco a few weeks ago was not felt here at all. The Reverend Melchizedech Howler, while visiting us in the editorial room of the Tripod yesterday, made quite an ingenious explanation. There is, he says, a distinct religious atmosphere pervading the State of Oregon. No such atmosphere is found in California. In San Francisco the conditions are even hostile to religion. Many people there go to the Park on Sundays. Given the existence of hundreds of thousands of persons in Oregon believing strongly in religion, will not such a belief create so dense a religious atmosphere as to have some effect on the material atmosphere? What, after all, is belief but spiritual waves which impinge upon the ether waves of the material atmosphere? Everyone knows that the atmosphere under certain conditions is highly electrical. Will not these spiritual ether waves have their effect on the electrical waves of the atmosphere? Will not the atmospheric electrical equipoise be changed by the pervasion of these ether waves? The electric theory of earthquakes is generally accepted nowadays. May it not be that the strong religious feeling which creates a distinct and dense atmosphere in Oregon thus neutralize the electric atmospheric conditions which bring about earthquakes?

"The Tripod does not say explicitly that the theory of the Reverend Mr. Howler is correct, but there is certainly something in it. It is well worth considering. But at least it cannot be denied that San Francisco was food fit for the burning. Greatly she has sinned. She must bear her cross with resignation. She must bow to the decrees of an inscrutable Providence. Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. The least said the soonest mended. Never cry over spilled milk. There is a golden lining to every cloud.

"San Francisco should cheer up and not be despondent. In the course of forty or fifty years she may be again upright and rise out of her slough of despond, moral and material. And then she may perhaps be the second city on the Pacific Coast. For however little we in Portland may be disposed to profit by the misfortunes of San Francisco, it follows as the night the day that our magnificent port facilities will inevitably make us the Queen City of the Pacific."

Who could fail to be cheered and encouraged after reading such optimistic editorials? Optimism must certainly mean not only hopefulness, but likewise a belief in what we want to believe.

Stop Bragging and Tell the Truth.

Some of our readers—not many—seem to think we take an "unduly gloomy view" of the situation in San Francisco. We do not believe this to be possible. During and after the cataclysm last month the unfortunate citizens of our metropolis suffered from all the elements, earth, air, fire and water. After having been shaken by the earthquake, the greater part of the city was destroyed by fire. Then, while thousands of invalids and delicate women and children were camping in the open air, some most unusual atmospheric conditions set in; storms unheard of at this season in California began. Then followed artificial earthquakes and cyclones caused by injudicious dynamiting, which in many cases did more harm than either the earthquake or the fire. On the heels of all this came complete stagnation of business, the closing of the banks, and the threats of the insurance companies to evade their obligations.

Does such a picture as that need artificial aid to add to its gloom? We do not think so. Nor have we depicted it in as dark colors as are used by other journals at distant points. Here, for example, is a clipping from a Boston journal just to hand:

San Francisco does not yet realize its terrible situation, and it will be some time before its people can come to a complete understanding of the problems of life and death before them. The situation in all its fearful aspects is not appreciated. The vast hordes there are helpless and are groping in the dark.

Individual venturesome spirits here and there are building up temporary wooden shacks for the merchants in small retail business, but nothing of a permanent character is being attempted.

The problem of erecting a great city, under the most favorable of conditions, would be an appalling task in its life when one considers the almost endless details that entered into the making of a great community. But the problem presented there is so absolutely awful to contemplate in all its entirety that the most comprehensive mind fails to find a loophole through the gloom.

All factories, business houses, offices—in short, every avenue of active work for the masses—are destroyed, the population of these districts, formerly rich and poor, alike, are without homes or means to build one; and, again, as if to add the last touch to this Dantesque study, the houses that stand are only shelters, not homes, because the earthquake has left its mark over all and no place is safe, no fires can be built in any building because of the conditions of the chimneys, and many houses are even dangerous to live in.

The Argonaut's comments on the situation have been roseate, indeed, compared with the foregoing.

Most of the trades unions report that about half of their members are idle and in want. Annexed will be found a paragraph from the report made by the local Typographical Union to the International Typographical Union at Indianapolis. It gives the view of craftsmen of the higher grades, like printers, who are usually intelligent and skillful artisans. In their recommendations to their members and to their fellow-craftsmen elsewhere, their officers naturally attempt to state the truth. We are aware that many will set down their statements as due to a selfish desire to keep down the number of unemployed printers here in order to keep up the union rate of wages. But unfortunately the statements are true. The number of printing plants destroyed is so great that many men are out of work. The number of remaining plants is so small that they are rushed with work. But a large number of men must remain idle by reason of the lack of plants to keep them employed. The paragraph from the report runs as follows:

The immediate future for printers is anything but bright. Since the earthquake five of the six daily newspapers have been publishing small papers from Oakland offices, one of them having suspended for the time being; it will be weeks before any of them will remove from Oakland. And when they do, as every one of the department stores, and all of the wholesale and retail firms were wiped out by the fire, it will be months before an appreciable number of these firms resume large advertising. Therefore, even if the papers were now re-established, the volume of business available would not commence to utilize the number of men formerly employed. With advertising and subscriptions reduced, it follows no department of the newspapers will suffer more than the composing room. We look for greatly reduced forces on all the newspapers.

In the job branch there has been a great rush of printing. But the work has been in the main the result of efforts by burned-out firms to maintain their identity by establishing temporary offices, which necessitates office stationery and other printing. The vast number of commercial houses cannot resume in anything approaching normal. We shall be very fortunate if within a year two-thirds of our former membership shall find employment. Means must be found to avert suffering among them.

The reports that all of the homeless are well cared for only means that the people are sleeping on the ground with a canvas covering, and that they stand in line for coffee and bread, and other rations. This is all right for the time being, but it is the hard times of the immediate future that most concern us.

It is not our purpose in issuing this statement to raise a calamity cry for funds. The situation is presented just as it exists at this writing.

Nothing that the Argonaut has printed could compare with the blackness and gloom of these pictures. In discussing the calamity, all we have endeavored to do is to tell the truth. And a large number of our readers agree with us in thinking that the unpalatable truth is better than sugar-coated falsehood, as is shown by their letters.

In the present crisis the Argonaut believes it not only right to tell the truth, but wise as well. The tone of excessive optimism and boastfulness indulged in by the San Francisco press has deceived the country at large. The people of the East have concluded that the disaster is not so great after all. They could scarcely believe otherwise after reading the boastful accounts copied from the San Francisco newspapers and telegraphed all over the world. They have also come to the conclusion that the relief fund raised for California is over twenty millions of dollars and that it is large enough. One Eastern paper, as we pointed out last week, was so much impressed with this fact that it suggested to the local relief committee that California had received enough money and that they had better keep what they had on hand for local sufferers.

The same effect has been produced in Congress. Our representatives there write private letters saying that Congress believes that the distress resulting from the San Francisco disaster has been somewhat exaggerated; that more than enough money has been appropriated by Congress for general relief in California; that the appropriations for the reconstruction of federal buildings are causing jealousy among the representatives from other parts of the country; that the attempt of Governor Pardee to get the United States to pay us certain undisputed claims for moneys belonging to California, and now in the United States Treasury, is being "held up" by Speaker Cannon; that much impatience with California's demands is being shown generally in both branches of Congress. This is the tone of letters received from California Congressmen. They profess themselves seriously embarrassed in their attempts to secure routine appropriations for ordinary purposes, and allege that they are met continually with the querulous cry, "When is California going to let up? Hasn't she got enough?"

To corroborate these letters of Congressmen, it is becoming evident that the country has almost ceased to contribute toward the California Relief Fund. Yet the need will be greater in the months to come than now. The country at large is becoming impressed with the idea that the need is not so great as was supposed, and that the relief funds contributed are much greater than needed.

All of these false views, in our opinion, are due to the boastful, bombastic and untruthful narratives sent out by certain of the San Francisco newspapers. Still, sugar-coated untruths are probably more palatable to many people than the cold plain truth, which is often bitter. There are more agreeable topics to discuss than the fate of several hundred thousand people suddenly reduced to idleness, penury and pauperism.

Subscribers Who Have Missed Numbers.

A perfect hailstorm of letter still showers upon us from subscribers who have missed numbers of the Argonaut since the 18th of April. In every case we are sending the missing numbers to the subscribers in question, all of whom speak earnestly of their feeling over its failure to arrive. It is indeed flattering that people should miss the visits of a weekly newspaper in the face of such a cataclysm as has desolated some of the cities of California.

We must again, however, assure our readers that the Argonaut has not interrupted its publication. We did not miss a single number. We believe that this cannot be said of any other publication of which we have knowledge in San Francisco, for all the San Francisco dailies missed at least one issue, and some of them several, while one has not yet resumed. The Argonaut did not miss a single issue. Furthermore, each issue has been sent to every paid subscriber on our mailing lists. There are some thousands of people who failed to get the paper because they do not receive it direct from us through the mails, but by the medium of carriers, newsboys and news vendors of whom they are regular customers. Over such copies of course we have no control. Furthermore, the San Francisco News Company had its means of distribution so paralyzed by the disaster that it also failed to serve its customers, who take some thousands of copies. But every mail subscriber to the Argonaut had his copy put into the care of the postoffice, carefully addressed and postpaid, the 21st of April, immediately following the fire; the foreign subscribers, as usual, had their copies all single-stamped. Since that date the numbers for April 28, May 5, May 12 and May 19, have all been duly issued, addressed, postpaid and put in the Postoffice. If they have failed to reach our subscribers it is not our fault; we have done all we could. However, we have taken pleasure in forwarding those numbers in every case to mail subscribers who have not received them, and shall continue to do so.

Of course we did not mail any papers to addresses in the burnt district of San Francisco, for that would have merely caused useless labor to the Postoffice and would have been of no advantage to the subscribers.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Los Angeles Pictures of San Francisco.

Accompanying this note Mr. Campbell sends us a booklet craftily concocted to inculcate the belief that San Francisco was destroyed by earthquake instead of fire—which is utterly false.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 15, 1906.

My Dear Mr. Hart: May I call your attention to the enclosed: "The Picture Story of the San Francisco Earthquake"? It is published in Los Angeles, and on the first inside page you will see the following: "Los Angeles, 500 miles distant, experienced naught but a slight tremor, appreciable only in the taller buildings." It then proceeds to give pictures illustrating the disaster of the 18th in San Francisco, and attributing, apparently, everything to the earthquake and little to the fire. For instance, see on the page whose leaf I have turned down, a cut of the City Hall, San Francisco. It is entitled "A Close View of the City Hall," and then follow these words: "The fire did not reach this building."

We know that the City Hall was damaged by the earthquake, and we know also that its contents were destroyed by the subsequent fire.

I have taken the liberty of sending you this and of communicating with you because this pamphlet, apparently prepared by an earnest lover of Los Angeles, can have but one purpose and that is a most unfair portrayal of the results of the disaster in San Francisco and a gross misrepresentation of facts. We of San Francisco ought to find neighborliness at least from cities near in California.

The enclosed was found in an Oakland bookshop yesterday, and possibly you have not seen it. It is sent to you for the interest that it may bear. Whatever use you may make of it, you will at least sympathize with me in the feeling of indignation which such a publication must produce in every loyal San Franciscan. We know we have met with disaster; we know we are down; but we do not believe we are "out," and we do not want our brothers and sisters of other California cities to lie about us.

I have no knowledge, direct or indirect, of the individuals who publish this pamphlet. I never heard of them to my knowledge before yesterday, and I am not particularly anxious to hear of them again.

With very kind regards,

Most sincerely yours,

DONALD G. CAMPBELL.

From the Governor of Hawaii.

DEL MONTE, May 19, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Please begin anew my subscription from date of first issue after the fire. Mail me here all issues up to and including this week, after which to my old address, Honolulu, Hawaii. My former subscription was made to January 1, but it is only fair to begin a new record.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE R. CARTER.

Some weeks ago the Governor of Hawaii, being very ill, was ordered by his physicians to this Coast. He arrived here in time to go through the disaster of a few weeks ago. We are glad to see by his letter that his health has not suffered in consequence, but that he has apparently much improved. For a man who has been desperately ill, and who still can take the trouble to write a letter renewing and extending his subscription to a newspaper for which he has already paid, is certainly taking altruistic and optimistic views of life. We congratulate Governor Carter on his improved health and thank him for his encouraging letter and the extension of his subscription, which, however, we shall take the liberty of dating from the expiration of his present one—not, be it understood, because we are looking a gift horse in the mouth, but simply to keep our accounts straight.—EDITOR ARGONAUT.

It Is Only Temporary.

We have received the following note from the St. Louis Public Library, our answer to which may give some information frequently requested by others:

PUBLIC LIBRARY, St. Louis, Mo., May 15, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: The change in size of the Argonaut complicates our arrangements for binding. Will you kindly tell us whether the change is to be permanent or only temporary? We appreciate your difficulties, and only ask in order that we may know how to plan. Your pluck is a thing to admire.

Respectfully yours,

F. M. CRUNDEN, Librarian.

A French Reader of the Argonaut.

A French reader sends the following note, expressing her sympathy, and stating that it is impossible to purchase the Argonaut in San Francisco. This we regret, but we have been unable to supply the paper to those readers of the Argonaut who are not on our mailing list. By this mail we enclose to the lady all of the copies that have appeared since April 18th.

le 19 Avril, 1906.

Monsieur Hart: Il m'est presque impossible de me passer de votre estimable Journal que j'achète depuis des années.

Comme il est introuvable a San Francisco je vous serais infiniment obligé de m'envoyer les numeros paru depuis la date nefaste du 18 Avril. A part le numero du 12 mai, que j'ai pu trouver.

Je vous enverrais immédiatement en timbre poste les prix des numeros dont vous pourriez disposer.

J'ai bien l'honneur de vous saluer,

For and Against Corporations.

The following letter is by T. P. Andrews, foreman of the late Grand Jury. In it Mr. Andrews disavows sympathy with Municipal Ownership, and incidentally says that "Hammering the Southern Pacific" is, in his opinion, not in favor in San Francisco to-day.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 17, 1906.

Mr. Albert M. Johnson, President Municipal Ownership League—Dear Sir: I beg to acknowledge receipt of a circular dated May 14 and signed by yourself as President and by Mr. Edw. P. E. Troy as Secretary.

I see that my name was attached to the call for the meeting of this league to be held at the office of T. E. Hayden, 2450 California street on Saturday, May 19 at 3 p. m. I am surprised and regret to see my name attached to this call as it is without my sanction or authority. I am not in harmony or in sympathy with the proposition of Municipal Ownership. I never have been nor do I ever expect to. My views on this matter have been very pronounced and positive for a great many years. I am satisfied that had I been consulted in regard to this and had you known my opinion my name would not have been attached to the call for the meeting.

With reference to such corporations as the Southern Pacific Company, the United Railways and the Spring Valley Water Works my opinion is that the people of San Francisco, looking back and reviewing the stand they have taken, and the wonderful help and assistance they have rendered the community since April 18 that we should congratulate ourselves that we have them with us during our hours of trial and tribulation.

We have all criticized and hammered the Southern Pacific in the past, but in my estimation San Francisco today is under a great obligation to Mr. Harriman. I doubt very much if the debt can ever be paid. I fear most of our people do not realize and appreciate what the Southern Pacific Company has done for San Francisco since the earthquake.

The Spring Valley Water Company with their usual energy jumped in to the breach and by superhuman efforts repaired the damage done their system. They certainly deserve the appreciation of the entire community for so promptly putting their system in repair and furnishing water as promptly as they did.

In regard to the United Railways I have always been a warm advo-cater of the overhead trolley. Long before the disaster I argued and preached with our property owners in favor of this system and viewed with surprise and regret the opposition of some of our large and prominent property owners. I am a firm believer in rapid transit and now that we are about to get it I am delighted and feel sure that it will be welcomed by nearly the entire population of San Francisco.

Holding such radical views, which are at such a variance to these advocated by your association, naturally bars me from endorsing them and would certainly prevent my participating in any movement tending to support them.

Some one in using my name had blundered.
Very truly,

T. P. ANDREWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I am authorized to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the Argonaut Earthquake Edition, April 21, 1906, which you were so good as to send to the Smithsonian Institution. I beg to say that this number is of such historical interest that it will be placed with the historical collections.

THE RAILWAY RATE BILL PASSED.

Some Interesting Notes on the Greatest Debate the Senate Has Seen for Thirty Years.

The President and the Senators—Mr. Roosevelt's Controversy With Senator Tillman and Senator Bailey—Questions of Veracity—Ex-Senator Chandler Involved—The Democratic Senators Accuse Mr. Roosevelt of Bad Faith—Republican Journals Accuse the Democrats of Attempting to Concoct a Plot Against the President.

On May 18, after seventy days of almost continuous deliberation, the Senate passed the railroad rate bill by the practically unanimous vote of 71 to 3. The three negative votes were cast by Senators Foraker, Republican of Ohio, and Morgan and Pettus, Democrats, of Alabama. It may be summarized thus:

The principal purpose of the railroad rate bill is to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates, and to investigate complaints of unjust and unreasonable charges on the part of common carriers. It also authorizes an inquiry as to whether rates or practices are "unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial or otherwise in violation of the act," and in case any of these conditions are found to exist, the Commission is empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable maximum rate and what regulation or practice is just, reasonable and fair. Further authority is given the Commission to enforce its orders. Other powers conferred are to apportion joint fares, establish through routes and maximum joint rates and prescribe their division, and to determine the compensation to be paid to shippers doing service for carriers.

Another provision renders legal the service of the orders of the Commission through the mails, and provides that these orders shall take effect thirty days after service unless suspended or modified by the Commission, or suspended or set aside by the courts.

The bill was amended by the Senate so as to give the United States Circuit Courts jurisdiction to entertain suits brought to annul or change the orders of the Commission, and to provide against the granting of interlocutory decrees without the hearing and making appeals from such orders direct to the Supreme Court.

Other provisions extend the definition of the word railroad so as to make it include switches, spurs, tracks, terminal facilities, freight depots, yards and grounds, and define the word "transportation" so as to make it embrace cars and other facilities for shipment or carriage, "irrespective of ownership or any contract," the intention being to make the railroads responsible for all special car service.

Senate amendments include oil pipe lines, express companies, shipping car companies, under the head of "common carriers," and make them amenable to the requirements of the bill. Other Senate modifications prohibit the issuance of passes or the granting of special favors to one class of passengers over another; prohibit railroad companies from transporting commodities produced by themselves; require such companies to put in switches at the reasonable request of shippers; prohibit the granting or acceptance of rebates, and reinstate the imprisonment penalty for violation of the law.

Circuit and District Courts of the United States are given jurisdiction over all complaints by the Commission of failure to comply with its orders, and such courts are required to issue writs of mandamus compelling such compliance.

The long debate in the Senate on the Railway bill attracted the attention of the whole country. The debate gradually became confined to the ablest lawyers in the Senate. Although the points involved are law points, they do not seem too abstruse for laymen to understand them. As the daily papers gave a great deal of space to the matter without making it very clear, the Argonaut has thought it well to attempt to present a comprehensive statement of the matter.

The speeches by Foraker, Lodge, Spooner, Rayner, Knox, Bailey and others constitute, in the opinion of the Philadelphia Ledger, "one of the most remarkable series of speeches ever delivered in the history of the Senate." And the Boston Herald questions whether the Senate has even, during the present generation, shown in any discussion more of the qualities of statesmanship.

Three Groups of Senators.

There was a great changing of alignments in the Senate, not based entirely upon party lines. Three groups of Senators gradually defined themselves. One group, led by Senator Dolliver, wanted the Hepburn bill passed substantially as it came from the lower house, with its very brief and incidental reference to review by the courts. The second, led by Senators Spooner and Knox, wanted an amendment providing for full review by the courts of the rates decreed by the commission, it only as to their "lawfulness" and "constitutionality" but as to their furnishing "just compensation." The third group, led by Senator Bailey, wanted judicial review, but did not want this judicial review to extend to the power of setting aside the rates issued by writs of injunction issued before a full hearing of both sides.

The Outlook summed up the various views taken as concisely as may be. Its summary is appended:

According to the Conservative View, the Constitution definitely vests the judicial power of the United States both in law and equity in certain courts to be established by the Congress. These phrases, "judicial power," "law," "equity," had at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a well-defined historical meaning—a meaning determined by the history and traditions of the Anglo-Saxon people. No authority was given to the Congress to limit the judicial power which the Constitution declared should be vested in the courts; to the Congress was given only the task of calling the courts into existence. As soon as they were created the "judicial power" was vested in them by the Constitution, and that power Congress has no power to take away, limit or modify. In support of this contention is cited among other authorities Judge Story, of the Supreme Court, in the case of Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee.

Based upon these principles and this Supreme Court authority, Senator Spooner thus states the conservative position for which he contends:

"They (the framers of the Constitution) intended by the Constitution to create, and did create, three co-ordinate and independent branches of the Government, to each of which was assigned its proper function, clothed with the power essential to their proper discharge. They intended that each should be in its sphere absolutely free from invasion by the others. They created the legislative department to enact rules of action, the executive department to administer the laws, the judicial department (the weakest of all in a way) to hold each of the others—the legislative and the executive—strictly to the limitations of the Constitution. Each was to be permanent as the Government itself, until changed by the people."

According to the radical view the Constitution does not define judicial power. Given to Congress the authority to create the courts, it leaves with Congress the authority to define in detail the powers which those courts may exercise. Congress has Constitutional authority to abolish the courts which it has created; but authority to destroy all the power of the courts necessarily involves authority to limit their powers. Congress frequently has thus limited the judicial power of the courts and has been uniformly sustained by the Supreme Court in so doing. Thus by statute Congress has defined both the punishment which the courts may inflict for contempt, and the cases in which punishment may be inflicted; has limited the power to grant mandamus to certain specified cases; has forbidden the courts to issue executions against the person in enforcement of their judgments, but the provision that "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any State on process issuing from a court of the United States when by the laws of such State imprisonment for debt has been or shall be abolished." In these and other analogous cases the Supreme Court has affirmed the Constitutionality of the acts of Congress. Basing his argument upon these principles and these and other analogous authorities cited from the decisions of the Supreme Court, Senator Bailey answers the question whether Congress can limit the powers of the Federal Courts in the following language:

"That they have inherent powers in one sense is true; that is, if you create a Federal Court, and do not expressly forbid it to exercise certain powers, it possesses them by virtue of its creation. Such is the power to issue an execution to enforce its judgment; such is the power to punish summarily for contempt; and yet the books are full of cases which affirm the power of Congress to prohibit this right of the court to issue execution or to punish for contempt, except according to the statute. When the Supreme Court expressly has decided that Congress can regulate the power of a Circuit Court to issue an execution, in God's name how can a lawyer contend that Congress can not regulate the right of that court to issue a mere interlocutory decree?"

If Senator Bailey is right, Congress could abolish all equity jurisprudence, the whole system of injunctions and mandamus, could substitute for a punitive administration of justice a purely reformatory system, could so curb and limit the power of the courts as to deprive the individual of a very important if not an absolutely essential safeguarding of his person and property. If Senator Spooner is right, the courts possess a power greater than Congress itself, and can neither be deprived of their present powers nor invested with new powers if those which they now possess are inadequate.

Senator Bailey's Great Speech.

The most notable incident in the great Senatorial debate has been the attention excited by the speech of the Senator from Texas:

Senator Bailey replied to Senators Knox and Spooner who maintained that if the Federal courts be authorized by Congress to review the rates at all, that authority must extend to the issuing of injunctions. Senator Knox's bill provided for this, but required a bond to be supplied by the railroad to cover the cost to the shipper of the difference in rates caused by the injunction. Senator Bailey insisted that the third article of the Federal Constitution, which declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," makes all the Federal courts, except the Supreme Court alone, the creatures of Congress and subject to its unlimited restriction.

Case after case was quoted by Senator Bailey to prove this point. Here is a sample quotation from the Supreme Court's decision in the case of the United States versus Hudson (7th Cranch). Said the Court:

"Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only, the Supreme Court, possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution, and of which the legislative power can not deprive it. All other courts created by the General Government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to confer."

But, say Senators Spooner and Knox, Congress cannot constitute a court of equity and then deprive it of the inherent functions of such a court; and "the power to grant an injunction, preliminary or final," is held to be such a function. Says Senator Knox:

"Right here is the vital part of the controversy. By the creation of these inferior courts Congress does not also create the power with which they are to be clothed. Congress merely applies the power already created by the Constitution. If it were otherwise, and Congress not only created the courts but the judicial power as well, then it would undoubtedly be true that Congress could likewise deprive the courts of this power by taking away one or more of their essential and inherent subordinate powers, such as the right to issue the writ of injunction. But that is not the case. The judicial power exists inherently by virtue of the Constitution, which instrument likewise created Congress and prescribed that it should establish the courts through which the judicial power should operate. The office of Congress is, therefore, to distribute and not to create these powers."

Senator Knox's citations to prove this point were taken from the "Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure," Beach on "Modern Equity Jurisprudence," Bishop's "Equity," and Bates on "Federal Equity Procedure."

Ah (says Senator Bailey, in effect, in his notable reply four hours and ten minutes long), the Senator's citations are from the text-books on law, which discuss the law as it is; but it is as it is simply because Congress has heretofore so willed it. And he proceeded to cite additional rulings by the courts to prove that, if so disposed, Congress could today disestablish every one of the inferior Federal courts; and "the power to create and the power tion in the affirmative. Fully three weeks ago the Senate was waiting for an opportunity to break with the Chief Executive. His so-called surrender on the rate bill afforded his enemies in the Senate a long-wished-for opportunity.

If there is a conspiracy to "put the President in a hole," both Republicans and Democrats are in it. The whole performance of Saturday afternoon bore the earmarks of having been prearranged. "Elder" Republican Senators, who have been chafing under the President's whip these many months knew what Senators Tillman and Bailey, Democrats, were to do. Former Senator William L. Chandler, also a Republican, was aware of the plans of the Democrats, and to make doubly sure of the game had prepared a statement of his own, to be used in case there was any denial of the story that the President had dickered with the Democrats and spoken disrespectfully of such Republican Senators as Knox, Foraker and Spooner.

The trap was carefully set, with the hope that some one would "fool with the trigger." Senator Carter did this, for immediately after his speech defending Roosevelt, Bailey and Tillman opened up with their remarkable statements.

The moral would seem to be that it is unwise for a Republican President to enter into negotiations with Democratic Senators or Representatives to bring about legislation that he desires, no matter how worthy his motives are.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Clark Russell, who may almost be credited with having created the sea novel, and one of the few writers who ever fittingly described the sea, has about decided to stop writing. For years he has been an invalid, suffering from rheumatism. Being in his sixty-ninth year and having money enough to provide for his simple wants, he does not care to undergo the discomforts incident to writing. His father, Henry Russell, was a famous concert singer.

Grover Cleveland in Philadelphia recently reiterated his declaration that he never would be a presidential candidate again. From Cairo, Egypt, William Jennings Bryan has written a letter to Colonel M. C. Wetmore, of St. Louis, which contains a reference to his attitude toward the presidency. Mr. Bryan says in part: "I shall not do anything to secure another nomination, and do not want it unless circumstances seem to demand it—time alone can determine that."

It has been given out at Yale that Chauncey M. Depew had received the necessary twenty-five votes of Yale alumni to put him in nomination for the corporation for another term of six years. Others who were nominated were: Charles Catlin, '56, Brooklyn; Allen Everts, '69, New York; Gardiner Lathrop, '69, Kansas City; Otto T. Ballard, '76, New York; William H. Taft, '78, Washington; Gifford Pinchott, '80, Washington; Herbert Parsons, '90; Edward S. Harkness, '77, New York. The election will be held on June 26th, commencement week. Depew's term expires then.

Bertha Krupp, the richest girl in the world, owner of the great gun works which her father established at Essen, Germany, is soon to be married. The name of the young man is being kept a secret. Miss Krupp, who holds nearly all of the $40,000,000 capital stock of the great gun works, has an income of $2,400,000 a year—about $6,600 a day. When her mother dies, Bertha and her younger sister, Barbara, will divide $75,000,000 more between them, in stocks and bonds and property, including iron and coal mines in Westphalia and Spain. Bertha owns the whole town of Essen. Miss Krupp is good looking, religious, unassuming and dresses plainly. She leads a somewhat retired life within the inclosure of the splendid Villa Hugel estate, near Essen. She and her mother sometimes visit Florence or the Italian lakes, but her movements are generally veiled in mystery.

Speaker Cannon paid a visit to the minority room, the other day, to see his old friend, John Sharp Williams. It was a bright, cheery, cozy room, and as the Speaker settled into a big, roomy chair and looked on the surroundings in which Williams does his work his eye lighted with pleasure. "John," he said, "this is a mighty fine room you've got here." "Glad you like it, Joe," said John, "for you'll be occupying it next year."

John L. Sullivan, prize-fighter, was asked what he thought of President Roosevelt. He replied: "Roosevelt? Say, that guy is all to the good. He can't do nothing, but if he was allowed to have his own way this country'd be fine goin'." The night that Peter Maher and Joe Choynski fought at Coney Island Roosevelt was at the ring-side. Just about the middle of the fight a fresh police captain thought he'd stop the fight. Roosevelt up and says: "Say, look here; I'm Police Commissioner, and I know when men are fighting each other, and this fight is all right. Go along now, and don't interfere again." The fight went to the finish.

"Some of these amendments seem to me to be very reckless," said Senator Hale to Senator Spooner when the Elkins-Clapp amendment to penalize interstate traffic of the coal roads was being read. "If they keep on," replied Spooner, "I shall resign from the Senate and go to practicing law again. At this rate there won't be lawyers enough in the country to keep up with the business that is being made here."

Insurance men were surprised at Mr. Hornblower's resignation. He was once appointed Supreme Justice, but the Senate failed to confirm him.

When Edmond Rostand, five years ago, voluntarily exiled himself from Paris and took up his abode in the Basque Mountains, there was much surprise among his friends. He has just moved into a new villa built according to his plans in a sumptuous Basque style. "It cost a fortune," he said—"all my receipts from 'L'Aiglon,' and more. The Record for Marriage Licenses.

San Francisco can boast of a new record. A month after the calamity the high-water mark for the issuance of marriage licenses was reached. In the month exactly 418 couples appeared before "Cupid" Munson, and, after depositing the necessary $2 and taking oath to various statements, received the requisite paper. The total is eighteen more than have ever been issued in a calendar month in the history of the city. June, 1905, set the record up to date. "Had all the parties living in the city come to this office for their licenses since the earthquake," declared Mr. Munson, "we would have had more business than we could possibly have attended to. The record of marriage licenses issued would have been somewhat more than 70. Those who went to nearby counties would easily have made up this number." During the excitement immediately following the calamity as many as a score of couples were wedded by ministers in the parks without the license papers. "Cupid" Munson has been besieged by several ministers who officiated at these weddings for the requisite papers at this late date. Munson can do nothing for them, and in every case the legality of the marriage can be questioned. The only thing for these couples to do, he declares, is to procure the right licenses and be married all over again.

A Wedding Feast Cooked in the Street.

Following the solemnization of the wedding vows of Theodore Connolly and Miss Willa Thirsted recently, a wedding breakfast was served to the guests at the residence of the elder brother of the groom at Central avenue and Page street, and that wedding breakfast spoke well for the spirit that is typical of the new San Francisco. Weeks ago the ceremony was planned. The groom, in association with his four elder brothers, was engaged in a prosperous business. The store went up in flames. A fine trousseau had been prepared for the bride. That, too, went up in flames, not a stitch of the finery being saved. But there was no postponement of the wedding, and even the breakfast contemplated by the original arrangement was not dispensed with. For some time the families of the contracting parties had been on the hunt for delicacies of the sort that properly constitute a wedding repast, and when one of the brothers of the groom happened on a stock of champagne sufficient for the repast, joy was unbounded. Immediately after the wedding the breakfast was served, and soon after the last words of felicitation had been pronounced the groom and his brothers were hustling about to get into contact with contractors and builders, while the bride was busily engaged on the preparation of the evening meal, being by no means too proud to woo the cook stove that stood in the gutter in front of the one home left to the family. There can't be much the matter with San Francisco when that spirit prevails.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

During the three days in San Francisco while the great fire raged there were many instances recorded of the faithfulness and tenacity of old servants in their endeavor to save the effects of their employers. One of the most successful attempts is thus narrated:

A Chinese house servant had been in the employ of a San Francisco family for eighteen years. What with his thirty years' residence in California "Ching" might be considered a veritable pioneer. Certainly when his loyalty and bravery were put to the test he was not found wanting in the true spirit of '49.

When his mistress and the family abandoned the old home on Rincon Hill, leaving behind them the silver, the plate, the library, the curios, the keepsakes—everything, to the mercy of the galloping flames, "Ching" and "Ah Gong" (the cook) were told to flee and seek refuge with their friends.

But "Ching" had some ideas of his own. Taking with him the terrible cook he went to the nearest wharf and with the aid of a part of the ready cash he carried, set about to make a new and useful friend. He accosted the first fisherman he saw with, "You catch him boat? You save my life, I give you fifty dollars." For this round sum the lazy Italian fisherman was willing to leave his sun bath among the coils of rope. The burning of San Francisco meant little to him; he still had his boat and nets and now a wealthy passenger.

The bargain closed "Ah Gong" was left to play guard to that precious junk, while away went Manager Ching without revealing his plans to his employees. Before long, Ching appeared on the wharf again, staggering under the load he was carrying on his shoulders. At second time he went away. Five times he came and went, and each time "Ah Gong" was given more treasures to protect.

"Ching" afterwards said to his mistress, "'Ah Gong,' he too fat to live. I make him sit on things; nobody can steal 'em." But "Ah Gong" was not too fat to help load the skiff.

Everything on board, even to a week's supply of rice, they weighed anchor and drifted out into the stream, all the time watching that blazing picture. The brilliancy and color of a Turner looked like a mere tint in comparison. But those three were not gazing at the scene from an esthetic point of view. For the Italian there was fifty dollars in it, and a passenger list that might be turned into a crew of two, while the faithful Chinamen were seeing only the roof, under which they had always been so kindly treated, succumb to the flames. That gone, they realized that they had possession of the few things with which their mistress could some day start another home. And they must have contemplated a function being given to celebrate the occasion, for among other things they had saved an assortment of ball gowns.

When the fire was checked and all danger past almost the first courageous little craft to find its moorings at Fisherman's wharf was "Ching's" little fishing smack, with its cargo all safe—a cargo that is only waiting now, as a relic of the old, to be given a home in the new San Francisco with faithful "Ching" still its custodian.

An amusing anecdote is going the rounds of San Francisco at the expense of one of the employees of the firm of Baker & Hamilton. Let us call him Smith.

Smith lost his home in the great fire and the hospitable head of the firm of Baker & Hamilton offered him shelter under his own roof, which happened to be in the Western Addition beyond the ravages of the flames. Although a very wealthy man, Mr. Baker was unable to procure drinking water during the first few days after the fire. So he employed two men and a boy with buckets to pack water all the way from an artesian well in the Richmond district, two miles away. The only large receptacle in the house was the porcelain bath-tub, which was accordingly scrubbed and washed and scoured and scoured and washed and scrubbed, and the precious water was therein stored. It took two days to fill the tub, and Mr. Baker paid accordingly.

On the first morning after his arrival Mr. Baker's guest was late in appearing for breakfast. Mr. Baker sent a servant to call him. The servant returned with a frightened look.

"Did you call Mr. Smith," said the master.

"No, sir."

"Why not?"

"He's not in his room, sir."

"Where is he, then," said Mr. Baker.

"HE'S TAKING A BATH, SIR!"

The consternation of the house of Baker can be better imagined than expressed.

John Connolly, a seaman on board the San Francisco, has written a letter to the Navy Department asking that he be given a certified copy of a letter of commendation issued to him for heroism. In his letter he says that he treasured the document, but unfortunately the ship's mascot, a billy goat of unknown name, became possessed of it one day, and chewed it up. Regardless of the humorous features of the story, the letter was promptly referred to the Bureau of Navigation, when a certified copy of the letter was made and forwarded to Seaman Connolly. It records the fact that Lieutenant C. Tarbox fell overboard from the San Francisco and was in danger of drowning when Connolly jumped over and supported him until he could be picked up by the ship. The act was reported to the Navy Department by Rear-Admiral Asa Walker, then a captain.

The steam schooner, a vessel whose build and habits are peculiar to the Pacific, often goes to sea "with her load line over her hatch." Which means that, after her hold has been crammed with cargo, a deckload of lumber is piled halfway up the masts, so that her skipper puts out with the water washing green over his main deck, and an occasional comber frisking across his battened hatches. Along the harbor front of Seattle runs the story of a passenger who loped down to the wharf in a hurry to get aboard a departing steam schooner. He balanced himself on the stringpiece for an instant, looked down at what little he could see of the laden craft, and hove his gripsack down the only opening in sight. He was about to dive after it when a lounge on the wharf shouted:

"Hi, there! Where do you think you're jumpin' to? That's the smokestack you tossed your baggage down."

"H—!" gasped the passenger, "I thought it was the hatch!"

A man named Zeno was with a circus. Business had been bad and at the end of the season Zeno went to the manager for his salary. The manager said: "I am very sorry to keep you waiting, Zeno, but we pay alphabetically. If you'll be patient a few days you'll get your money."

So Zeno waited a few days and went to the manager, who said: "I'm very sorry, Zeno, but the money ran out before we got to Z."

The next season Zeno went out with the same show. When the manager saw him he said: "How do you do, Zeno?" "Don't call me Zeno," he exclaimed. "I've changed my name to Ajax."

Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, in an address to a delegation of farmers, won hearty applause with the following anecdote:

"I overheard a dialogue between two well-dressed men at lunch the other day.

"The first man, as he helped himself to asparagus, said:

"By the way, you said Johnson was a farmer, didn't you?"

"Good gracious, no!" returned the other man. "I said he made his fortune out of wheat. Did you ever hear of a farmer doing that?"

A young girl sat in her bedroom with a novel. Her hair was down and her feet were in red slippers. Now and then, extending her white arms, she yawned.

It was very late, and downstairs in the parlor her older sister was entertaining a young man. She naturally felt a deep interest in the entertainment. She was waiting to hear how it would terminate.

And at last there was a sound in the hall, a crash as of a closing door, and it was plain to the impatient girl that the young man had gone.

She threw down her novel, and, running forth, peered over the balustrade down into the hall's intense blackness.

"Well, Maude," she said, "Did you land him?"

There was no immediate reply to her question. There was a silence, a peculiar silence, a silence with a certain strained quality in it. Then a masculine voice replied:

"She did."

LITERARY GOSSIP.

Notes by a Frank Book Crank.

"Reminiscences of Sixty Years," by George S. Boutwell (McClure, Phillips & Co.), is in two portly volumes. One should begin with the Civil War, skipping babyhood and childhood; great men with mumps or measles seem very much alike. Boutwell was Governor of Massachusetts, Senator from Massachusetts, Representative from Massachusetts, and Secretary of the Treasury under Grant. These volumes contain much of interest about war times; in them figure Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, Stanton, Chase, Sumner, Butler, Hooker, McClellan, Meade, Banks, Blaine, Conkling, Garfield, Lovell, Motley, Windom, Hayes, the "306 Grant men at Chicago," "Third Term" Dana, Alexander Stewart, Hoar, and the Electoral Commission. Boutwell tells of inaugurating the Internal Revenue Service, of the "Crisis of 1873," "Black Friday," and of how United States Bonds were first floated (under Buchanan). He discusses Andrew Johnson and the Impeachment Proceedings at length. Finally he gives a chapter on "McKinley and Imperialism," in which the author scores McKinley severely, and attacks the whole Philippine policy as unconstitutional. Boutwell was the creator of the present Internal Revenue Service. It was his casting vote that saved Andrew Johnson from impeachment. The book is well written, temperate, interesting; there is much inside history in it never before in print.

"As a Chinaman Saw Us" (Appleton), is by an anonymous writer. The author purports to be a Chinaman making a long stay in Washington, D. C.—presumably a diplomat. The assumption of the character is not good. But the writer is quite clever. He gives a caustic but justifiable account of our national and political weaknesses.

"The Races of Europe," two volumes, by William Z. Ripley (Appleton's), is a very exhaustive summary of the latest theories on Anthropology. It reverses all the ideas of one's early reading. The author holds that there are only three races in Europe—Alpine, Teutonic and Mediterranean. The book is illustrated with many portraits of types from all over Europe. The author bases his conclusions entirely on skulls—dolichocephalic, brachycephalic, etc.

"The Mediterranean Race," by G. Serji (Scribner's), is like the preceding in that the author is revolutionary in his ideas about Anthropology. But he differs in his conclusions. He says the vast majority of Europe's people came from African stock. He calls them "Eurafricans." As to the Aryan theory, he says the Aryan movement was a barbarian invasion, but that the Aryans were beaten back and left only a slight trace in Europe. He also bases his conclusions on skulls.

"The Green Diamond," by Arthur Morrison (L. C. Page & Co.), is the story of a jewel stolen from a Rajah in India. It narrates the adventures of those into whose hands it fell in England. It is not bad. But the author (who has done some powerful work, such as "Tales of Mean Streets") writes languidly, as if he were doing a pot-boiler, and as if he knew it. It is odd that he should have chosen the identical clou of "The Moonstone." The marked superiority of the older novel shows the different methods of thirty years ago and of today in construction; merely from a mechanical point of view, Wilkie Collins' novels are vastly superior to these stories of today in the same genre, even when there is no question of talent.

Personal and Miscellaneous.

The last volumes of the Bancroft Library, which was purchased by the University last December for $150,000 and which was the only large collection of books in San Francisco to escape the fire, will have been moved in a day or so into the upper story of California Hall, the University administration building. Of especial importance are the files of all the San Francisco newspapers and documents printed by the State which are included in the collection. Priceless private manuscripts and early printed Mexican books make up a large part of the library, which totals 50,000 books, 5000 bound and unbound newspaper files, and about 125,000 manuscripts.

The following letter appears in the New York Evening Post:

People receiving letters from friends in California descriptive of the recent great disaster in San Francisco will confer a great favor upon future historians by donating them to the California Historical Department of the State library, Sacramento, California. The letters may be placed in a sealed envelope, the length of time for which they are to remain unopened written upon the outside.

J. L. GILLIS,

Sacramento, May 1.

In a few days Scribners will have ready "The Biography of Leo Tolstoy," in three volumes, by P. Birukoff. The book has been written with the co-operation of Tolstoy himself, and is in this sense of the word authentic and authoritative.

Upton Sinclair's charges against the beef trust, embodied in his novel, "The Jungle," are said to have been referred by President Roosevelt to experts of the agricultural department for special investigation. The experts are reported to have failed to sustain the novelist altogether, alleging that he had strung together isolated incidents, some of which had occurred years ago.

The articles published recently in McClure's by Lincoln Steffens are now made into a book with the elaborate title, "The Struggle for Self-Government. Being an Attempt to Trace American Political Corruption to Its Sources in Six States of the United States, with a Dedication to the Czar" (McClure, Phillips).

The London Times, on May 4, printed this letter to the editor, signed "Your Reviewer":

"Sir: In reading the new volume of Grove's Musical Dictionary, I came across one point of literary rather than of musical interest, to which I should like to draw your attention. The well-known tune of the American civil war, 'John Brown's Body,' has, curiously enough, received a column from the pen of Mr. Kidson. The words of the song are referred to as 'doggerel,' and the writer adds that all attempts to wed respectable words to the tune have failed. So many of our early beliefs are shattered in later years that possibly the words I have always associated with this tune, may have no real connection with it; but I have found so many people to whom the poem is strange that I venture to give it below. With all its glaring faults, it is full of a rough poetry and fire; and, sung around the camp fires by night, one can imagine it inspiring and inspiring enough to deserve a kinder word from Mr. Kidson."

Here follow four stanzas of Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic":

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord;
He is tramping out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;
He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword,
His truth is marching on!

The reviewer's discovery is certainly to his credit. We are not so sure of the "glaring faults": in fact, of its kind and for its purpose it is thought by some of us to be a piece of genuine inspiration.

Justice (sternly)—"You are charged with stealing nine of Col. Henry's hens last night. Have you any witnesses?" Brother Swagback (apologetically)—"Nussah! I specks I's sawtuh peculiar datuh-way, but it ain't never been muh custom to take witnesses along when I goes out chicken stealin', sah."—Puck.

KIPLING'S AFTER-DINNER SPEECH.

Just Back from Africa, He Responds to "Literature" at the Royal Academy.

Rudyard Kipling responded to the toast of "Literature" at the anniversary banquet of the Royal Academy, held on the evening of May 5 in the Central Gallery of Burlington House, London. The gathering was a brilliant one, including eminent representatives of the arts and sciences, letters, politics, and the professions. In the courtyard a guard of honor supplied by the Twentieth Middlesex (artists), R. V. C., was mounted, with the brass band of the regiment in attendance; and the Duke of Connaught, the representative on this occasion of the royal family, was received on his arrival with a royal salute, the band playing the national anthem.

About 250 guests sat down to dinner. On the presidents' right were seated the Duke of Connaught, the Russian Ambassador, the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, the Netherlands Minister, the Norwegian Minister, Lord Carrington, Mr. Haldane, M. P. (Secretary of State for War); Mr. Birrell, M. P., and Mr. Sydney Buxton, M. P. On the President's left sat the French Ambassador, the Turkish Ambassador, the American Ambassador, the Italian Ambassador, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Northumberland, the Danish Minister, the Swedish Minister, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Cawdor, Lord Stanley, Lord Ashbourne, Mr. St. John Brodrick, and Mr. Arnold-Forster, M. P.

In introducing Mr. Kipling, according to the London Times, the President, Sir Edward Poynter, remarked:

Sir Edward's Poynter's Toast.

"Among our guests we include many whose names are distinguished in literature. The close alliance between literature and art has often been celebrated in this room. The influence that literature may have upon art is obvious and need not be gone into now, but literature which is worthy of the name is in itself an art; by this I mean that the writer, like the painter or the sculptor, must have a mastery of his material, and that in neither profession is a man who does slovenly work entitled to be called an artist.

"I propose to couple with this toast the name of one well known to you all, who never wrote a slovenly line in his life either of poetry or prose, and who has, besides, that insight into humanity and that power of concentrated expression which proclaim an artist of the highest degree (cheers); you know him as the enchanter of childhood, the hero of boyhood, the grand exponent of vigorous manhood, the staunch upholder of the honor of his country. When I add that he is the adored of our brave soldiers you will easily guess whom I mean. (Cheers.) Rudyard Kipling has come straight home from South Africa, arriving only this morning, to do us the honor of replying to this toast. I will not praise him further to his face, for he has never courted applause and is modest enough to resent it. Wisely foreseeing that once an artist becomes a public man he is almost doomed as an artist, he set his face, from the time that he came to England from India—almost a boy and suddenly famous—against being lionized, and resolutely refused to be dragged into the vortex of social or public life. His work is his life, and his home and family are his dearest relaxation. I give you the toast of literature coupled with the name of Mr. Rudyard Kipling." (Cheers.)

Mr. Kipling's Address.

Mr. Kipling said:

"A great, and I frankly admit a somewhat terrifying, honor has come to me; but I think, compliments apart, the most case-hardened worker in letters speaking to such an assembly as this must recognize the gulf that separates even the least of those who do things worthy to be written about from even the best of those who have written things worthy of being talked about.

"There is one ancient legend which tells us that when a man first achieved a most notable deed he wished to explain to his tribe what he had done. As soon as he began to speak, however, he was smitten with dumbness, he lacked words, and sat down. Then there arose—according to the story—a masterless man, one who had taken no part in the action of his fellow, who had no special virtues, but afflicted—that is the phrase—with the magic of the necessary words. (Laughter.) He saw, he told, he described the merits of the notable deed in such a fashion, we are assured, that the words 'became alive and walked up and down in the hearts of all his hearers.' Thereupon, the tribe seeing that the words were certainly alive, and fearing lest the man with the words would hand down untrue tales about them to their children, they took and killed him. But later they saw that the magic was in the words, not in the man.

"We have progressed in many directions since the time of this early and destructive criticism (laughter), but so far we do not seem to have found a sufficient substitute for the necessary word as the final record to which all achievement must look. Even to-day, when all is done, those who have done it must wait until all has been said by the masterless man with the words. It is certain that the overwhelming bulk of those words will perish in the future as they have perished in the past; it is true that a minute fraction will continue to exist, and by the light of these words, and by that light only, will our children be able to judge of the phases of our generation. Now we desire beyond all things to stand well with our children, but when our story comes to be told we do not know who will have the telling of it.

"We are too close to the tellers; there are many tellers and they are all talking together; and even if we knew them we must not kill them. (Laughter.) But the old and terrible instinct which taught our ancestors to kill the original story-teller warns us that we shall not be far wrong if we challenge any man who shows signs of being afflicted with the magic of the necessary words. May not this be the reason why, without any special legislation on its behalf, literature has always stood a little outside the law as the one calling that is absolutely free—free in the sense that it needs no protection?

"For instance, if, as occasionally happens, a judge makes a bad law, or a surgeon a bad operation, or a manufacturer makes bad food criticism upon their actions is by law and custom confined to comparatively narrow limits. But if a man, as occasionally happens, makes a book, there is no limit to the criticism that may be directed against it (laughter), and it is perfectly as it should be. The world recognizes the little things, like bad law, bad surgery, and bad food, only affect the cheapest commodity that we know about—human life. (Laughter.) Therefore, in these circumstances, men can afford to be swayed by pity for the offender, by interest in his family, by fear, or loyalty, or respect for the organization he represents, or even a desire to do him justice. But when the question is of words—words that may become alive and walk up and down in the hearts of the hearers—it is then that this world of ours, which is disposed to take an interest in the future, feels instinctively that it is better that a thousand innocent people should be punished rather than that one guilty word should be preserved, carrying that which is an untrue tale of the tribe.

"The chances, of course, are almost astronomically remote that any given tale will survive for so long as it takes an oak to grow to timber size. But that guiding instinct warns us not to trust to chance a matter of the supremest concern. In this durable record if anything short of indisputable and undistilled truth be seen there, we all feel, How shall our achievements profit us? The record of the tribe is its enduring literature. The magic of literature lies in the words, and not in any man. Witness, a thousand excellent strenuous words can leave us quite cold or put us to sleep, whereas a bare half-hundred words breathed upon by some man in his agony, or in his exaltation, or in his idleness, ten generations ago, can still lead whole nations into and out of captivity, can open to us the doors of three worlds, or stir us so intolerably that we can scarcely abide to look at our own souls.

"It is a miracle—one that happens very seldom. But secretly each one of the masterless men with the words has hope, or has had hope, that the miracle may be wrought again through him. And why not? If a tinker in Bedford gaol, if a pamphleteering shopkeeper, pilloried in London, if a muzzy Scotsman, if a despised German Jew, or a condemned French thief, or an English admiralty official with a taste for letters can be miraculously afflicted with the magic of the necessary words, why not any man at any time? Our world, which is only concerned in the perpetuation of the record, sanctions that hope as kindly and just as cruelly as Nature sanctions love. All it suggests is that the man with the words shall wait upon the man of achievement, and step by step with him try to tell the story to the tribe. All it demands is that the magic of every word shall be tried out to the uttermost by every means fair and foul that the mind of man can suggest.

"There is no room, and the world insists that there shall be no room, for pity, for mercy, for respect, for fear, or even for loyalty between man and his fellow-man, when the record for the tribe comes to be written. That record must satisfy, at all costs to the word and to the man behind the word. It must satisfy alike the keenest vanity and the deepest self-knowledge of the present; it must satisfy also the most shameless curiosity of the future. When it has done this, it is literature of which it will be said in due time that it fitly represents its age. I say in due time because ages, like individuals, do not always at once appreciate the merits of a record that purports to represent them. The trouble is that one always expects just a little more out of a thing than one puts into it. (Laughter.) Whether it be an age or an individual, one is always a little pained and a little pessimistic to find that all one gets back is just one's bare deserts. This is a difficulty old as literature.

"A little incident that came within my experience a few weeks ago shows that that difficulty is always being raised by the most unexpected people all about the world. A few weeks ago, in a land where the magic of words is peculiarly potent and far-reaching, there was a tribe that wanted rain, and the rain-doctors set about setting it. To a certain extent the rain-doctors succeeded. But the rain their magic brought was not a full, driving downpour that tells of large prosperity; it was patchy, local, circumscribed, and uncertain. There were unhealthy little squalls blowing about the country and doing damage. Whole districts were flooded out by waterspouts and other districts annoyed by trickling showers, soon dried by the sun.

"And so the tribe went to the rain-doctors, being very angry, and they said, 'What is this rain that you make? You did not make rain like this in the time of our fathers. What have you been doing?' And the rain-doctors said, 'We have been making our proper magic. Supposing you tell us what you have been doing lately!' And the tribe said, 'Oh, our head men have been running about hunting jackals and our little people have been running about chasing grasshoppers! What has that to do with your rain-making?' 'It has everything to do with it,' said the rain-doctors. 'Just as long as your head men run about hunting jackals, and just as long as your little people run about chasing grasshoppers, just so long will the rain fall in this manner.' (Cheers and laughter.)

A MIDDLE-CLASS DIARY IN 1915.

Trials of an Ordinary Citizen in His Efforts to Climb Up Into the Society of Privileged Proletarians.

January 10—My wife telephoned to the office this morning, begging me to return home at once. Found her at lunch with two house painters and a paper hanger. They were quite affable with me. Tried hard not to cringe to them, but the habit is growing on me of late. They handed me a County Council order requiring me, owing to general unemployment, to find work in my house and free quarters for the bearers, wages to be at the standard rate—2s, 4d per hour. * * My wife slightly hysterical. We must, however, learn to face the future with courage.

January 15—Our guests have finished Wagner and one panel of the drawing-room door. They start on Tchaikowsky and the other panel tomorrow. Paper hanger the poorest whistler of the three.

January 24—Our maid-of-all-work, the Hon. Vera Vasavour, daughter of the pauper earl, whom we engaged out of the workhouse, is not giving entire satisfaction. Demoralized, my wife thinks, by the attentions of the paper hanger. She spoke seriously to the poor girl, pointing out that they could lead to nothing, and that any workman who married beneath him would be socially ruined.

January 28—Unpleasant interview with our guests. They complained of the table we keep, and pointed out that it was impossible to whistle five working hours a day on rice pudding and lentil soup. Laid before me the day's menu of seven courses of the Municipal Free Food for Workingmen Depot, and urged me to keep pace with it. Threatened to report me. * * * Talked it over with my wife, and slipped out after dark. Eighteen shillings on the study clock.

February 11—Third visit from the income tax people. They had picketed the back door and caught me on the way out. Polite, but inexorable. Explained they had nothing to do with the levy of 7s, 8d in the pound; all they had to do was to collect it. * * * Collected it.

February 27—Wife in tears again about Willie's prospects. Says he ought to be able to read and write at sixteen. Certainly the boy should be at school; but what can we do? Private schools utterly beyond an income of 400 pounds nowadays. Tried last year to get him into a board school on the ground that my uncle's father had once done some bell mending in his own house, and was, therefore, a workman within the meaning of the act. Claim disallowed.

March 1—Education tax just in—11s 2d. Gone up a shilling. Really monstrous that we should have to supply riding habits for girls on demand in the reformatory schools.

March 8—Drawing-room door almost finished. The younger of the two painters (excellent tenor whistler) seems rather attracted by Lucy. He has worked a good deal on the inside of the door whenever she has been sitting in the room. My wife and I have talked it over, but hardly dare to hope anything will come of it. If we could only marry into a working-class family, all our difficulties would vanish, and we should rank among the Privileged Proletariat.

March 26—Wet, wretched night. Vera brought in a grimy begging book from Sir Charles Grandison; said he was at the door. I sent him out sixpence. Wife suggested he should be brought in to dry himself, but our guests drew the line at tramps. Went out and saw him. Miserable object. To think that a once great land owner should be brought to this, not by intoxicants, but by taxation. Very thankful for some cold meat; took it to share with Lord Salop, who was watching at the corner for the police.

April 5—Found a demand note for the general municipal rate on my breakfast table. Went back to bed again for an hour to ward off a stroke; 38s. 10d. in the pound—an advance of 2s. on last year to cover cost of the new Workhouse Trips to the Riviera.

April 17—Watched a procession of the Submerged Gentry passing along the Embankment, with banners inscribed. "Even Rate-payers Have the Right to Live." A crowded meeting afterwards in Hyde Park was addressed by several decayed members of the old House of Lords. Great enthusiasm among the poverty-stricken throng. Some buns thrown to them by a charitable workingman caused an ugly rush. A deputation was appointed to wait on the Rt. Hon. Keir Hardie at 10 Downing street.

April 20—Mr. Robinson, the young painter's father, called on me after dark with reference to his son's "deplorable infatuation." Urged me to use all my influence with Lucy. I asked him, as between man and man, to try to rise above these mere class prejudices; but he refused to listen to my arguments, said his boy's whole future was at stake, and there had been far too many of these mixed marriages lately.

April 25—Drawing-room furniture seized for taxes.

June 1—This day Sam and Lucy were privately married. The happy couple left later for Southend.

June 3—A threatening deputation from the Housepainters' Union waited on me in the evening. After much bitter denunciation it was finally agreed that, for Sam's sake, we must be admitted into working-class society, and enrolled in some union.

June 5—Joyfully gave up my office in the city, and paid off the clerks. * * * Practiced some of the simpler passages from "Tannhauser" during the evening. Lips very stiff at first.

June 10—All our troubles over. I have been elected a member of the Waiters' Union. My dear wife spent the day cutting down my frock suit into dress clothes, while I practiced waiting round the dining-room table in my shirt-sleeves. Thank heaven, we are Privileged Proletarians at last!—C. C. Rothwell in London Mail.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

From a Prominent Publishing House.

Editor Argonaut: We beg to express to you our cordial thanks for sending us a copy of the issue of May 5. Its account of the disaster and the resulting situation is exceedingly interesting. It is full of the most inspiring optimism and the spirit which animates the rebuilding of San Francisco. We beg to express to you our heartiest good wishes for your prosperity.

Very truly yours,
For THE MACMILLAN COMPANY,
Herbert P. Williams.

Glad the Argonaut Got There.

From the appended note it is apparent that after the shake-up the Argonaut beat the Chronicle in getting to its subscribers:

DERBY, Conn., May 15, 1906.
Editor Argonaut: I cannot begin to tell you how much I have appreciated the three issues of the Argonaut which I have received since the earthquake, nor how proud I am to think that in spite of such a calamity, it did not forget its far-away subscribers. That much cannot be said of the other San Francisco papers. For eleven years I have taken the Daily Chronicle, and yet, though I have written them twice, saying my subscription does not run out until September, and sending some one personally to speak about the matter, not a Chronicle have I seen. I wish you could have seen the enthusiasm at the meeting of Californians in New York the Saturday after the disaster. We were the proudest people in the country to know that we came from California and called it home. Thanking you again for your courtesy, I beg to be,
Sincerely yours,

ANNE CORNELL.

The Argonaut an Institution.

May 28, 1906.
Editor Argonaut: Your paper pleases me. You adopt the right tone in discussing the great calamity that has fallen upon your city. You have kept your head. Your editorials are sane.
Since the days of the Spanish War I have looked upon the Argonaut as one of THE INSTITUTIONS of the West. The whole country would be the worse for it if the Argonaut should die. I am glad to see you have weathered the storm and are on your feet again.
May you prosper as you deserve.

Yours very truly,
DAVID J. CURTIN.
I enclose five dollars, new subscription, to help on the new plant.

Rising from the Ashes.

Mining Recorder's Office, Clinton, B. C. May 14th, 1906.
Editor Argonaut: I am much obliged to you for your letter of the 3rd inst. advising me that the "Argonaut Stories," which I applied for some time ago had been forwarded to my address.

I need not say that I wish you every success, and that you may rise from the ashes of the old Argonaut Office brighter and better than ever. It is hardly necessary for me to offer you my sincere sympathy for the loss that you must have sustained. San Francisco, under the terrible visitation that it has had, has the sincere sympathy of the civilized world, and I am very pleased to see that your British cousins in every part of the world have come to your aid as well as your own States.

Wishing you every success, I am, Yours faithfully,

F. JONES.

She Wishes Us Luck.

640 Lexington Ave., New York, May 17, 1906.
Editor Argonaut:—I see by the copy of your paper which I received today (the first since the fire) that you published three editions of the Argonaut of which I have not received any. I refer to the issues of April 21, 23 and May 5th.

The Argonaut has been a source of great pleasure to me for a number of years, and may I say right here with what wonder and admiration does the energy of its editor inspire me. Naturally I should very much like to have the copies printed after the fire, so, if the editions be not wholly exhausted, will you kindly send them to me.

Here's wishing the Argonaut and all San Francisco the best of luck for the future.

Sincerely yours,

FLORENCE KAHN.

From 'Way Down East.

This sympathetic letter makes us feel a little ashamed that we have so often pitied in print the dwellers in bleak New England:

Dear Argonaut:—For fifteen years you have been a most welcome guest at our fireside, and now that "merciless disaster" has caught you, I want to express our heartfelt sympathy for you, as for any friend in distress and we hope and believe that out of this awful calamity some good may come. I must admit that I can't see just how, but I was brought up to believe that a whipping did a child good.

We have sent to the San Francisco sufferers our little mite from this small town—"Way Down East"—where we don't have earthquakes, but we do have snow, and with this gift went the pity and sympathy and heartfelt best wishes.

And so dear Argonaut, come every week, you are always welcome, for how could we keep house without you?

Your friend,
M. S. WEBSTER.

Old Town, Maine, May 16, 1906.

The Future Housing of the Poor in San Francisco.

The writer of the following memorandum says that as "The policy of the Argonaut since the earthquake and fire has been to advocate improvement along thoroughly practical lines, and as model tenements are thoroughly practicable and yield as good returns to the investors as poor tenements, I trust you will advocate the passing of proper tenement house laws by the Supervisors of San Francisco." He thus writes:

Editor Argonaut:—The parts of the city in which there have been the greatest congestion of population, viz: Chinatown, the Italian quarter, and places south of Market street, have been wiped out by the fire. Many of the people who lived there will not return, as much of the land will be put to other uses, and improved rapid transit facilities will enable them to become cottagers on the outskirts of the city or in the suburbs. But there will always remain a great number who must live near their work, and as manufacturing establishments are established in the old quarters, the spaces available for tenements will shrink, and great congestion will result. The greater value of this land for manufacturing purposes will mean the housing of as many as possible in a small area. In other words, within certain districts, we shall soon have a serious tenement house problem, unless it is solved before building commences.

There can be no permanent solution to the question that does not provide for the owner of model tenements an income equal to what he could obtain from unsanitary construction. Fortunately the experience of New York, under the Tenement House laws, shows not only that this current income from model tenements is equal to that received from poorly planned and constructed ones, but that the incidental repairs and expenses are much less. At first the tenement house laws were opposed by landlords, now none are more earnest in advocating them.

The main principles of the model tenements are very simple: (a) Have good plumbing; (b) Require every room to give on a street or interior court of adequate size; (c) Economize in the spaces required for the courts by compelling a uniformity in construction that will bring the court or light well of one building, opposite to that of the next, instead of against a wall. Thus the light well or court available for each room is double the size a single owner can afford to allow in his building.

In New York the desired results are obtained by laws that prescribe the size of all light wells and their location in the building. In this way, a landlord in putting up tenements knows that when his neighbor builds, his light will not be cut off and many rooms made nearly useless for rental purposes. This size of the light well varies with the size of the lot and height of the building. There the usual lot for tenements is 50x100 feet, and there are six apartments on a floor, four of four rooms and bath, and two of three rooms and bath. The building fronts full fifty feet on the street. On one side there is a light space back of the second room which must be six feet wide for buildings of five stories or less, and six inches wider for each additional story. This light space extends to the rear of the building. On the other side of the building there is an interior court which when the building adjoining is built, is hexagonal in shape and 24 feet wide. In other words, each tenement must have on one side an interior court of 12 feet in width for a building five stories in height and six inches more in width for each additional story. When the tenement on that side is built to match it, the court is 24 feet in width. On the other side of the building the space left is 6 feet and extends to the rear of the building and when another building is built on that side the space between the buildings is 12 feet.

LOUIS BARTLETT.

A philanthropic Northern lady visiting in Savannah made the acquaintance of a respectable old negro woman, whom she asked to visit her in Boston.

"Mrs. Johnson," said her hostess one day when they were dining together, "you were a slave, were you not?"

"Yes'm," was the reply. "I belonged to Marse Clarence Howard."

"And did he have you sit at the table with him?"

"Who? Me?" exclaimed the old woman in astonishment. "Lord, no, honey! My master was a gentleman, he wuz, an' he ain't never allowed no nigger to set alongside o' him!"

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Of the palatial home of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, on the corner of California and Jones streets, the very summit of Nob Hill, naught remains but the fences, the granite steps, and the broken brick walls of the basement and first story. On being interviewed as to the possibility of their rebuilding on the same site, if the city constructs a winding approach to the summit of the hill, it is said that the Crockers will at once rebuild. If not, they will rebuild, but not immediately.

Mrs. Richard Tobin, the mother of Joseph Sadoc Tobin of the Hibernia Bank, of Mrs. Charles Clark and of Clement and Richard Tobin, is reported as saying that she will rebuild her house on the summit of Nob Hill just as soon as plans can be prepared and the debris removed.

Patrick Calhoun, of the United Railways, has taken the Fred Beaver house at 2525 Webster street in San Francisco.

Dr. and Mrs. J. Wilson Shiels are living at 2175 Pacific avenue.

Mrs. George G. Kimball, wife of Colonel George G. Kimball, Postoffice Inspector in Washington, D. C., has been visiting in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. I. Lowenberg, who lost everything in their rooms at the Palace Hotel, have taken an apartment on Pacific avenue, San Francisco.

Mr. Knox Maddox, well known in both San Jose and San Francisco business circles, has opened law offices at 2005 Sutter street, in San Francisco. Mr. Maddox was formerly connected with the firm of Bartlett & Slack.

The celebrated painting by Millet, "The Man with the Hoe," was saved from the Crocker mansion on Nob Hill in San Francisco before the house was destroyed. The butler, with great presence of mind, saved many of the valuable paintings. In the collection were works by Tennyel, Troyon, Paul Potter, Corot, Monet, Renoir, Puvis de Chavannes, Pissarro and Constable, as well as Millet.

Mrs. Alice Chittenden has taken her daughter and gone East to visit relatives.

Maren Froelich, whose home and studio were in the old Studio building, 609 Sacramento street, took her keepsakes to the St. Francis Hotel. They went with everything in the big hostelry. Miss Froelich is now with the W. G. Staffords.

Henry Heyman had at his home, 623 Eddy street, a library of over 1500 books on musical subjects and the finest library of violin music in the United States. It was impossible for him to save any of his possessions, because his aged mother had to be taken care of. For two nights he had her in Golden Gate Park. He is now at 434 Spruce street, where he has taken a house.

Dr. and Mrs. L. L. Dunbar have taken a year's lease on the premises at 2324 Pacific avenue.

Hon. George R. Carter, Governor of the Hawaiian Territory, and Mrs. Carter, who have been stopping for some weeks past at the Hotel del Monte, expect to return to their home in Honolulu next week.

Mrs. William L. Merry, Miss May Merry, Miss Blanche Merry, Mrs. Samuel W. Bryant (formerly Miss Carrie Merry) and Miss Mary Hill are at Willits, in Mendocino county, and will be joined there shortly by Captain Merry, who left Costa Rica for Washington a few weeks since, and is now en route to this city.

Mrs. Thomas Selby and Miss Annie Selby, who left on April 16 for an indefinite stay in Europe, returned at once to San Francisco when news of the great fire reached them.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Lansdale at San Mateo has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Hellmann have gone to their summer cottage at Belvedere for the summer.

Mrs. T. W. M. Draper and Miss Dorothy Draper will leave in a few days for their country place in Oregon for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. George S. Fife and Miss Beatrice Fife have gone to their country place at Palo Alto for several months' stay.

Mr. and Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt, formerly Kate Clement, have rented their house, on Broadway and Scott street, and have gone to Oakland, where they will remain for several months.

Mrs. Annie H. Jackson and her family, whose home adjoining the University Club was burned, have gone to Napa Soda Springs for the summer.

Judge and Mrs. J. M. Allen and the Misses Ruth and Elizabeth Allen have gone to their country place at Menlo for the summer, and it is probable that the wedding of Miss Ruth Allen and Lucius Allen, which is to be celebrated in June, will take place there.

Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Chenery, who were burned out on Hyde street, went to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Grimwood in Fruitvale, and a few days since Mrs. Chenery left for New York, where she will visit her mother, Mrs. Patton, for a time.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Young, of Honolulu, are the guests of Mrs. William T. Veitch at her Linda Vista home. Mr. and Mrs. William Knowles of San Francisco are also living temporarily at the Veitch home.

The wedding of Miss Ruth Miller of Sausalito and Dr. Louis Brechemin Jr., U. S. A., will be celebrated at Christ Church, Sausalito, on June 29th. Miss Miller is a daughter of the late Major and Mrs. O. C. Miller, and a cousin of Mrs. Richardson Clover of Washington, D. C.

The musical public of Portland is giving a benefit concert to Richard A. Lucchesi, of San Francisco. Mr. Lucchesi lost all his possessions in the fire. His valuable library was destroyed, as were also two grand pianos, his personal effects and a number of his musical compositions.

Mr. and Mrs. Huhert Howe Bancroft have given up their contemplated trip to Europe and have gone to their ranch near Concord. Mr. and Mrs. Paul Bancroft are in Alameda.

A lively blaze threatened the destruction of the beautiful home of F. W. Van Sicklen, 1831 Central avenue, at an early hour Sunday morning, but it was extinguished after only a nominal damage had been done.

Mrs. S. G. Hindes, who resided at 1101 Green street, has gone to Sausalito for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Payne have arrived from the East and are occupying their residence at Menlo Park.

Harry Morse, who has been leasing the Coleman place at Menlo for a number of years, has moved to Palo Alto. The Coleman mansion is occupied by St. Patrick's seminary.

Dr. A. T. Leonard, the well-known San Francisco physician and surgeon, has rented the old Selby home at Fair Oaks for the season.

The Judsons have moved down from San Francisco for the summer.

Every available house at Menlo has been rented. Twenty-five more buildings could easily be leased.

Mr. and Mrs. James L. Flood and Miss Jennie Flood made an expedition into San Jose from Menlo in their large touring-car during the week. They returned to Menlo the same day.

Mr. and Mrs. John Drum and Miss Sara Drum are the guests of their aunt, Mrs. Glenn, at the latter's home on Castro street. The Drum residence in San Francisco will require extensive repairs before the family can again live in it.

The fine residence of Charles Josselyn at Woodside was so badly damaged by the earthquake that it will have to be torn down.

The residence of H. W. Jackson was also wrecked by the shock.

Mr. and Mrs. William B. Bourn and Miss Maude Bourn have returned from Southern France, and after a few days at their Webster-street home left for their country-place at Grass Valley.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Deering, who have been spending a few days in Sacramento are now the guests of Mr. Richard Hotaling at his Marin county ranch.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wheeler are in town, though their handsome home was heavily damaged and needs many repairs.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Wheeler have left Berkeley and are again occupying their California-street home.

Miss Frances Joliffe, who has been in Europe, is on her way home.

Mr. and Mrs. Jack Wilson have returned to San Francisco, and have reopened their home on Pacific avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Young arrived from the Islands this week, taking the first steamer for California after the news of the earthquake reached them. Alexander Young has large business interests here and he came to San Francisco at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mackenzie Gordon, the well-known singer and Bohemian Club favorite, will try tent life for the summer over in Mill Valley. He has secured quarters immediately adjacent to the residence of Emile Pohli, and will take in a few pupils to tide over the financial informalities due to the San Francisco calamity. Mr. Gordon lost all his belongings in the fire save the clothes he was wearing.

Notes From Sacramento.

Mrs. V. S. McClatchy, of Sacramento, spent last Wednesday in San Francisco with her daughter, Miss Edna McClatchy.

Mrs. George C. Pardee has returned to her home in Sacramento after a short time spent in Oakland.

Mrs. M. L. Lynch, of San Francisco, is visiting Sacramento at the home of her brother.

Miss Florence Ward, who has been a student at the State University, is visiting Miss Laura Cooper at Sacramento.

Miss Barbara Small, of San Francisco, is visiting Miss Edna McClatchy at her home in Sacramento.

Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Whitmore, of Sacramento, spent the early part of the week in San Francisco.

Miss Estel Stephens, of Sacramento, has been in San Francisco for the wedding of Miss Lucine Ranson and William Fulton, who are to make their home in Ross Valley.

Miss Elsa Grau, of Sacramento, is to spend the summer in Buffalo with her sister, Mrs. Edward S. Dold.

Californians Abroad.

Mrs. Adam Grant, who was in Athens when the news of the great fire in San Francisco reached her, has gone to Nauheim, Germany, and will not return to California for some months.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Sharon arrived in New York from Paris last week on the new steamship Kaiserin Auguste Victoria.

The following were among the Californians who embarked at New York last week for Europe: Mrs. L. Jacobs, the Misses Brenner, Miss Rudden, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Deakin and Miss Gwenth Deakin of San Francisco, Mrs. Fairbanks Smith and Mrs. C. B. Weeks of Los Angeles, and Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Wilcox of Pasadena.

Recent cable advices note the arrival in Paris of the following: Mr. and Mrs. George E. Bates, L. C. Mammain, Mr. and Mrs. H. Morse, William Mooser, Mrs. E. R. Wills and Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Gil-martin of San Francisco; Mrs. Eleanor A. Wolfe, Mr. and Mrs. E. P. Bosbyshell, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Waterman and Miss Cora L. Salham of Los Angeles, and T. W. Benton of Pasadena.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Gartenlaub left for Europe on May 6. Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Hatch and Mrs. Bessie Smith, formerly of the Bella Vista, are occupying the Gartenlaub residence.

Mrs. E. J. McCutcheon has left for New York, and will sail from there shortly for Europe, where she expects to spend several months.

Mrs. L. L. Baker has been recently in Florence, Italy.

Miss Maud O'Connor and Miss Isabelle O'Connor, who have been abroad for some months, were in Florence, Italy, when last heard from.

Mr. and Mrs. Bartley Oliver and their eight children, of San Francisco, who started last October on a trip around the world with the impetus of an enthusiastic bon voyage from President Roosevelt at the White House, returned to New York May 10 on the Prinzess Irene. They are uncertain about the full extent of his material disasters. Mr. Oliver accumulated a fortune in San Francisco real estate. He is fifty-three years old and now poor. On the same vessel were Mr. and Mrs. F. Kelly, also San Franciscans, whose visit in Europe lasted just four hours. They heard of the disaster and at once posted back again.

Mrs. Frank Norris, widow of the author, also came in on the Princess Irene, on her way home to San Francisco. The warmth with which she was greeted by Lloyd Osbourne, a writer who was a stepson of Robert Louis Stevenson, revived the rumor of their engagement, but Mrs. Norris denied.

Among the passengers recently sailing for Yokohama are W. H. Ave, Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Crocker and two maids, the Misses Marion, Kate and M. J. Crocker, Masters Harry and Clark Crocker, James Duncan, Miss A. W. Duisenberg and maid, W. B. Porter, and Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Thorn.

Donald De V. Graham writes from Florence, Italy, to a friend in San Francisco: "I sincerely hope that you were not in San Francisco at the time of the terrible catastrophe. I am very anxious to hear of the safety of all my friends and up to this time, May 2, have not received a line. The O'Connors are here and they tell me that they have lost nearly everything. Mrs. L. L. Baker also tells me that she has suffered very heavily."

Notes About the Clubs.

By action of the Board of Directors of the Bohemian Club all assessments are suspended, and from May 1 the dues will be one-third of the regular amount, until further notice.

The Francisca Club, which was inaugurated under such pleasant auspices in San Francisco the first of the year, has secured temporary quarters in the Western Addition, which will soon be open to the club's members. The dues will be reduced and the club's expenses will be kept down to a minimum. The club's furniture was insured for $5000. Mrs. J. Downey Harvey is president of the club.

The Board of Directors of the Pacific-Union Club announces the leasing of the Borel residence, northeast corner of Washington and Franklin streets, for club purposes, possession to be taken immediately. Meals will be served as soon as chimneys are useable. Arrangements have also been made for luncheon and a lounging room at the St. Francis Hotel for the use of members daily, between the hours of 11 and 3 o'clock. It is hoped the hotel will be opened by June 15. All books and records contained in the club safe were destroyed.

The Board denies any intention of levying an assessment and says: "In view of certain published statements, it seems proper to advise members that the financial condition of the club is such that not only will an assessment be unnecessary, but if our insurance is paid in full, we shall be in better finances than when the new building was started. The total insurance is $343,505.00. The income from dues and admissions during the past year was $81,900.00. Allowing for a possible heavy shrinkage from last year's income, we should still have a considerable surplus, as our operating expenses will be materially decreased."

Down on the water front is a new club called "The Jolly Tars," which has a large and growing membership. R. P. Schwerin is the president. The initiation fee is $5 and the dues are $2.50 a month. Meals are 60 cents each. The clubhouse is the river steamboat H. J. Corcoran. Many merchants and transportation men found themselves quartered on the water front, and the eating booths and wagons did not offer the luncheons desired. So, taking a cue from Manager Pierce of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, who has made a hotel and restaurant of the coasting steamer Spokane, at Broadway wharf, the Jolly Tar's Club was formed, and it prospers amazingly.

Californians in the East.

Among the Californians who were recently in New York City are E. J. Regan, Mrs. A. M. Regan, Mrs. H. M. Hardy, Mrs. E. E. West-bury, Mrs. H. L. Hutchinson, Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Kelly, Mrs. Cris-well, Miss Spring, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Mulvey, Miss Battles, Miss Bass, Mrs. E. F. Franks, Mrs. L. B. Miller, C. G. Gebhard, Mrs. Gebhard, Mrs. A. F. Gunn, Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Radke, Mrs. J. F. Swift, Miss Dutard, Mrs. J. K. Hobbs, M. A. McLaughlin, Miss McLaughlin, Miss Moffatt, Mrs. Neal, Mrs. C. F. Clarke, Mrs. Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Britzell, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Feeton, Mr. and Mrs. H. Siegel and R. W. Palmanten and Mrs. N. Palmanten.

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander (nee Harriet Crocker) arrived at her home in New York City last week, after a brief visit to San Francisco. Mrs. Alexander's property losses in San Francisco, like those of all the branches of the Crocker family, are very large.

The death of Prince Charles Poniatowski in New York City was a sad blow to his wife, who was at their home in the City of Mexico. The Prince's remains have been taken to Paris for interment.

General and Mrs. Adna Chaffee and their younger daughter, Miss Helen Chaffee, are in Washington preparing to proceed to their new home in California.

Dr. and Mrs. Ernest E. Baker left for the East. Mrs. Baker will visit relatives at Cleveland, O., and other cities.

Across the Bay.

Mrs. G. B. Cook and Miss Butters have returned from Santa Barbara, and are at the Butters' Piedmont home. Mrs. Henry A. Butters and family will spend the summer at Chico this year.

The engagement has been announced of Miss Gladys F. Meyers to Eugene Russell Hallett, the secretary to President Wheeler, of the State University.

The engagement is announced of Miss Helen L. Chandler, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Chandler, of Telegraph avenue, Oakland, and Edgar Madison Sanborn.

Mrs. Charles R. Allen and her daughter, Miss Gertrude Allen, gave an informal reception last week at their home on Thirteenth street. The gathering was planned in honor of the Rev. Alexander Allen, formerly of Springfield, Ill., but now of Oakland.

Mrs. G. W. Beaver and her daughters, whose handsome home at 1300 Taylor street was burned, have taken a furnished house at 2511 Benvenue avenue, Berkeley.

Mr. Irvin J. Wiel, who was residing at the St. Francis Hotel at the date of the earthquake, has taken up his residence at 900 Union street, Alameda.

Mr. George H. Strong, of the firm of Dewey, Strong & Co., is to be addressed in Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred H. Beaver and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Madison have taken Professor Lawson's house on Warring street, Berkeley.

An informal wedding was solemnized at the home of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, when Miss Mary Edith Griswold was married to Colonel Edwin Emerson, Jr. David Starr Jordan gave the bride away.

Cards are out announcing the engagement of Ruth Foster, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Newton Hayes Foster of Los Angeles, to Robert Pierce Sherman, the University of California football player.

Mr. John W. Ferris, whose engagement to Mrs. Emma Spreckels-Watson has been recently announced, is residing at Ignacio, Marin county.

Miss Bessie Bowie, who has been abroad for some years studying music returned last week to California. Miss Bowie expects to spend the summer with her relatives, Miss May Friedlander and Miss Fanny Friedlander, in Belvedere.

Southern California.

John Vance Cheney is making a tour of the state, accompanied by his wife. They plan to be in Los Angeles early next week. At present they are in San Diego. San Francisco's public library was established under the direction of Mr. Cheney, who was its librarian until he left San Francisco to go to the Newberry library of Chicago.

The late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, was sitting with his wife on the porch of his house in Worcester when two express-wagons drove up and the men unloaded five enormous boxes on the sidewalk.

"What on earth, is that, Mr. Hoar?" asked Mrs. Hoar.

The Senator went out and peered at the boxes. Then he answered proudly: "My dear, these boxes contain the staircase from an ancestral home of the Hoar family in England. I bought it when I was last in England."

"Indeed?" replied Mrs. Hoar, not a whit impressed. "And what do you intend to do with it, may I ask?"

The Senator was somewhat confused. At last he said with great dignity: "Mrs. Hoar, that is merely a woman's question."

He Couldn't Doff His Shirt.

A statesman well-known but nameless so far as this story is concerned, went to Uncle Joe Cannon's party last week (says the Pioneer Press. He found many thirsty friends there and he had somewhat of a parched feeling in his throat himself. When he went home he was—well, at least, he was very dignified. He had worn for the first time one of a new batch of shirts his wife had bought for him. It was a coat shirt, that opened all the way down the front. He got into the house without too much noise and congratulated himself that Mrs. Statesman would know nothing about the condition. He found much difficulty in getting off his shirt. He tried many ways, but could make no headway. He struggled for half an hour and then called to his wife, who was sleeping in an adjoining room:

HOOSIER VERSE.

The Old Man and Jim.

Old man never bad much to say—
'Ceptin' to Jim,—
And Jim was the wildest boy he had,
And the old man jes' wrapped up in him!
Never heerd him speak but once
Er twice in my life,—and first time was
When the army broke out, and Jim he went,
The old man backin' him, fer three months;
And all 'at I heerd the old man say
Was, 'jes' as we turned to start away,—
'Well, good-by, Jim:
Take keer of yourse'f!"
'Peared like he was more satisfied
Jes' lookin' at Jim
And likin' him all to hisse'f-like, see?—

'Cause he was jes' wrapped up in him!
And over and over I mind the day
The old man come and stood round in the way
While we was drillin', a-watchin' Jim;
And down at the depot a-heerin' him say,—
'Well, good-by, Jim:
Take keer of yourse'f!"

Never was nothin' about the farm
Distinguishin' Jim;
Neighbors all ust to wonder why
The old man 'peared wrapped up in him;
But when Cap. Biggler, he writ back
'At Jim was the bravest boy he had
In the whole dern regiment, white er black,
And his fightin' good, as his farmin' bad,—
'At he had led, with a bullet clean
Bored through his thigh, and carried the flag
Through the bloodiest battle you ever seen,—
The old man wound up a letter to him
'At Cap. read to us, 'at said,—
'Tell Jim good-by;
And take keer of hisse'f!"

Jim come home jes' long enough
To take the whim
'At he'd like to go hack in the calvary—
And the old man jes' wrapped up in him!
Jim 'lowed 'at he'd had slob luck afore,
Guessed he'd tackle her three years more,
And the old man give him a colt he'd raised,
And follered him over to Camp Ben Wade,
And laid around fer a week er so,
Watchin' Jim on dress-parade;
'Tel final he rid away,
And last he heerd was the old man say,—
'Well, good-by, Jim:
Take keer of yourse'f!"

Tuk the papers, the old man did,
A-watchin' fer Jim,
Fully believin' he'd make his mark
Some way—jes' wrapped up in him!
And many a time the word 'ud come
'At stirred him like the tap of a drum:
At Petersburg, fer instance, where
Jim rid right into their cannons there,
And tuk 'em, and p'inted 'em t' other way,
And socked it home to the boys in grey,
As they skooted fer timber, and on and on—
Jim a lieutenant,—and one arm gone,—
And the old man's words in his mind all day,—
'Well, good-by, Jim:
Take keer of yourse'f!"

Think of a private, now, perhaps,
We'll say like Jim,
'At's clumb clean up to the shoulder-straps—
And the old man's jes' wrapped up in him!
Think of him—with the war plum' through,
And the glorious old Red-White-and-Blue
A-laughin' the news down over his head
And the old man, bendin' over him—
The surgeon turnin' away with tress
'At hadn't leaked fer years and years,
As the hand of the dyin' boy clung to his Father's, the old voice in his ears,—
'Well, good-by, Jim:
Take keer of yourse'f!"
—JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY.

Little Orphant Annie.

Little Orphant Annie's come to our house to stay,
An' wash the cups and saucers up, an' brush the crumbs away,
An' shoo the chickens off the porch, an' dust the hearth an' sweep
An' make the fire, an' bake the bread, an' earn her board an' keep;
An' all us other children, when the supper things is done,

We set around the kitchen fire an' has the mostest fun
A-lis'nin' to the witch tales 'at Annie tells about,
An' the Gobble-uns 'at glts you
Ef you
Don't Watch
Out!

One't they was a little boy who wouldn't say his prayers—
An' when he went to bed at night,
away upstairs,

His mammy heerd him holler an' his daddy heerd him bawl,
An' when they turn't the kivers down
he wasn't there at all.
An' they seeked him in the rafter room an' cubby-hole an' press,
An' seeked him up the chimby-flue,
an' everywhere, I guess,
But all they ever found was thist his pants an' round-about!—
An' the Gobble-uns'll git you
Ef you
Don't Watch
Out!

An' one time a little girl 'ud allus laugh an' grin,
An' make fun of ever' one an' all her blood-an'-kin,
An' onct when they was "company"
an' old folks was there,
She mocked 'em an' shocked 'em, an'
said she didn't care;
An' thist as she kicked her heels, an'
turn't to run an' hide,
They was two great big Black Things
a-standin' by her side,
An' they snatched her through the ceilin' fore she knowed what she's about!
An' the Gobble-uns'll git you
Ef you
Don't Watch
Out!

An' little Orphant Annie says, when the blaze is blue,
An' the lampwick sputters, an' the wind goes woo-oo!
An' you hear the crickets quit, an' the moon is grey,
An' the lightnin' bugs in dew is all squenched away—
You better mind yer parents, an' yer teachers fond an' dear,
An' cherish them 'at loves you, an' dry
the orphan's tear
An' he'p the pore an' needy ones 'at cluster all about
Er the Gobble-uns'll git you
Ef you
Don't Watch
Out!

Rabbit.

I s'pose it takes a feller 'at's ben
Raised in a country town, like me,
To 'prelate rabbits! . . . Eight or ten Bellerin' boys and two er three
Yelpin' dawgs all on the trail
O' one little pop-eyed cottontail!

'Bout the first good fall o' snow—
So's you kin track 'em, don't you know,
Where they've run—and one by one
Hop 'em up and chase 'em down
And prod 'em out of a old bresh-ple
Er a holler log they're a-hidin' roun',
Er crosstie-stack by the railroad track
'Bout a mille
Out o' sight o' the whole ding town!—
Well! them's times 'at I call good!

Rabbits!—w'y, as my thoughts goes back
To them old boyhood days o' mins,
I kin sic him now and see "Old Jack"
A-plowin' snow in a rabbit-track
And a-pitchin' over him, head and heels,

Like a blame hat-rack,
As the rabbit turns fer the timber-line Down the county ditch through the old cornfields!

Yes, and I'll say right here to you,
Rabbits that boys has earnt, like that—
On the old back porch where the pump's done froze—

Skinned and hung fer a night er two,
Then fried 'bout right, where your breakfast's at,

With hot brown gravy and shortenin' bread—

Rabbits, like them—er I ort to 'a' said,
I s'pose,

Rabbits like those

Ain't so p'ticular pore, I guess,
Fer eatin' purposes!

A Dilemma.

Don't steal from the Government, cov-etous gent,

Or away to the jug you'll be snuck.
Don't tell in the mags, where the stealings have went,

Or you'll then be a raker of muck.

DEL MONTE OFFERS

Hotel Del Monte was very slightly injured by the recent disturbance, and is offering a welcome shelter to all San Franciscans. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present.
The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home?
Special terms for families. Address

A PERMANENT HOME. OLD FAVORITES.

Cleon and I.

Cleon hath a million acres,
Ne'er a one have I;
Cleon dwelleth in a palace,
In a cottage I;
Cleon hath a dozen fortunes,
Not a penny I;
Yet the poorer of the twain is Cleon, and not I.

Cleon, true, possesseth acres,
But the landscape I;
Half the charms to me it yieldeth
Money cannot buy;
Cleon harbors sloth and dullness,
Freshening vigor I;
He in velvet, I in fustian,
Richer man am I.

Cleon is a slave to grandeur,
Free as thought am I;
Cleon fees a score of doctors,
Need of none have I;
Wealth surrounded, care environed,
Cleon fears to die;
Death may come, he'll find me ready;
Happler man am I.

Cleon ses no charm in nature,
In a daisy I;
Cleon hears no anthems ringing
In the sea and sky;
Nature sings to me forever,
Earnest listener I;
State for state, with all attendants,
Who would change? Not I.

—CHARLEY MACKAY.

The Heritage.

The rich man's son inherits lands,
And piles of brick, and stone, and gold;
And he inherits soft white hands,
And tender flesh that fears the cold,
Nor dares to wear a garment old;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits cares:

The bank may break, the factory burn.

A breath may burst his bubble shares,
And soft white hands could hardly earn

A living that would serve his turn;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits wants,
His stomach craves for dainty fare;
With sated heart he hears the pants
Of toiling hands with brown arms
bare,

And wearies in his easy chair;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
Stout muscles and a sinewy heart,
A hardy frame, a hardier spirit;
King of two hands, he does his part
In every useful toil and art;
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
Wishes o'erjoy'd with humble things,
A rank adjudged with toll-worn merit,
Content that from employment springs,

A heart that in his labor sings;
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
A patience learn'd of being poor,
Courage, if sorrow come, to bear it,
A fellow-feeling that is sure
To make the outcast bless his door;
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

O rich man's son! there is a toll
That with all others level stands:
Large charity doth never soil,
But only whiten, soft white hands,—
This is the best crop from thy lands;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being rich to hold in fee.

O poor man's son! scorn not thy state;
There is worse weariness than thine—

In merely being rich and great;
Toll only gives the soul to shine,
And makes rest fragrant and benign,—
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being poor to hold in fee.

Both, helms to some six feet of sod,
Are equal in the earth at last;
Both, children of the same dear God,
Prove title to your heirship vast
By record of a well-fill'd past;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Well worth a life to hold in fee.

—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

Ode on Solitude.

Happy the man whose wish and care
A few paternal acres bound,
Content to breathe his native air
In his own ground.

Whose herds with milk, whose fields
with bread,

Whose flocks supply him with attire;

Whose trees in summer yield him
shade,

In winter, fire.

Blest, who can unconcern'dly find
Hours, days, and years, slide soft away

In health of body, peace of mind,
Quiet by day,

Sound sleep by night; study and ease
Together mix'd; sweet recreation,
And innocence, which most does please
With meditation.

Thus let me live, unseen, unknown;
Thus unlamented let me die;
Steal from the world, and not a stone
Tell where I lie.

—ALEXANDER POPE.

A Psalm of Life.

Tell me not in mournful numbers;
"Life is but an empty dream!"
For the soul is dead that slumbers,
And things are not what they seem.

Life is real! Life is earnest!
And the grave is not its goal;
"Dust thou art, to dust returnest,"
Was not spoken of the soul.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each tomorrow
Finds us farther than today.

Art is long, and time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,

Still, like muffled drums, are beating
Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle,
Be a hero in the strife.

Trust no future, howe'er pleasant!
Let the dead past bury its dead!
Act—act in the living present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time—

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main
A forlorn and shipwreck'd brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.

—HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Chicago.

Blackened and bleeding, helpless, panting, prone,
On the charred fragments of her shattered throne,
Lies she who stood, but yesterday,
alone!

Queen of the West! by some enchanter taught
To lift the glory of Aladdin's court,
Then lose the spell that all that wonder wrought.

Like her own prairies by some chance seed sown;
Like her own prairies in one brief
day grown;
Like her own prairies in one fierce night mown.

She lifts her voice, and in her pleading call
We hear the cry of Macedon to Paul;
The cry for help that makes us kin to all.

But haply, with wan fingers, may she feel
The silver cup hid in the offered meal;
The gift her kinship and our loves reveal.

—BRET HARTE.

Conquering Fate.

I like the man who faces what he must,
With step triumphant and a heart
of cheer;

Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hopes fall, yet keeps unfaltering trust

That God is God; that somehow, true and just

His plans work out for mortals; not a tear

Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,

Falls from his grasp; better, with love, a crust

Than living in dishonor; envies not,
Nor loses faith in man, but does his best.

Nor even murmurs at his humbler lot,
But with a smile and words of hope,
gives best

To every teller; he alone is great,
Who by a life heroic conquers fate.

STAGE GOSSIP.

In sharp contrast to the many bread lines to be seen in the San Francisco streets is the queue extending along Geary street, from the corner of Steiner, where holders of grand opera tickets wait patiently three or four hours at a stretch for the refunding of their money. This "cash line" begins to form at 9 in the morning, and the last of it is not seen till 5 in the evening. On the third day of the refunding, about $8500 was paid out, making the aggregate for the three days $26,000. A day's work consists in waiting upon 150 persons. "We redeem everything that is distinguishable from ashes," said H. H. Campbell the manager. The ticket holders are given checks on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank. Thirty days will be needed to repay the $90,000 outstanding.

Dawn broke with a crash in the last act of "The Girl of the Golden West," the other night in New York. Off the stage, in the wings, where all is dark, a careless stage hand upset a boxful of broken glass, known in stage parlance as a "glass crash," just as the Road Agent said to the Girl: "The dawn is breaking—" This was enough for the audience. No day had ever been known to break before so that you could hear it. There was a pause then a roar of laughter, and the glass, the fractured dawn and Mr. Belasco's poetic picture all went down to disaster together.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt filled an engagement, May 18th and 19th, in the Auditorium at Venice, a unique seaside resort on Santa Monica Bay. Venice is a new seaside playground built by Abbot Kinney, the millionaire tobaccoist of Richmond, Va. He put his money from selling out to the Tobacco Trust into Southern California real estate, which has doubled and trebled. Venice is the realization of a dream of years—to reproduce in America the ancient city of the Adriatic. The streets are colonnaded, the architecture is all of the Venetian style, and the system of canals is patterned after that of the Italian city. They are fed daily by the tides, through an immense underground conduit with gates operated automatically. One of the attractions of the resort is a ship cafe called the Cabrillo, modeled after the Spanish galleons of old. It is anchored on piling alongside a thousand foot pleasure pier built into the breakers. Alongside the pier and over the water is the Auditorium, in which the divine Sarah played. It has a seating capacity of 3,600 and contains the largest and finest stage in Southern California. This building which cost $96,000 and was erected one year ago in twenty-eight days, is built above the water and contains as a part of its equipments a pipe organ that cost $20,000.

Mr. Barrie's latest stage plays "Punch" and "Josephine" have not proved very successful in London, and are to be withdrawn soon from the stage of the London Comedy in favor of—"Raffles."

Daniel Frohman is to produce a version of "The Spoilers" next season. The author, Rex Beach, and James Beach are the adapters.

Mr. Tyrone Power is to be starred in a dramatic version of Marie Corelli's "Barabbas." The lady herself is to superintend the rehearsals.

When Clyde Fitch's adaptation of "The House of Mirth" is produced in New York, Fay Davis will play the heroine.

The Mermaid Society of London has just amused itself by a performance of a translation of "The Bezemenovs" by Maxim Gorky. The critics seem, for the most part, to have found it tedious and absurd.

The old and popular comedy, "Fanchon, the Cricket," has been revived by the stock company at the Burbank Theater, Los Angeles. Phosa McAlister is in the cast.

Scores of actors who had good positions before the earthquake and fire in San Francisco, have become discouraged. Some of them managed to get away to join friends in the East. But others prefer to remain here; believing that California will come out all right again and that there will soon be good engagements for the players. Among some of the well-known San Francisco actors, who are now located in Oakland, who have decided to cast their fortunes with California awhile longer are L. R. Stockwell, the veteran comedian; W. L. Gleason, comedian and character actor; George P. Webster, and True Boardman, actor, singer and comedian.

Mr. Louis James is to appear as Falstaff next winter in "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and it is said that efforts are being made to secure "two actresses of international reputation" for the parts of Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page. The reference seemingly is to Mrs. Kendal and Ellen Terry.

Klaw & Erlanger intend to continue sending big attractions to the Pacific Coast, to be presented in Oakland until a larger theater has been built in San Francisco.

Mrs. "Nat" Goodwin, who arrived in London last week, announces that she means to settle down and enjoy life from a social point of view. She has already taken a house in Tallam street, leading out of Portland place, and will entertain extensively during the season. Mrs. Goodwin won laurels on the London stage last year and has had tempting offers from English managers; but she has made up her mind to drop the professional and assume the social role for two or three months at least. The duchess of Sutherland, the countess of Essex and Consuelo, duchess of Manchester, have all tried to persuade Mrs. Goodwin to help amuse society in their private entertainments at her own price, but all in vain. Mrs. George Cornwallis-West even went so far as to offer Mrs. Goodwin a house for the season if she would consent to lend her charms to her set for this year, but it was of no use. Mrs. Goodwin is now independent and knows her value too well to allow herself to fall under obligations even to the king's special friends.

"Monte Cristo" was first played by James O'Neill at Booth's Theater, New York City, twenty-five years ago, where it made an instantaneous success. He has played in it ever since. O'Neill declares he will never appear in the piece again after the present season.

Maude Adams will make her appearance in the new Barrie play, which has not yet received its title, at the new Shaftesbury Avenue, London, which Charles Frohman is now building. The new theater is being built on the model of New York's Empire Theater.

W. H. Crane is to appear in a dramatic version of "Letters of a Self-Made Merchant to his Son," next season. The play is to be called "Old Gorgon Graham."

Maude Adams is to have a private car next season which will combine living apartments with a theater equipped for rehearsal, according to report. It is to be known as the "Thinker Bell."

Ferris Hartman, the comic opera comedian, who has been engaged in commercial pursuits in San Francisco, was a loser by the great fire. He will return to the stage.

De Wolf Hopper is to revive "Wang" and "El Capitan" in New York. This latter work was the first, and has proved to be the greatest of the operatic successes of John Philip Sousa. The march, which includes its first act, and to which the piece gave a name, has been played all over the world. The hook of "El Capitan" was written by Charles Klein, author of "The Music Master" and "The Lion and the Mouse."

The popularity of "The House of Mirth" has led to a request for its dramatization, and Mrs. Wharton is now engaged on it in collaboration with Clyde Fitch. There are two ways, she says, to make a play out of a novel. One is to regard it as mere raw material, and use only what is available for strictly dramatic purposes. The other is to adhere closely to the scenes and the story of the original, aiming to present it as nearly as possible as it would have appeared in real life. For the purposes of a popular play, it would be necessary to give Lily's story a happy ending, and this Mrs. Wharton resolutely refuses to do. That the play will excite much popular curiosity there can be no doubt. Few American hooks have ever aroused so much discussion.

Elizabeth Murray, whose singing of "Bedelia," "Melancholy Mose" and "Dat Measley Man" marked an epoch in popular songs, will be at the Orpheum next week with new selections. Bailey, Austin and company return from a trip to Europe with a new farcical act called "Two American Beauties." Katherine Dahl, a noted soprano, comes direct from the Alhambra, London, with the latest selections. Carson and Willard, German dialect comedians, will present their original concoction, "Frizzled Finance." For her second week Miss Valerie Bergere will present her capital playlet "His Japanese Wife." Mosher, Houghton and Mosher will continue their bicycle act. Eva Mudge, Clifford and Burke and Orpheum Motion Pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete an excellent program. Town ticket office Donlon's drug store, Fillmore and Sutter streets.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Merely a Confession.

I love to cuss

The octopus,
The plutocrats condemn;
But if I had
A chance, egad,
I would be one of them!

My Lady's Gown.

Just pull it in
To meet her chin—
A ballet-dress 'twill be;
Then let it down
To reach the ground—
An evening-dress you'll see.

How They Do It in the Duma.

"What was it," cried the frightened Czar,
"That streak of lightning hit?"
"It wasn't lightning, Nicholas," Replied the placid Witte.
"It was over at the Duma, and in one of the debates
On holding down the Vodka Trust and regulating rates
The Speaker pulled a forty-four and shot some delegates,
For that's the way they do it at the Duma."

"What was that awful cannonade?"
The Czar exclaimed. "A bomb?"
"Don't throw a fit, Your Majesty,"
Said Witte, with perfect calm.
"It was over at the Duma, where some duffers tried to do
The Sea of Azof Ship Canal that I'd framed up for you.
We plugged them with some dynamite, and now it's going through.
For that is how we do it in the Duma."

"What was that fierce volcanic shock?"
The Czar in terror cried.
"Don't let that worry you at all,"
The gentle Witte replied.
"It was over at the Duma, where the foolish members yearned
So loudly for their liberties that presently we burned
A half a tone of melinite, and now they have adjourned,
For that's the way we do it in the Duma."
—JAMES J. MONTAGUE.

The Time to Hear the Chorus.

Now you hear the old-time chorus on the river banks so green,
Where the lazy water-lilies o'er the ripples roll an' lean,
An' the sunbeam comes a-slantin' through the overhangin' trees,
An' you git a scent o' blossoms from the meadow-blowin' breeze—

"Fish, fish, fish!"
An' the line a-goin' 'Swish!'
Oh, the perch is sich a beauty
When he's fried, an' in the dish!"
What joys are now the fisherman's, who lingers long an' late
On the green banks of a river, with a demijohn of bait!
Though he follers Ananiaa when his "catch" is mighty slim,
It's a hallelulaa season to the very soul o' him!

"Fish, fish, fish!"
An' the line a-goin' 'Swish!'
Oh, the perch is sich a beauty
When he's fried, an' in the dish!"
—Atlanta Constitution.

When the Dreamer Awoke.

I dreamed that ships were sailing through the Panama Canal,
I dreamed that Emperor William called M. Fallieres "old pal!"
I dreamed that Secretary Taft had lost two hundred pounds,
I dreamed that John L. Sullivan had stood for seven rounds.
I dreamed that J. D. R. had given all his wealth away.
I dreamed that Henry Watterson was learning how to pray.

I dreamed that our Vice President had deftly cracked a joke—
Then I knew that I was dreaming, and I instantly awoke.
—Louisville Courier Journal.

The London Playgoers' Club announces the end of its 'playwrights' competition.' This was started many months ago, it may be remembered, with the view of providing opportunity to those gifted dramatists to whose works malignant managers refused to give a hearing. Now the whole enterprise has been abandoned in despair. Two hundred and fifty plays, it is reported, were received and read, but alas! there was not among them one which the committee would dare to recommend to any manager for production. All were either irretrievably bad or wholly unfit for stage purposes. No other result could have been expected, and it proves nothing that was not known before. The men endowed with sufficient literary ability to write good plays long ago discovered that they could find better market for their wares elsewhere than in the theater.

San Francisco's Titles, Title Deeds, and Title Insurance Companies.

Once upon a time there lived in the city of San Francisco a man named Peter Smith. He was a doctor. It was a long time ago, and the business district of San Francisco was much more populous then than it is now. It was a rude, rough, primitive city, lacking in many of the appliances of modern life. The water was bad and had to be boiled. People disregarded the most primitive conditions of hygiene, and sanitary laws were unknown.

A pestilence came upon San Francisco. There were no public hospitals in this primitive city. Men picked up the unfortunates smitten by the pestilence that walketh in the noon-day, and took them to the sanitarium of Peter Smith. Doctor Peter would have objected to these pauper patients, but this would have been denounced as "inhumanity" and he prudently refrained. As the days passed by the small sanitarium of Peter Smith soon became crowded with the sick poor of San Francisco. Peter Smith made protestations to the Alcalde and the Ayuntamiento of San Francisco, (who represented then what we now call our Mayor and Board of Supervisors)—concerning his inability to provide for so many of San Francisco's sick poor. But San Francisco had no money, so she paid Peter Smith in scrip.

When the scrip came due San Francisco would not pay Peter Smith. Thereupon Peter Smith threatened to bring suit. San Francisco laughed at him, and bade him go to. But Peter Smith sued; he got judgment; he levied execution. "Execution," says the old legal maxim, "is the fruit of the judgment and the end of the lawing." But the execution which Peter Smith levied on San Francisco turned out to be but bitter fruit. And it was only the beginning of the lawing. The Sheriff duly advertised a sale of San Francisco's beach and water lots, those same lots whereon so many buildings stood a few weeks ago which now are ashes. When the sale was advertised San Francisco only laughed the louder. It was so amusing to think of a poor doctor attempting to use the Sheriff to attach the property of a big city and to knock it down at auction at Sheriff's sale.

However, the sale took place as advertised. In those days nearly every man was a gambler. So the merchants, the speculators, and the gamblers of the time "antied up" a few dollars, just as they would at the monte, keno, and faro games at the gorgeous Jenny Lind saloon on the plaza where the beautiful hurdy-girls used to smile on the returning miners laden with "coarse gold" from the placer diggings. It was quite a popular amusement to put up a few "slugs"—which was the octagonal fifty dollar gold piece of the time—in the Peter Smith game against San Francisco.

The amount which San Francisco owed to Peter Smith was small. San Francisco's contempt for it and him was large. The contempt expressed by the city for the medico's execution sale was so frank and open that prices under the sale ruled extremely low. No man cared to hazard more than two or three slugs to buy a beach and water lot under the Sheriff's title coming from a judgment against the city to Peter Smith. So all of the beach and water lots brought but a few thousand dollars, and thus Peter Smith did not get satisfaction for his judgment. He got probably less than one-tenth of his just dues. In short, the city of San Francisco cheated him out of his just claim. But the city of San Francisco also cheated itself.

The whirligig of time brings its revenges. The cheated Peter passed away. Years rolled by, and the Peter Smith title slowly filtered through the courts. At last the highest courts held that the Peter Smith title was good. The speculators with their "slugs," the gamblers with their "little flier" won. San Francisco paid dearly for her attempt to defraud. She paid seven times seven, yea, seventy times seven fold, the amount of the debt which she had owed to Peter Smith. For more than half a century, the real estate titles of San Francisco were clouded by the claims of Peter Smith. Long after that medico was reposing in his grave his ghost still haunted the corridors of the San Francisco courts and squeaked and gibbered through the water front streets.

Twenty years after Peter Smith had been laid with his fathers, San Francisco found that she was weary of the presence of some of her pioneers who were sleeping their last sleep in the Yerba Buena Cemetery. This was the triangle of land which lay between Market and McAllister streets. San Francisco decided that she would dig up her pioneers' bones, carry them elsewhere, and use their "eternal resting place" as the site for a City Hall. So she dug them up and carried them out to the Point Lobos headland overlooking the Golden Gate. If these pioneers ever revisit the glimpses of the moon, their ghosts must have laughed spectral laughs on the night of the 19th of April, 1906, when they saw the buildings which San Francisco had erected over their old resting place swept away by the blasts of flame, while their own narrow homes on Point Lobos were out of the path of the fire.

Out of the old Yerba Buena Cemetery San Francisco created a "City Hall Park" on which was erected the City Hall and the Hall of Records at a cost of seven millions of dollars. Around both City Hall and Hall of Records was open ground. In this San Francisco patterned after the Federal Government. Our National Government never erects a building in any city which does not have around it open ground. If there be not streets or squares already there the Government reserves open ground. Thus it is that in the midst of great conflagrations it often happens that the Federal buildings stand. During the one which has just destroyed San Francisco there still may be seen standing, in the fire-swept waste, the United States Postoffice, the United States Court Building, the Mint, and other buildings. Therefore, when San Francisco erected her City Hall and her Hall of Records, inasmuch as she girt them with open ground as does the Federal Government, there was hope that they would stand when other buildings fell before a fire.

Did this come to pass? No. It was only a pistol shot from the San Francisco City Hall to the United States Postoffice. Yet the Federal Government building is standing today, while the City Hall, the Hall of Records, and the Hall of Justice of San Francisco are wrecked and ruined.

San Francisco should have kept open ground around her City Hall and Hall of Records. But she was not wise enough to do so. Years ago some Board of Supervisors, fired with penny-wise economy for the city or grafting greed for themselves, sold off the land around the City Hall and the Hall of Records. It would have been folly even to lease it, but had it been leased San Francisco would at least still own the land and would have taken in from ground rent during the last thirty years some millions of dollars. But even this was not done; the land was sold outright. The few thousands of dollars which it brought were wasted, dissipated, muldled away years ago. Of the "City Hall Park" of San Francisco there remains nothing but a memory. A Board of Supervisors is elected for only a couple of years; the body is ephemeral; many of them are often men of poor character; such a body of men can have only temporary administration of the finances of a city which presumably will exist in perpetuity;—can such a title, conveyed by such of men, be a good one? There is grave doubt in the minds of whether such a body of men could give a good title. There is doubt that the organic law forbids any body of Aldermen or Supervisors to alienate land belonging to the public. There was talk at the time of the inability of the Supervisors to convey or give a good title. They did at least convey, and the private individuals who acquired what title the Supervisors could give have occupied the land ever since. Did they get a good title?

Ephemeral Boards like Supervisors and Aldermen are elected and pass away. The good they do may live after them. The evil certainly does. Leaving utterly aside the question whether they had the right to alienate lands belonging to the public, see what evil has been done years after their questionable act was accomplished. Had the then Supervisors allowed open ground to remain about the City Hall and Hall of Records, it is almost a certainty that those buildings would not have been destroyed. Now they are gone, and with the Hall of Records is gone all the municipal evidence of title to all the real estate in San Francisco.

There never was probably in the history of the world a community of intelligent white men where there has been so much chicanery, so much forgery, so much perjury, and so much bloodshed over land titles as in San Francisco. Men who are not yet old remember seeing Charlie Duane and his gangs of squatters guarding with guns disputed blocks of land in the Western Addition. Some land owners in San Francisco have paid for their titles three or four times over. Now when after more than half a century it has seemed as if the permanence of land titles were established, the only municipal evidence of their existence has gone up in smoke and fire.

Can it then be possible that a great city like San Francisco has no records of land titles at all? Is the only evidence of property the fact of actual possession? Shall the man with the strong hand take away land from the weak woman or the orphan child? Is there no remedy for this gross carelessness on the part of the municipality of San Francisco?

There is no public evidence of ownership; there is no official testimony of title. Private abstract and title companies have been more careful than the officials duly elected by the people of San Francisco. There are at least two title companies which kept their records with such care that today they are unharmed and intact. What a contrast between municipal corporations and private corporations! Here is a great city which cannot do anything so well as any corporation. It could not take care of its sick poor; it could not take care of its water-front lands, a heritage from the Mexican government through the State government. And today it cannot take care of even its most sacred records of property as well as a common commercial corporation. Yet we are told that a municipality is better fitted to manage any sort of business than any corporation can.

What is the attitude of the city in this juncture? What is the attitude of the abstract and title companies at this crisis? They are what might be expected. The city desires to reproduce the records of the title companies. The city desires to do it either for nothing at all or at a very small expense. On the other hand, the title companies claim they have the city on the hip. The city has no records and the title companies have. The title companies naturally demur to parting with their stock in trade, which would be the result of throwing open their records to the citizens of San Francisco. The citizens threaten; the title companies bluster. At the present writing the citizens are threatening to condemn the title companies' records under the statute of eminent domain, while the title companies are threatening to remove their records from the jurisdiction of the State.

One may not greatly admire the attitude of the title companies and at the same time admit that they are within their strict legal rights. The city of San Francisco has been careless with her records—grossly, inexcusably careless—and they are ashes. The title companies have been careful with their records and they are intact today. The city of San Francisco possibly might condemn and seize them, but we question much whether such an action would stand the scrutiny of the Federal courts. Furthermore, in the light of some of the history of the city, on which we have just touched, it would be unwise for San Francisco to attempt any further juggling with right and wrong. The records of the title companies are their property, and they are entitled to the peaceable possession of them under the law. Like Shylock they are entitled to their pound of flesh nearest the city's heart. But if they take it they will not take with it the sincere and unalloyed respect and admiration of their fellow citizens.

What a tangled skein is the tale of titles in San Francisco since Americans by hard swearing created a ghostly Spanish "pueblo" where there never was one. We have paid for it many times. We have paid millions for the Peter Smith cloud on titles where thousands would have satisfied that poor medico fifty years ago. We are paying now for the loss of our title-deeds because a greedy or corrupt Board of Supervisors gave away the people's park thirty years ago.

Is there, in this world, retribution for evil after all? One can scarcely think so, for there are so many rich rascals who die respected and honored as pew-holders, vestrymen, and bank directors. But sometimes the optimist may think that there is some retribution in this world, and that it is not all left for the Lord to attend to in the next, because he really will have too much to do.

The steady trade winds blow; from Point Lobos to Yerba Buena they comb over the blackened hills of San Francisco; they whirl from Russian Hill to Rincon Point; they moan a great Aeolian requiem through the tangle of wires. And borne on the wings of the wind, over the vacant beach and water lots of San Francisco, there surely must writhe and wreath and wriggle with laughter the ghost of Doctor Peter Smith.

Personal Factors in Legislation.

The curious causes which affect men's minds in making laws for the government of their fellow men are emphasized by recent happenings in Washington. Some years ago, when Prince Henry of Prussia was the guest of this country, the President tendered him a formal dinner in Washington. Among the Senators invited was Tillman of South Carolina. The day before the dinner Senator Tillman became involved in a controversy with McLaurin, his colleague in the Senate from South Carolina. As a result they engaged in a fist fight, and Tillman knocked McLaurin out with a blow of his trusty left. Outraged at this infringement of the "courtesy of the Senate," the President recalled his invitation to Tillman. This aroused the irascible South Carolina Senator to the highest pitch of resentment: since that day he has never called upon the President, and has lost no opportunity to "get even" with him when the President's pet measures come up in the Senate.

Senator Aldrich is generally looked upon as the leader of the so-called "Railroad Senators." When the railway rate bill came up in committee, it at once developed the same marked differences of opinion that subsequently existed in the committee, in the Senate, and in the White House. At last Senator Aldrich determined to kill the rate bill, as he hoped, and at the same time to accomplish its slaughter by something "humorous but lingering." He, therefore, suggested that the bill be reported to the Senate by Senator Tillman. This amazed the committee and the whole Senate, for the bill was a Republican measure, a White House measure, and was in the hands of the Senate majority. Senator Tillman was not only a member of the Democratic minority, but was a personal enemy of the President. Thus the saturnine Aldrich hoped to give a quietus to the bill, to deal the President a blow under the fifth rib, and by Senator Tillman's antics with the bill to add something to the gaiety of nations.

To the surprise of all concerned, Senator Tillman accepted the trust with the utmost seriousness. He devoted himself to the advocacy of the rate bill, and he has continued to push it ever since. So far did his advocacy go that a few weeks ago it was believed that it would lead to a reconciliation between him and the President; it was even rumored at Washington that the President would receive him cordially if he called. But Senator Tillman did not call at the White House, though he continued to espouse the White House bill.

Any doubt as to Senator Tillman's feeling toward President Roosevelt is now removed by the events of the past few days. Last month the President appointed one of his Secretaries, Benjamin F. Barnes, to the office of Postmaster of Washington, an agreeable office with a salary of six thousand dollars a year and much political influence. Mr. Barnes is the identical Secretary who was on duty at the White House the day that Mrs. Minor Morris visited there; he was the official who ejected her, with the resulting scandal of which he was the cyclone center. Senator Tillman has now fled charges with the committee having under consideration the nomination of Mr. Barnes. Tillman protests against Barnes' confirmation, on the ground that his conduct when he expelled Mrs. Morris constituted "inhuman and brutal treatment"; Tillman furthermore alleges that in the attempt to cover up his conduct Barnes made false statements. Senator Tillman will probably push this matter with the same energy which he shows in pushing the railway rate bill.

All rumors of reconciliation between the President and Senator Tillman would have been proved baseless by this attack upon the President's secretary, even had not the Bailey-Tillman assault upon the White House taken place. But now the war between the President and the South Carolina Senator will be a war to the knife and the knife to the hilt.

The Traders Fire Insurance Company.

The very remarkable liquidation proceedings of the Traders Fire Insurance Company of Chicago continue to excite comment. Every day reports are given out that attempts are being made to "put the company on its feet." We are told that one of the directors, John J. Mitchell, returned from California "just too late to prevent the appointment of a receiver." Had he been in Chicago at the time, we are informed, no receiver would have been appointed, and the Traders would now be paying its losses to re-joining policy holders. It is a very great pity that Mr. Mitchell arrived there so late. We are also told that Mr. S. A. Rothermel has been accused of "hurrying the corporation into the hands of a receiver." Mr. Rothermel says that it "ain't so." He also says, "I do not care to talk." He adds, "I shall soon tell some things that will throw light on the case." All of the policy holders will hail with interest Mr. Rothermel's new light. The Chicago papers say that "Mr. Rothermel appeared deeply affected by the charges, and said his thirty years' service in the insurance business ought to show he was honorable." Most policy holders will admit that it ought to, but few will admit that it does. However, we all of us sympathize with Mr. Rothermel in his deep affliction, and the policy holders of the Traders would sympathize with him more deeply if they were not so much engrossed in sympathizing with themselves.

Among the others items which came from Chicago is this: that the strongest element in favor of a receivership was the 2900 shares (out of the Traders total of 5000 shares) held by three estates, the Buckingham, the Sturges and the Seipp-Lefens estates. It had been thought that a new company might be formed to take over the business of the Traders, but the three estates in question voted solidly in favor of liquidation, non-payment and dishonor. Outside of the estates there was a group of rich men who had held Traders stock for many years, and during all these years had received thumping dividends from it. The idea of paying in several hundred dollars as an assessment to meet their just debts gave them cold feet, and they also decided to follow the easy path of dishonor.

How high a percentage of honor will be shown in a Chicago Trader when he is subject to fire assay in the regions below is a question as yet undetermined. We think that it is low. But, honor or no honor, some of these sleek, fat Traders with good, capon-lined stomachs are going to have a run for their money. The organization of California policy holders is now being compacted, and that will be one of the tasks of its corps of attorneys and actuaries. In California there is a statute making stockholders individually liable for their pro rata share of corporate obligations. There is no such statute in Illinois. It is, however, claimed by eminent lawyers that all insurance corporations licensed to do business in California come in this regard under the jurisdiction of California laws. The attorneys for the Traders hold that a California policy holder cannot hold a stockholder of an Illinois company liable beyond the face value of his paid-in stock. This opinion is quite natural from a Traders' attorney. On the other hand, Attorney W. E. McCornack, author of "The Insurance Law of Illinois," holds that each stockholder of the Traders is individually and personally liable for such proportion of all the debts of the company as the amount of his share bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock. According to Attorney McCornack each policy holder in California sustaining a loss under a Traders' policy may institute suit against an individual stockholder in the Traders without first beginning suit against the corporation.

That there should be any difference at all in the attorneys' opinions is in itself encouraging. For policy holders in this State have believed that there was no case at all against the stockholders of a defaulting corporation in another State. But it is certain that there is cause of action, and the law is reputed to have a remedy for every wrong. When the policy holders reflect that nearly three-fifths of the Traders' stock is held by three rich estates, they should take heart of grace. There is nothing so vulnerable as an estate. A dead man is no good. A live man can fight for his stuff, but a dead man cannot. A rich estate is like a large, fat sack of gold with the mouth open. Everybody that has a chance dips into it. The lawyers, being closest up to the sack, dip more frequently than anybody else, and therefore they get more. In this particular case we find three large, fat sacks left by three presumably large, fat Chicago traders. If the California policy holders of the Traders should fail to get much out of the live shareholders of that queer corporation, it would not be surprising, because the way a large, fat rich man can wriggle through a very small hole in a tight legal fence to get away from his honest debts is surprising. But the heirs and assigns of deceased fat rich men find great difficulty in hauling through such holes brick blocks, railroads, gas works, coal mines, steel works, hereditaments and appurtenances. Therefore, it is to be hoped that the organized California policy holders in the Traders will try and get their honest dues. If they cannot get it out of the live traders of the Traders, perhaps they will get it out of the large, fat sacks of the dead Chicago traders.

The Ins and Outs of State Politics.

Although San Francisco is still indifferent to everything save the calamity which weighs so heavily upon her, the rest of the State is beginning to pay some heed to other matters, even to politics. In fact, the way in which the northern, central, and southern cities are beginning to discuss matters entirely unconnected with the recent fire, is causing some slight feeling in San Francisco. Furthermore, the interior cities, particularly Los Angeles, are growing restless under the long continued legal holidays. They declare that sufficient time has elapsed to enable the San Francisco merchants to get on their feet, that the banks there have opened, and that it is time that the rest of the State were enabled to resume their ordinary business, some of which is checked by the continuance of legal holidays. This is notably the case in Los Angeles, where a bond election has been impending. The citizens there have been in doubt whether to hold the election on the date set, or to postpone it on account of the legal holidays. Yet either course of action they fear may imperil the validity of the bonds.

Another matter which is causing dissension in the State is the contemplated extra session of the Legislature. San Francisco has demanded that an extra session be called for the purpose of passing certain laws which her citizens consider urgent. Among these may be mentioned the following:

Amendments to the Constitution and to the Charter permitting the municipality to purchase and sell real estate—this for the purpose of adding to the number of and enlarging parks and squares, creating boulevards, and widening streets.

To repair and improve the San Francisco water front, issuing bonds for same.

Appropriating moneys for the reconstruction of State hospitals and State institutions like the Agnews Asylum in Santa Clara county.

Providing a building or buildings in San Francisco for the use of the many offices and bureaus of State institutions which are not scattered throughout this city in rented buildings.

The passage of laws providing for duplicating the records now owned by title, insurance and abstract companies, in order to replace those municipal records destroyed by fire.

To put into operation, if it be deemed advisable, the general law passed March 9, 1903, copied from the Torrens Land and Transfer Act of Australia, by which the State practically guarantees the title to land when such title has been duly made a matter of record in a court of justice.

To extend the time for the completion of the assessment roll and to extend the time wherein taxes may be paid without charges for delinquency, when due to "great calamity or earthquake, fire or epidemic, occurring at or about the time when the taxes would become delinquent."

Constitutional amendments for the repeal of the mortgage tax provisions, for the reason that the complex laws of California in this regard seem calculated to deter Eastern capitalists from making loans by which we could rebuild our shattered city.

Amendments to the collateral inheritance tax law doubling the amount of the tax exacted.

Legislation empowering the city to make further bond issues for the purpose of constructing school-houses, police stations, buildings for the courts of justice, civil and criminal, officers of the city and county, fire engine houses, and the numerous other structures needed for transacting the business of the municipality.

Governor Pardee for several weeks refused to say whether he would or would not call an extra session. Finally he slightly modified his attitude, and tacitly allowed it to be assumed that he might call an extra session, but only on condition that all the measures to be debated there should be included in the call. Thus (said the Governor) it would be possible to limit the time of the session and to limit the legislation; he was, he added, unalterably opposed to an open call, and would refuse to call the Legislature together unless he was absolutely sure that their deliberations should be confined to certain set measures. The Governor can scarcely be criticised for his caution. It is a dangerous thing for a Governor who wishes to succeed himself to call an extra session during the period immediately preceding the campaign. While Governor Pardee, being an upright and patriotic citizen, would, doubtless, set aside personal matters such as these in the face of the urgent need for emergency legislation, he cannot be blamed for his action in confining the Legislature to the discussion of certain set measures, otherwise its session might last indefinitely and take an illimitable range.

But the pressure resulting from the dissension in the State of which we have spoken is beginning to bear hardly upon him. San Francisco believes that the session should be called to consider her needs and her needs alone. But Los Angeles has suddenly come forward with a demand for legislation consolidating the suburban towns around her into a municipal corporation somewhat similar to the "city and county of San Francisco." She alleges, as her only motive for this, her urgent desire to bring about immediately the financing of a water scheme by which she intends to bring a large supply of water from the Owens river region in the Sierra Nevada range. The minimum figure for the cost of this is set at twenty millions of dollars. Los Angeles believes that, as the suburban towns around her will share in the advantages of this water supply, they should be brought into a municipal corporation in order that they may share its burdens. The suburban towns manifest no enthusiasm about joining Los Angeles, but she is determined to have them whether or no. To the argument from San Francisco that this is merely a subtle scheme for increasing the size and population of Los Angeles at a time when San Francisco is stricken down, in order that the southern city may make herself the first city in point of population on the coast, Los Angeles briefly replies that the accusation is untrue; that this is indeed an urgent matter, for she has been so impressed by the utter wiping out of San Francisco by fire, owing to a temporary failure of her water supply, that the southern city is determined to bring at once within her confines so enormous a volume of water from the mountains that she will never be in peril from any conflagration.

San Francisco might possibly have withdrawn her objections to the legislation demanded by Los Angeles were it not that Oakland immediately came to the front with a similar proposition. Oakland desires to annex the large and thriving towns around her within a radius of many miles. She has not a distinct water famine to allege as a motive for this legislation, as has Los Angeles, but she has a number of other excellent reasons. Both San Francisco and Los Angeles suspect her of ulterior motives—a desire merely to push herself to the front and become the first city in point of population in the State. When San Francisco at first demurred to the Los Angeles demand for consolidation legislation, Los Angeles frankly replied that if San Francisco did not withdraw her objections Los Angeles would, if possible, defeat a call for an extra session, and if it were called she would most certainly defeat all legislation that San Francisco desired. When San Francisco thereupon temporarily was silenced concerning the Los Angeles demand, Oakland interposed with her similar demand. This at first produced a triangular duello, but now it seems as if San Francisco feared Oakland more than the southern city; it seems now as if she were siding with Los Angeles against her rival across the bay.

This is a very embarrassing proposition which presents itself for the consideration of Governor Pardee. Surely never was a worthy man placed in so perplexing a position. If he does anything which goes against the interests of Oakland, he will find himself knifed in the coming convention by the delegation from his home county, Alameda. If he goes against Los Angeles, all southern California will oppose him. If he goes against San Francisco scores of thousands of knives will flash in the air. San Francisco is feeling very sore all around; sore against Providence; sore against the elements; sore against her sister cities; sore against the State. She is already feeling a little sore against Governor Pardee because she thinks he has not taken sides with her as loyally as he should. The slightest diversion from what she believes to be her due from him will bring about an opposition to the Governor from the metropolis.

In the event of such opposition to Governor Pardee, what is the political condition of San Francisco? Has the fire wiped out the Assembly Districts in the burned section? Will re-districting and re-registering in the Assembly Districts be required? The districts affected are the 28th, 29th, and 30th Assembly Districts south of Market, the 42d, 43d, 44th and 45th districts north of Market, and the 31st district, which has been almost entirely wiped out. These districts are political divisions of the city and State. They are made so by the Political Code. They remain such political districts even if not a single voter continues to reside there. No voter has lost by the fire his legal residence in his district. Every voter retains his legal residence in his district until he has established a legal domicile elsewhere and declared his intention not to return.

As to re-districting the Constitution provides that the decennial census of the United States shall be the basis of representation. The last State apportionment was made in 1901, and no new adjustment can be made until 1910. Therefore, at the next session of the Legislature San Francisco will have nine Senators and eighteen Assemblymen, just as she did before the fire. The voters in the burned Assembly Districts when a new readjustment begins are entitled to register in their old precincts, and they are also entitled to vote there so long as they do not establish legal domiciles elsewhere. It makes no difference where they are residing, whether it be in Oakland or Berkeley, San Rafael or San Jose, they do not lose their legal status as legal residents of their Assembly Districts. Nor do they lose their right to vote because they have been driven involuntarily from their legal domiciles by the conflagration.

There is no doubt that this condition of affairs may lead to "colonizing" and other irregularities, but this fateful year, 1906, has brought about many irregularities, and irregularities in registering and voting are among the least of those that afflict us. Therefore, while San Francisco's vote will doubtless be much smaller than it was at the last election, San Francisco still will cast a vote. She is a factor in the coming campaign and a very important one. She must be reckoned with, and therefore it is that we say that Governor Pardee is placed in a very embarrassing position by the dissensions in the State caused by San Francisco's disaster.

The Republican State Central Committee will meet to call the State Nominating Convention as late as possible. They will probably wait until after Congress adjourns. The delegates to the Republican Convention will be apportioned on the Roosevelt vote, which will give 825 delegates, the largest convention ever assembled in this State. The last Republican Convention contained 734 delegates.

The avowed candidates for Governor whom Governor Pardee will be called upon to meet are J. O. Hayes, the millionaire editor of the San Jose Mercury, who will have behind him the solid delegation from Santa Clara county; Thomas Flint Jr., State Senator from San Benito county; Warren Porter, the well-known banker of Watsonville; Charles M. Belshaw, State Senator from Contra Costa county. The unavowed candidates are Mayor Schmitz and former Governor Gage.

In 1904 Governor Gage defended the railway strikers of Los Angeles in the courts against the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe. While he was Governor he interfered in the ugly teamster's strike in San Francisco and was generally reputed to have settled it. When the Republican Convention refused to renominate him in 1902, more than fifty thousand Labor Union men were so embittered that they voted against Dr. Pardee. There is no doubt that Governor Gage would receive a very heavy Labor Union vote. His nomination would break up the Republican machine in San Francisco, for the Chronicle and Call have both been bitterly inimical to Gage. It will be remembered that he brought suits for libel against the Call, which were subsequently withdrawn by him. Four years ago Governor Gage carried in San Francisco seventeen assembly districts at the primary election. There never has been any attack on his standing as a regular Republican.

The other unavowed candidate is Mayor Schmitz. For many weeks before the great fire, there was some uncertainty as to Mayor Schmitz' position. It looked as if he were a potential candidate for the governorship, with Mr. Ruef as his faithful ally; if, however, the State seemed averse to his election, it looked as if he would turn his attention to succeeding himself as Mayor, while Mr. Ruef would espouse the cause of Governor Gage. But the great disaster in San Francisco has completely changed the political situation; as it has changed so many other things. The capitalists and the employing class, who previously were extremely hostile to Mayor Schmitz, have changed their attitude completely. All of these have ceased to oppose him; many of them have become his friends and admirers; while the Labor Union men, with whom before he was popular, have now made him their idol. There can be no doubt that Mayor Schmitz is infinitely stronger in the State today than he was on the 17th of April, 1906.

It must not be supposed that the great disaster in San Francisco is going to make the rest of the State lose interest in conventions, nominations and elections. We have commented in these columns on the disposition on the part of our sister cities to bear up with fortitude under the calamities which now weigh so heavily upon San Francisco, and to endeavor to assuage their grief over her misfortune by providing for the trade that we have lost. Correspondingly, while we San Franciscans are endeavoring to rebuild our shattered city, our fellow citizens in the rest of the State are more than willing to "do politics" for us, while we are otherwise occupied.

Insurance Companies Disintegrating—Insurance Claimants Organizing.

In last week's issue we remarked that the evasive and disingenuous attitude of the fire insurance companies was causing grave anxiety to the policy holders of California. At the time we pointed out to the policy holders that five weeks had elapsed since the fire; that during this period the insurance companies were arrayed in a solid phalanx against their policy holders; that their attitude had varied from evasion with the rich policy holders to veiled hostility with the poorer ones; that in our opinion the time had arrived for the insured to organize in order to place themselves at least on equal conditions with the insurance companies. We also suggested that inasmuch as Mr. Hearst through his newspapers was offering to furnish policy holders with blank forms and legal advice free of charge, we considered his procedure highly commendable, and urged on all such policy holders to avail themselves of it.

During the week just past marked changes have taken place. The small policy holders have availed themselves of Mr. Hearst's offer, and have been flocking in large numbers to the offices provided for their reception. Several thousand a day, we are told, have there been furnished with blank forms and legal advice.

Among the richer policy holders there has developed a disposition toward organization. The San Francisco Savings Banks represent many millions of insurance claims. Most of these are the aggregated claims of policy holders of small means. Although the policies stand in the names of the policy holders and are therefore theoretically individual claims, the policy holders are so helpless that they are more than willing to follow the advice of the banks. These claims may therefore be regarded as the consolidated or aggregated claims of the banks. The savings banks have determined to stick together, and have already taken quiet steps toward that end.

A number of policy holders in the downtown retail and wholesale districts have also taken alarm. They sent a committee to the insurance Underwriters, which was received courteously, but in the same disingenuous and evasive way. These downtown policy holders are now engaged in discussing the details of organization. At present they are merely bound together by that rope of sand known as an "association." If they desire to hold together firmly, as any earnest body of men must hold together in times of stress and strain, they will require a stronger bond than that which constitutes an "association."

Up to a few days ago the insurance men were apparently, firmly allied. They had "an Adjuster's Bureau of the Fire Underwriters," the executive body of which was known as the "Adjusting Committee." This allied and confederated group of companies was what the policy holders found themselves up against. Up to a few days ago the underwriters controlled the situation, and some men, among the richest and most influential in the community, have been approaching these Underwriters in the most suave and suppliant manner. Their reception, however, was not of a nature to soothe them, and now they are losing their temper. The Associated Underwriters were quick to observe this, and have made a sudden change of front. It seems that hitherto all of the companies have been allied in this compact, whether big or little, whether strong or weak. This grew naturally out of the reinsurance system followed by the fire Underwriters. San Francisco for insurance purposes is divided into sections. Every insurance company places a limit on the amount of risk it will carry in each section. When it is offered a risk which will carry its amount beyond the limit fixed, it immediately places the excess with other companies. Frequently it reinsures with some of the smaller companies, and here is where the trouble begins. Some of these smaller companies are in a very weak financial condition. Then again, their policies often read differently from those of the larger insurance companies. Some of the smaller companies are standing on quibbles and technicalities, which are rendered possible by the peculiar reading of their policies. The larger companies are more disposed to be liberal, but they fear entanglements with the smaller companies. For these reasons, and the further one that the large companies are bolstering up the smaller ones, the present deadlock has occurred.

Many of the larger companies possess adequate resources for the settlement of all fire claims against them. They know that it will be good policy for them to settle promptly and liberally. They know that an enormous increase in insurance always follows a great conflagration, and that the large increase in rates which they have already inaugurated will soon bring back to them all the money they may now pay out. Thus they have every reason, if they are honest and sound, to begin paying their losses at once. But up to the present they have been restrained in their action by the attitude and the embarrassments of the smaller companies. The larger companies now find that their credit and their good name have been impaired by this course. They have therefore practically determined to cut loose from the smaller companies. Within a day or two, if not by the time these lines are read, the strong and sound companies will have abandoned the weaker and smaller companies to their fate.

What is the condition of these smaller companies? It would be very difficult to tell. Probably the directors themselves could not tell with accuracy. As we said in these columns last week, the very queer proceedings in Chicago, at the time when the Traders reinsured its risks just before going into liquidation, showed that some thirty or forty companies were looked upon in insurance circles as doubtful. In reinsuring the Traders' business, these companies were all passed over. The persons concerned in the reinsurance, the officers of the various companies, the adjusters, the insurance brokers—all these are silent. They have not divulged the names of the unsound companies, and a sentiment of "insurance honor" will doubtless keep them silent until some or all of these companies fail.

In this dangerous and perplexing crisis it seems to us that the best remedy for all concerned is immediate organization by the San Francisco policy holders. It must be an incorporation. In no way can men be kept together in such times as these unless by the strong bond of pecuniary indemnity or pecuniary liability. If a large insurer belonging to an "association" is talking and working strongly against the non-paying insurance companies, and if he be a man of such influence as to be dangerous—say the proprietor of a great daily newspaper—the insurance companies can very easily "pull him down" by taking him aside and secretly paying his claims.

Such an incorporation need not be construed as hostile toward the insurance companies. On the other hand, its functions might be construed as protective. Suppose that such an incorporation, composed of a large majority of the policy holders of San Francisco, were confronting one hundred or more insurance companies, three-fourths of whom were sound; it would not be difficult for two powerful organizations, the insurers and the insured, to grant such terms to the weaker insurance companies as to enable them to pull through. They could be given abundant time to realize on their securities; they could be loaned money by the richer insurance companies (on good collateral) to meet their pressing obligations; if their cases were hopeless, their insurance business, franchises, licenses, and other valuable assets, could be absorbed by stronger companies, and they would pass out of existence without a swindle and scandal. As it is now, the California policy holders are getting angry and vindictive. If they remain in this frame of mind, the weak companies will be ruined. But so also will many of the policy holders. All of this may be saved by consolidation, organization, incorporation.

There are many other desirable features of organization and incorporation among the policy holders. The Underwriters are going to have great difficulty in getting the municipal authorities to extend the fire limits, to enforce strict building regulations, and to make absolutely vital laws concerning fire protection. From the attitude of some of the citizens of San Francisco it begins to look as if the authorities would fail. If the Underwriters were to have the support of an incorporation of policy holders, such as we speak of, they would stand a much better show to bring about the desired results by co-operation with the municipal authorities. If this be not done, the richer policy holders will be confronted with a grave situation. It is this: Within the fire limits and in the downtown district they will be forced to construct costly Class A buildings. Yet these buildings will be liable to destruction whenever our strong winds blow from outside the fire limits over adjacent districts covered with timber shacks, and there will be a repetition of the dreadful fire of some weeks ago.

There are many other points which could come up before such an organization of policy holders. They are all matters of detail, into which it would be superfluous to enter here. One, of course, is the obvious question of insurance rates and the high figure to which they are being raised; whether the Underwriters are justified in making insurers pay abnormal conflagration rates for merely average fire risks; whether policies should not be made uniform in their language in this State, as they are in New York and other States; whether open questions, such as damages from earthquake, fire, or dynamite, should not be settled; whether the phrase "Act of God" should not be made more precise; in short, the clearing up of the studied ambiguity of many of the insurance policies now in use.

Doubtless there are those who will say that such a corporation is not practicable, made up as it would be of many thousands of policy holders. But why not? The water company and the gas companies of San Francisco are made up of many thousands of stockholders; these furnish water and gas to other thousands of consumers, and to themselves as well. Why can not a stockholder in a corporation of insurance policy holders pay to furnish protection and expert advice to other thousands of his fellow policy holders as well as himself?

The Argonaut Without Advertisements.

Our readers may have observed that since the fire the Argonaut has not been printing advertising matter. The reason may seem quixotic, but to us is satisfactory. We were unable to print the Argonaut in its usual style, its usual size of type and page, and its usual number of pages. All the printing plants in San Francisco were destroyed, and, except the dailies' plants, there are few high-grade printing plants in operation outside of that city, which can turn out any large number of copies in good style. It has, therefore, been impossible for us even to attempt to resume our normal former condition. In fact, the only possible way to make an attempt to cover our list of readers was by the use of the plant of a daily paper. The San Jose Mercury has an admirable plant, which was most kindly placed at our disposal temporarily.

But until we could resume our normal shape we had determined to accept no advertising business. Last week, however, there came to hand the following letter:

"Editor Argonaut: Mr. A. M. Robertson desires me to inform you that, although his loss was total, yet one of his greatest griefs is that his advertisement failed to appear in the last numbers of your weekly. For eighteen years it was his boast that he had never missed an issue and now that record is broken. Kindly give us space in your next issue for the enclosed copy, continuing to do so until we change copy.

JAMES T. BLAKE, Mgr."

Although we knew that "Robertson's—Just a Book Store" had appeared in the Argonaut for many years, we did not know that it had appeared there for nearly a fifth of a century. Under the circumstances we had not the heart to refuse Mr. Robertson's request. Therefore there will again appear in the Argonaut an old landmark in the shape of an advertisement which doubtless many readers have missed. It used to appear in a corner of the Literary Page—when there was a Literary Page and when there was a corner, "Robertson's—Just a Book Store."

So it has been with us for nearly twenty years, has it? How the years fly by! Well, may the Lord love us.

And not call for us too soon.

Our Insurance Crisis and the Rest of the Country.

The holders of insurance policies in California must not overlook the fact that in the present juncture the rest of the country is lined up against them. The Fire Underwriters have determined to jump rates very materially, at least 25 per cent. Violent opposition to this has broken out in every commercial city east of the Sierra Nevada. Fire insurers there at once declared that the heavy losses claimed from insurance companies by California policy holders were largely due to earthquake instead of fire; that, therefore, if these claims were paid the Underwriters would indemnify themselves by raising the regular rates elsewhere; that thus the insurers throughout the rest of the country would be engaged in paying the earthquake losses of the California insurers. Therefore, they are vigorously opposing any disposition on the part of the Underwriters to pay any losses which are not strictly confined to fire. It goes without saying that the Underwriters are showing much alacrity in complying with the latter part of the request. We opine, however, that when it comes to leaving the insurance rates low, or lowering them if they are raised, that our Eastern friends will not find it so easy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Pleasant Letter From Admiral Goodrich.

We have received the following epistle enclosing a two-year advance subscription from Rear Admiral Goodrich, U. S. N.:

May 20, 1906.

Jerome A. Hart, Esq., Dear Sir:—My yearly subscription has run about half its course or thereabouts. Realizing that one man's necessity is another man's opportunity of showing appreciation, I beg to enclose check for the continuation of my indispensable Argonaut for two years after this term shall have expired. For the present send it to me at Portland, Oregon, and believe me with profound sympathy,

Yours faithfully,

C. F. GOODRICH.

Rear Admiral, U. S. N.

P. S. Lest the New York check should be subject to discount, I add what you would call "Two Bits."

It is said that there is compensation for all things, even for disasters. To his shame be it spoken, the Editor of the Argonaut rarely looked over its mailing lists, in fact he had not examined them for some years prior to the fire. He knew generally, of course, that its subscribers were of a high order. The letters pouring in from them since the fire have turned his attention so earnestly and incessantly to his subscribers that he is forced to admit that he did not know them; they stand even higher than he had supposed. The Argonaut has not been a very personal journal. There is so much of personality in the newspaper press of the day that it is distasteful to many of us. For this reason the personality of the Editor has been effaced to an extent in the Argonaut's editorial columns, and he is quite conscious of the fact that however friendly might have been, and doubtless were, the feelings existing between the Argonaut's readers and the journal itself, they were not intimate, so to speak. Yet so cordial and so kindly have been the letters from subscribers since the disaster, that the Editor feels almost as if he may take the liberty of calling these thousands of readers his personal friends. We have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with Admiral Goodrich, but we beg to assure him of our high appreciation of his praise of the Argonaut.

Diogenes Needs No Lantern at Eureka.

EUREKA, Nevada, May 20, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—In digging out an old pigeon hole I find that my subscription expired April 2d. Was very busy at time notice was received and am very sure I never remitted for renewal before the fire. So I now enclose you postal order for $4 to renew from that date. Please accept thanks for continuing to send the Argonaut without any interruption; also my most sincere sympathy for your misfortunes.

Yours very truly,

H. C. McTERNEY.

A Two-Year Subscription.

LOS ANGELES, May 22, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—With pleasure I mail you a draft on Wells, Fargo & Co. for $8, being a renewal subscription for two years to your invaluable contribution to California literature.

Yours truly,

J. D. HOOKER.

A Publisher's Encouraging Note.

Editor Argonaut:—I have been for a good many years a devoted reader of the Argonaut, and have therefore missed its weekly visits since the great disaster. I am told that you have issued two numbers since that event, and should like it if I could have copies, and if you would see that my name is continued on your list. I take this opportunity to express to you my deep sympathy with you in the overwhelming catastrophe, but I am very glad to know that you are reorganizing, and that you expect to be in shape again in the near future.

Very sincerely yours,

F. G. BROWNE,

Manager Publishing Department,
A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.

Better Luck for All of Us.

Union Savings Bank Bldg., Oakland, Cal., May 15, 1906.

Editors Argonaut: I will be obliged to you if you will continue to send the Argonaut to me at above address. My old address was 28 Second St., San Francisco. My subscription expires next fall, I think. Wishing you—and all of us!—"better luck" till the end of all things, I am

Yours very truly,

GEO. VINCENT.

Short, But Encouraging Notes.

Crockett, Calif., May 20, 1906. Can you let me have copies of your paper for April 21st and May 12th, as mine did not materialize, and I haven't missed a number for the past ten years.

HERBERT G. POWERS.

May 20. I shall be really obliged by your sending me all the issues since the fire, and by your continuing to send the Argonaut to me, care of Balfour, Guthrie & Co., San Francisco. Glad to hear that you expect to be at the old stand ere long. With best wishes,

Yours faithfully,

WM. BALNAVES.

Sacramento, Cal., May 22—I have been a subscriber to your most valuable and interesting paper these many years, perhaps a quarter of a century, and have had it sent to me in almost every part of the civilized world, when I have been traveling. Lately it has not reached me regularly, and the week's end does not seem quite right without it. I know you have been through great stress and trials this past month, so have made every allowance until this week. I find many of my old friends and neighbors have received theirs, and mine has failed to reach me. I have availed myself of my woman's privilege to scold the mail clerks and carriers, and they declare the fault does not lie with them, so I shall appeal to headquarters. So now, if you want to perform an act of charity to my family and restore their sweetness of temper, pray send your excellent weekly regularly to your subscriber and admirer.

MRS. G. L. SIMMONS.

Denver, Colo., May 21, 1906—Did The Argonaut issue a number on Saturday, April 18th (the week of the quake)? If so, kindly send me a copy. I have received all the copies issued since then.

MRS. M. K. CORBIN.

East Auburn, Cal., May 26, 1906—Enclosed please find postal order for eight dollars—subscription for two years.

W. S. DAVIS.

1210 Arch St., Philadelphia, May 18, 1906—I enclose check for my subscription to the Argonaut. I lived in San Francisco about twenty years ago, and it almost breaks my heart to think of the beautiful city being in ruins; I can scarcely believe that it is so. I trust you may soon get The Argonaut just as it used to be.

A. R. WRIGHT.

Lihive, Kanai, H. T., May 13, 1906—I cannot tell you how surprised and delighted I was when our first "coast mail" since the earthquake arrived here on this day week, to find that the first letter I opened was a copy of my old friend, The Argonaut, containing the sad news of the terrible catastrophe which had befallen your beautiful city, in black and white, confirming the conflicting cablegrams. It is really wonderful to me how you have all braced up to the occasion, and had the heart to start up business right away; but that is an example of your indomitable American pluck and grit. You have my deepest sympathy for the loss of all your property, and more especially your valuable library, which it will be impossible to replace; but I feel assured that your estimable paper will arise like the Phoenix out of her own ashes, better than ever, at any rate, as long as you continue at the helm. I have been a subscriber to "The Argonaut" now for six years, and having married the California girl who first introduced it to me, must say that I have never regretted either act, and both are absolutely indispensable to my personal welfare. Aloha Nui.

RICHARD J. WILKINSON, M. D.

Bouldin Island, Cal., May 19. Please forward my Argonaut to me here. I can't get along without the Argonaut. It's the best paper issued in the United States. It tells the truth. Best wishes for your future success.

R. HICKMOTT.

New York, May 16, 1906. I have long been a reader and admirer of the Argonaut. We were all delighted to hear that you are still in the ring, fire and earthquake notwithstanding, and we marveled at your pluck in not missing a single issue of the paper. With best wishes for your early recovery and success, very cordially,

LEONARD LIEBLING.

May 5. In case my address was lost in the calamity of 18th ulto., I beg to say that my address is Kilauea, Maui, H. I. I shall be glad to see your valued paper again.

J. R. MYERS.

Portland, Oregon, May 21, 1906. Only one copy of your valued publication, viz: May 5th, has been received since the San Francisco disaster, and as this is thoroughly worn out with re-reading, I will be greatly obliged if you will send me all the missing copies, as we need the paper in my family to make life complete. I trust you have the missing papers on hand. Sincere sympathy for your loss.

SAM B. STOY.

Binghamton, New York, May 5, 1906. I enclose N. Y. draft. I hope you will soon be "on your feet" again, and that your losses will be made good. You have my sympathy.

C. H. WEBSTER.

Los Angeles, Cal., May 22, 1906. I enclose a draft on Wells, Fargo Co. for $4 as a renewal of my subscription for another year.

W. YATES.

Martinez, Cal., May 19. I shall be delighted to get my weekly Argonaut again.

THOS. NEILSON.

Philadelphia, May 18, 1906. I enclose check for a year's subscription. I lived in San Francisco about 20 years ago, and it almost breaks my heart to think of the beautiful city being in ruins. I can scarcely believe that it is so. I trust you may soon get the Argonaut re-established.

A. R. WRIGHT.

Oakland, May 22, 1906. I enclose postal money order for a year's renewal. Methinks I would fail in my duty as a good citizen if I failed to read and support with my subscription the only journal, daily or weekly in the State that is worth the attention of a sane and thinking man.

JACK LONDON TELLS OF THE FIRE.

San Francisco's Burning—A Lurid Tower Visible from Afar—The Deserted Heart of San Francisco—The Flight Before the Flames.

The earthquake shook down in San Francisco hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of walls and chimneys. But the conflagration that followed burned up hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property. There is no estimating within hundreds of millions the actual damage wrought. Not in history has a modern imperial city been so completely destroyed. San Francisco is gone. Nothing remains of it but memories and a fringe of dwelling-houses on its outskirts. Its industrial section is wiped out. Its business section is wiped out. Its social and residential section is wiped out. The factories and warehouses, the great stores and newspaper buildings, the hotels and the palaces of the nabobs, are all gone. Remains only the fringe of dwelling-houses on the outskirts of what was once San Francisco.

Within an hour after the earthquake shock the smoke of San Francisco's burning was a lurid tower visible a hundred miles away. And for three days and nights this lurid tower swayed in the sky, reddening the sun, darkening the day, and filling the land with smoke.

On Wednesday morning at a quarter past five came the earthquake. A minute later the flames were leaping upward. In a dozen different quarters south of Market Street, in the working-class ghetto, and in the factories, fires started. There was no opposing the flames. There was no organization, no communication. All the cunning adjustments of a twentieth century city had been smashed by the earthquake. The streets were humped into ridges and depressions, and piled with the debris of fallen walls. The steel rails were twisted into perpendicular and horizontal angles. The telephone and telegraph systems were disrupted. And the great water-mains had burst. All the shrewd contrivances and safeguards of man had been thrown out of gear by thirty seconds' twitching of the earth-crust.

The Fire Made Its Own Draft.

By Wednesday afternoon, inside of twelve hours, half the heart of the city was gone. At that time I watched the vast conflagration from out on the bay. It was dead calm. Not a flicker of wind stirred. Yet from every side wind was pouring in upon the city. East, west, north and south, strong winds were blowing upon the doomed city. The heated air rising made an enormous suck. Thus did the fire itself build its own colossal chimney through the atmosphere. Day and night this dead calm continued, and yet, near to the flames, the wind was often half a gale, so mighty was the suck.

Wednesday night saw the destruction of the very heart of the city. Dynamite was lavishly used, and many of San Francisco's proudest structures were crumbled by man himself into ruins, but there was no withstanding the onrush of the flames. Time and again successful stands were made by the fire-fighters, but every time the flames flanked around on either side, or came up from the rear, and turned to defeat the hard-won victory.

An enumeration of the buildings destroyed would be a directory of San Francisco. An enumeration of the buildings undestroyed would be a line and several addresses. An enumeration of the deeds of heroism would stock a library and bankrupt the Carnegie medal fund. An enumeration of the dead—will never be made. All vestiges of them were destroyed by the flames. The number of the victims of the earthquake will never be known. South of Market Street, where the loss of life was particularly heavy, was the first to catch fire.

Remarkable as it may seem, Wednesday night, while the whole city crashed and roared into ruin, was a quiet night. There were no crowds. There was no shouting and yelling. There was no hysteria, no disorder. I passed Wednesday night in the path of the advancing flames, and in all those terrible hours I saw not one woman who wept, not one man who was excited, not one person who was in the slightest degree panic-stricken.

Before the flames, throughout the night, fled tens of thousands of homeless ones. Some were wrapped in blankets. Others carried bundles of bedding and dear household treasures. Sometimes a whole family was harnessed to a carriage or delivery wagon that was weighted down with their possessions. Baby buggies, toy wagons, and go-carts were used as trucks, while every other person was dragging a trunk. Yet everybody was gracious. The most perfect courtesy obtained. Never, in all San Francisco's history, were her people so kind and courteous as on this night of terror.

A Caravan of Trunks.

All night these tens of thousands fled before the flames. Many of them, the poor people from the labor ghetto, had fled all day as well. They had left their homes burdened with possessions. Now and again they lightened up, flinging out upon the street clothing and treasures they had dragged for miles.

They held on longest to their trunks, and over these trunks many a strong man broke his heart that night. The hills of San Francisco are steep, and up these hills, mile after mile, were the trunks dragged. Everywhere were trunks, with across them lying their exhausted owners, men and women. Before the march of the flames were flung picket lines of soldiers. And a block at a time, as the flames advanced, these pickets retreated. One of their tasks was to keep the trunk-pullers moving. The exhausted creatures, stirred on by the menace of bayonets, would arise and struggle up the steep pavements, pausing from weakness every five or ten feet.

Often, after surmounting a heart-breaking hill, they would find another wall of flame advancing upon them at right angles and be compelled to change anew the line of their retreat. In the end, completely played out, after toiling for a dozen hours like giants, thousands of them were compelled to abandon their trunks. Here the shopkeepers and soft members of the middle class were at a disadvantage. But the workmen dug holes in vacant lots and backyards and buried their trunks.

The Doomed City.

At nine o'clock Wednesday evening I walked down through the very heart of the city. I walked through miles and miles of magnificent buildings and towering skyscrapers. Here was no fire. All was in perfect order. The police patrolled the streets. Every building had its watchman at the door. And yet it was doomed, all of it. There was no water. The dynamite was giving out. And at right angles two different conflagrations were sweeping down upon it.

At one o'clock in the morning I walked down through the same section. Everything still stood intact. There was no fire. And yet there was a change. A rain of ashes was falling. The watchmen at the doors were gone. The police had been withdrawn. There were no firemen, no fire-engines, no men fighting with dynamite. The district had been absolutely abandoned. I stood at the corner of Kearny and Market, in the very innermost heart of San Francisco. Kearny Street was deserted. Half a dozen blocks away it was burning on both sides. The street was a wall of flame. And against this wall of flame, silhouetted sharply, were two United States cavalymen, sitting their horses, calmly watching. That was all. Not another person was in sight. In the intact heart of the city two troopers sat their horses and watched.

Surrender was complete. There was no water. The sewers had long since been pumped dry. There was no dynamite. Another fire had broken out further uptown, and now from three sides conflagrations were sweeping down. The fourth side had been burned earlier in the day. In that direction stood the tottering walls of the Examiner building, the burned-out Call building, the smoldering ruins of the Grand Hotel, and the gutted, devastated, dynamited Palace Hotel.

The following will illustrate the sweep of the flames and the inability of men to calculate their spread. At eight o'clock Wednesday evening I passed through Union Square. It was packed with refugees. Thousands of them had gone to bed on the grass. Government tents had been set up, supper was being cooked, and the refugees were lining up for free meals.

At half-past one in the morning three sides of Union Square were in flames. The fourth side, where stood the great St. Francis Hotel, was still holding out. An hour later, ignited from top and sides, the St. Francis was flaming heavenward. Union Square, heaped high with mountains of trunks, was deserted. Troops, refugees, and all had retreated.

A Fortune for a Horse.

It was at Union Square that I saw a man offering a thousand dollars for a team of horses. He was in charge of a truck piled high with trunks from some hotel. It had been hauled here into what was considered safety, and the horses had been taken out. The flames were on three sides of the Square, and there were no horses.

Also, at this time, standing beside the truck, I urged a man to seek safety in flight. He was all but hemmed in by several conflagrations. He was an old man and he was on crutches. Said he: "Today is my birthday. Last night I was worth thirty thousand dollars. I bought five bottles of wine, some delicate fish, and other things for my birthday dinner. I have had no dinner, and all I own are these crutches."

I convinced him of his danger and started him limping on his way. An hour later, from a distance, I saw the truck-load of trunks burning merrily in the middle of the street.

On Thursday morning, at a quarter past five, just twenty-four hours after the earthquake, I sat on the steps of a small residence on Nob Hill. With me sat Japanese, Italians, Chinese, and negroes—a bit of the cosmopolitan flotsam of the wreck of the city. All about were the palaces of the nabob pioneers of Forty-nine. To the east and south, at right angles, were advancing two mighty walls of flame.

I went inside with the owner of the house on the steps of which I sat. He was cool and cheerful and hospitable. "Yesterday morning," he said, "I was worth six hundred thousand dollars. This morning this house is all I have left. It will go in fifteen minutes." He pointed to a large cabinet. "That is my wife's collection of china. This rug upon which we stand is a present. It cost fifteen hundred dollars. Try that piano. Listen to its tone. There are few like it. There are no horses. The flames will be here in fifteen minutes."

Outside, the old Mark Hopkins residence, a palace, was just catching fire. The troops were falling back and driving the refugees before them. From every side came the roaring flames, the crashing walls, and the detonations of dynamite.

The Dawn of the Second Day.

I passed out of the house. Day was trying to dawn through the smoke-pall. A sickly light was creeping over the face of things. Once only the sun broke through the smoke-pall, blood-red, and showing a quarter its usual size. The smoke-pall itself, viewed from beneath, was a rose color that pulsed and fluttered with lavender shades. Then it turned to mauve and yellow and dun. There was no sun. And so dawned the second day on stricken San Francisco.

An hour later I was creeping past the shattered dome of the City Hall. Than it there was no better exhibit of the destructive force of the earthquake. Most of the stone had been shaken from the great dome, leaving standing the naked framework of steel. Market Street was piled high with the wreckage, and across the wreckage lay the overthrown pillars of the City Hall, shattered into crosswise sections.

This section of the city, with the exception of the Mint and the Postoffice, was already a waste of smoking ruins. Here and there through the smoke, creeping warily under the shadows of tottering walls, emerged occasional men and women. It was like the meeting of the handful of survivors after the day of the end of the world.

On Mission Street lay a dozen steers, in a neat row stretching, across the street, just as they had been struck down by the flying ruins of the earthquake. The fire had passed through afterward and roasted them. The human dead had been carried away before the fire came. At another place on Mission Street I saw a milk-wagon. A steel telegraph pole had smashed down sheer through the driver's seat and crushed the front wheels. The milk cans lay scattered around.

All day Thursday and all Thursday night, all day Friday and Friday night, the flames still raged.

Friday night saw the flames finally conquered, though not until Russian Hill and Telegraph Hill had been swept and three-quarters of a mile of wharves and docks had been licked up.

The Last Stand.

The great stand of the fire-fighters was made Thursday night on Van Ness avenue. Had they failed here, the comparatively few remaining houses of the city would have been swept. Here were the magnificent residences of the second generation of San Francisco nabobs, and these, in a solid zone, were dynamited down across the path of the fire.—Collier's.

Foreign Contributions to the Relief Fund.

We have received from the Finance Committee of the San Francisco Relief Fund the following statement concerning "Foreign Contributions":

SAN FRANCISCO, May 22, 1906.

The President, as most people are aware, discouraged foreign contributions. Subsequently, the Finance Committee received a letter from the Secretary of State's office saying that the Japanese Ambassador desired to know if contributions were made direct to the Finance Committee, whether they would be accepted. Annexed is a copy of same:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1st, 1906.

James D. Phelan,
Chairman General Relief Committee,
San Francisco, Cal.

Japanese government recently offered this government 200,000 yen for California sufferers which was declined upon the grounds that as similar contributions had been refused from other countries, no exception could be made in favor of Japan. Japan Embassy here now ask us to inquire if General Relief Committee at San Francisco will accept this sum, if proffered to them direct. Please telegraph reply.

ROBERT BACON,
Acting Secretary of State.

The Chairman of the San Francisco Finance Committee thereupon sent the following reply:

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., May 1, 1906.

To the Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

Responsive to your telegram this day we will gratefully accept the contribution of the Japanese government if tendered directly to this Committee. We have a hard problem to solve. We are aiding our large cosmopolitan population in every practicable manner without discrimination and will accept contributions from foreign sources for the benefit of the service in which we are engaged.

JAMES D. PHELAN,
Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Relief and Red Cross Funds.

On May 22 the Committee received a letter enclosing $98,750.00 (equivalent to 200,000 yen), from the Japanese Ambassador, as the gift of the Emperor of Japan. He states: "Inquiry made by this Embassy through the Department of State at Washington has elicited the fact that you are prepared to receive the said fund on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Relief and Red Cross Funds."

The Mayor, in answer to the Toronto Star concerning the Canadian contribution voted by the Canadian Parliament, sent a similar letter.

The Finance Committee desires to call attention to the fact that through the Secretary of State's office the decision of the President was evidently modified in order to enable San Francisco to accept foreign relief. The Committee regrets to say, however, that very little such relief contributions have been received, but possibly when the Finance Committee makes its final report, many contributions now in transit may be included.

"What's the matter dear, you look puzzled?" said Tess, meeting Jess on the avenue. "I'm sure I lost something just now," replied Jess, "but I can't think what it was." "Probably it wasn't anything very important—" "No, it wasn't; I remember now. It was that little Mr. Sniffkins who was walking with me."—Philadelphia Press.

"I want to know," said the irate matron, "how much money my husband drew out of this bank last week." "I can't give you that information, ma'am," answered the man in the cage. "You're the paying teller, aren't you?" "Yes, but I'm not the telling payer."—Chicago Tribune.

"Keeping boarders," observed the landlady, "soon makes a woman coldly practical." "Yes, I suppose so," rejoined the cynical bachelor, "but that's no reason why the soup and coffee she dispenses should be practically cold."—Chicago Daily News.

Another Lenten Sacrifice.—Golf Caddie (to curate)—"High tee, sir?" Curate—"No; put it on the ground. I give up sand during Lent."—Punch.

"Papa, what does it mean to 'Hitch your wagon to a star?'" "Radically and antipodally opposite to tying up with a chorus girl, my son."—Puck.

"Ah! wizout her I shall die, monsieur." "H'm! Starvation, I presume."—Judge.

THE CITY BEAUTIFUL.

Chester Bailey Fernald to the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco.

[Mr. Fernald, the writer of the following, is well known to the world as the author of "The Cat and the Cherub," and other works, as also of a play based on Chinese life in San Francisco which was very successful in London and elsewhere.—Editor Argonaut.]

The people want the city to be broad and beautiful. They elected you; they approve your action; they will support you. A handful of "business men," better described as owners of certain valuable property interests, will oppose you with money, with ridicule, with organized effort. But there are many men siding with you who never sided with you before.

I was not of those who automatically affiliated with the party that elected you. I do not believe in a political party which takes its name from a class, any more than I believe in political action by business men in the special interests of a few. In the political campaign some of you were charged with crimes punishable by imprisonment and abhorrent to honest men. You know how much of these charges were true; but I know how much of them your detractors were not able in the least to substantiate. They fired into your ranks with blank ammunition: noise and stench. I rejoiced at the sagacity of the people, who elected you. I have rejoiced at most of your acts ever since; and not alone.

The world knows that the natural beauty of the site of San Francisco is unsurpassed. The world knows that the municipal works of man upon that site have been for the most part hideous. There is but one street in the city that starts from anywhere and arrives anywhere with dignity and distinction. Fifty years ago the gridironing of the contours of these hills with ugly rectangles which sought to suppress their natural charm and sightliness and succeeded in making them of the greatest possible difficulty in use was a crime of provincial ignorance. In the old world cities have been built on hills from time immemorial; and in all the millions that have been spent in the last fifty years towards the modernizing and beautifying of European cities not a penny has gone towards changing to follow the crass example of San Francisco. A straight line is not always the most desirable route between two points; but it is always the shortest distance between two fools. The beautiful and the practical are not inherently opposed. To define civilization is to say that it exists to unify them. It is not enough for enlightened progress that a thing should be either beautiful or practical: it must be both.

I own no property in San Francisco. I shall not be called upon to pay a cent directly for these improvements. Let anyone prove from those facts, if he can, that San Francisco should be left in the ugliness which these "business men," in the acquisition of some valuable property in the city, never found time or inclination or cohesion enough to remedy. Let him also see what he can prove from the fact that I am nevertheless as free as these richer men are and have been to educate my children abroad and to spend my leisure and my surplus in other parts of the world: parts where men have been stirred by a deeper desire for civic beauty, for trees and green open spaces, for great architecture and great streets and inspiring vistas, and by the sense of being civilly among the most advanced of peoples.

This is the ancient story of individuals against a city. San Francisco cannot educate its children abroad. It cannot cross the continent in a private car and spend in Paris the surplus rentals of its property. It cannot die. It will live when these "business men" are dead and their property scattered and their names forgotten. It has been apparent from the start that these naive gentlemen fear that the value of their property will be lessened by the enlargement of the business section of the city in a direction beyond their control. They fear that the past congested centers will be relieved and that other centers will spring up. Who are these individuals that they should oppose their inconsiderable bulk and their comparatively small possessions to the united welfare and possessions of a hundred thousand other people who own property in San Francisco? Shall the commercial nuclei be determined by natural conditions or by artificial ones maintained to enrich a few? These gentlemen show willingness to sacrifice the common advancement to their private concern. Let the people deal more justly as to them. We do not look to the press for enlightened leadership. The votes which placed you in office demonstrated that, if demonstration was needed. The leadership lies with His Honor the Mayor and your honorable selves. You cannot lead long unless you lead forwards.

There never was a great municipal movement which did not have to overcome the private interests of a few. There never was an undertaking for the good of a people that did not ask them to look beyond one balance day and one indefinite generation of men. There never was anything so practical, so certain of rich reward both in the abstract and in the concrete, as to contract indebtedness and condemn property in order to make San Francisco approach the measure of her natural advantages: to make her beloved by her citizens with that warmth of patriotism that lies behind all civic achievement. There has been much shouting. The world awaits with some interest to see whether we are an entity here, or merely a noise.

It matters less who I am than whether I am right; but I am, sirs, with admiration for the stand you have so far taken in this matter,

Respectfully yours,

CHESTER BAILEY FERNALD.

The Society Leaders—Lines of Social Cleavage—The Only Seal-skin Sacque in Town—The Tramp Printer—His Social Climb—His Wedding.

The sketches of William Allen White, editor of the Emporia Gazette, in which the author graphically depicts the daily life in a modern Kansas town, have recently appeared in book form under the title "In Our Town." The volume is published by McClure, Phillips & Co. Its cover design portrays a busy country editor with a glimpse of the town's business section obtained through the window of the editor's sanctum. The book contains a number of illustrations by F. R. Gruger. Among the sketches contained in the book are: "And Yet a Fool," the Story of a Good Fellow;" "A Kansas 'Childe Roland,'" "A Bundle of Myths," "The Bolton Girls' 'Position,'" "The Passing of Priscilla Winthrop," "The Tremolo Stop," etc., etc.

In "The Passing of Priscilla Winthrop" Mr White portrays the social cleavage in the town, and the struggle between Mrs. Mortimer Conklin and Mrs. Worthington for the "first place" in society. To the sisterhood of the "howling swells" Mrs. Conklin is intimately known as "Priscilla Winthrop"—her maiden name. Priscilla was the only child of a wealthy territorial judge, afterward member of the State Senate; she inherited his fortune of half a million dollars upon his death in the 70s. The author describes the early life of Priscilla—now a grandmother—thus:

"She was the first girl in our town to go away to school. Naturally, she went to Oberlin, famous in those days for admitting colored students. But she finished her education at Vassar, and came back so much of a young lady that the town could hardly contain her. She married Mortimer Conklin, took him to the Centennial on a wedding trip, came home, rebuilt her father's house, covering it with towers and minarets and steeples, and scroll-saw fretwork, and christening it Winthrop Hall. She erected a store building on Main Street, that Mortimer might have a luxurious office on the second floor, and then settled down to the serious business of life, which was building up a titled aristocracy in a Kansas town.

"The Conklin children were never sent to the public schools, but had a governess, and Mortimer Conklin, who was always alert for the call, could not understand why the people never summoned him to any office of honor or trust. But he kept his brass sign-board polished and went to his office punctually every morning at ten o'clock, and returned home to dinner at five, and made clients wait ten minutes in the outer office before they could see him—at least so both of them say, and there were no others in all the years. But he shaved every day, wore a frock coat and a high hat to church—where for ten years he was the only male member of the Episcopalian flock—and altogether Mrs. Conklin told the women he was a credit to his sex and his family—a remark which was passed about ribaldly in town for a dozen years, though Mortimer Conklin never knew that he was the subject of a town joke. Once he rebuked a man in the barber shop for speaking of feminine extravagance, and told the shop that he never stinted his wife, that when she asked him for money he always gave it to her without question, and that if she wanted a dress he told her to buy it and send the bill to him. And we are such a polite people that no one in the crowded shop laughed—until Mortimer Conklin went out."

From Boston Priscilla Winthrop brought home the first seal-skin sacque worn in the town. She gave a party for it, "and it lay in its box on the big walnut bureau in the spare room of the Conklin mansion in solemn state, while seventy-five women salaamed to it. After that Priscilla Winthrop was the town authority on sealskins." The introduction of rugs in place of carpets nearly causes a revolt in the little town, and only when Priscilla Winthrop assures the residents "that in all the best homes in Boston rugs were replacing carpets," their souls were at peace.

All this was news to us. However, through Colonel Morrison we had received many years ago another sidelight on the social status of the Conklins. It came out this way: Time-honored custom in our town allows the children of a home whereat there is an outbreak of social revelry, whether a church festival or a meeting of the Cold-Nosed Whist Club, to line up with the neighbor children like human vultures on the back stoop or in the kitchen, waiting to lick the ice-cream freezer and to devour the bits of cake and chicken-salad that are left over. Colonel Morrison told us that no child was ever known to adorn the back yard of the Conklin home while a social cataclysm was going on, but that when Mrs. Morrison entertained the Ladies' Literary League, children from the holy Conklin family went home from his back porch with their faces smeared with chicken croquettes, and their hands sticky with jelly-cake!

This story never gained general circulation in town, but even if it had been known to all men it would not have shaken the faith of the devotees. For they did not smile when Priscilla Winthrop began to refer to old Frank Hagan, who came to milk the Conklin cow and curry the Conklin horse, as "Francois, the man," and to call the girl who did the cooking and general housework "Cosette, the maid," though every one of the dozen other women in town whom "Cosette, the maid" had worked for knew that her name was Fanny Ropes. And shortly after that the homes of the rich and the great over on the Hill above Main Street began to fill with Lisettes and Nanons and Fanchons, and Mrs. Julia Neal Worthington called her girl "Grisette," explaining that they had always had a Grisette about the house since her mother first went to housekeeping in Peoria, Illinois, and it sounded so natural to hear the name that they always gave it to a new servant. This story came to the office through the Young Prince, who chuckled over it during the whole hour he consumed in writing Ezra Worthington's obituary.

After the death of Ezra Worthington—a miser—his widow, who became heiress to $350,000, built a mansion which became known as Worthington Palace and gradually—although it took three years after Ezra Worthington's death—"the glow of the Worthington sun began to be seen in the Winthrop mosque."

Mrs. Worthington gives a reception to the delegates of the State Federation in the Worthington Palace. Mrs. Conklin returns from Massachusetts with half a carload of old furniture and gives a talk on "Heppelwhite in New England;" later on gives a luncheon to Jefferson which is styled a success by the defenders of Priscilla Winthrop. But Mrs. Worthington returns from Europe and gives a colored lantern-slide lecture on "An Evening with the Old Masters," when just in the nick of time Mrs. Conklin goes to Kansas City and is operated on for appendicitis. She comes back very pale and interesting, and reads before her club a paper called "Hospital Days," fragrant with iodoform and Henley's poems. Thus the combat between the two rivals waxes stronger from day to day, until Mrs. Worthington, who has secured the promise of Mrs. Ellen Vail Montgomery, vice-president of the National Federation, to visit Cliff Crest, as Mrs. Worthington calls the Worthington mansion, finally invites Priscilla Winthrop and her club to the luncheon given in honor of Mrs. Montgomery—the star feature of the week's gaiety. And now the crisis had come:

"When the meal was over it was Mrs. Ellen Vail Montgomery, in her thousand-dollar gown, worshiped by the eyes of forty-eight women, who put her arm about Priscilla Winthrop and led her into the conservatory, where they had 'a dear, sweet quarter of an hour,' as Mrs. Montgomery afterward told her hostess. In that dear, sweet quarter of an hour Priscilla Winthrop Conklin unbuckled her social sword and handed it to the conqueror, in that she agreed absolutely with Mrs. Montgomery that Mrs. Worthington was 'perfectly lovely,' that she was 'delighted to be of any service' to Mrs. Worthington; that Mrs. Conklin was sure no one else in our town was so admirably qualified for 'National Vice' as Mrs. Worthington, and that 'it would be such a privilege' for Mrs. Conklin to suggest Mrs. Worthington's name for the office. And then Mrs. Montgomery, 'National Vice, and former State Secretary for Vermont of the Colonial Dames, kissed Priscilla Winthrop, and they came forth wet-eyed and radiant, holding each other's hands. And when the company had been hushed by the magic of a State Vice and two District Virtues, Priscilla Winthrop rose and in the sweetest Kansas Bostonese told the ladies that she thought this an eminently fitting place to let the visiting ladies know how dearly our towns-woman, Mrs. Julia Neal Worthington, and that entirely without her solicitation—indeed quite without her knowledge—the women of our town—and she hoped of our beloved State—were ready now to announce that they were unanimous in their wish that Mrs. Worthington should be National Vice-President of the Federation of Women's Clubs, and that she, the speaker, had entered the contest with her whole soul to bring this end to pass. Then followed hand-clapping and handkerchief-waving and—some tears, and a little good, honest Irish hugging.

"There was the usual clatter of home-going wagons; lights winked out of kitchen windows; the tinkle of distant cowbells was in the air; on Main Street the commerce of the town was gently ebbing, and man and Nature seemed utterly oblivious of the great event that had happened. The course of human events was not changed; the great world rolled on, while Priscilla Winthrop went home to a broken shrine to sit among the potsherds."

"The Tremolo Stop" is an interesting story, showing the reform of a "tramp printer," who gets a position with a daily paper and gradually proves himself to be quite a genius, who can not only handle type and the composing stick, but is a good writer as well, so that he is soon promoted to the editorial room. His name is Simon Mehronay.

He came to the office one bright April day with red mud on his shoes that was not the mud of our river-bottoms, and we knew he had ridden to town "blind baggage"—as they say of men who steal their way—from the South. The season was ripe for the birds to come North and it was the mud of Texas that clung to him. His greeting as he strode through the front room, not waiting for a reply, was "How's work?" And when the foreman told him to hang up his coat he found a stick, got a "chunk of copy," and was clicking away at his case three minutes from the time he darkened the threshold of the office.

There he sat for two weeks—the first man down in the morning and the last to quit at night—before any one knew whence he came or whither he was bound. He had a little "false motion," the foreman said, and clattered his types too audibly in the steel stick, but as he got up a good string of type at the end of the day and furnished his own chewing tobacco, he created no unfavorable comment in the office. He was a little man, with a fringe of hair above the greasy velvet collar of his coat, with beady, dancing black eyes, and a moustache that often needed dyeing. It was the opinion of the foreman and the printers that Mehronay's weakness was liquor, though that opinion did not arise from anything he said.

The newspaper on which Mehronay was employed gained in circulation owing to his original items:

He wrote locals and editorials and helped with the advertising, drawing for this the munificent salary of fifteen dollars a week, which should have kept him like a prince; but it did not—though what he did with his money no one knew. For he bought no new clothes, and never buttoned those he had. Before sending him out on the street in the morning some one in the office had to button him up, and if it was a gala day—say circus day, or the day of a big political powwow—we had to put a clean paper collar on Mehronay above his brown wool shirt and shove out the dents in his derby hat—a procedure which he called “making a butterfly of fashion out of an honest workin’-man.” He slept in the press-room, on a bed which he rolled up and stowed behind the press by day, and of evenings he consorted with the goddess of nicotine—as he called his plug tobacco—and put in his time at his desk with his lead pencil and his pad of white paper writing copy for the next day’s issue.

His triumph in town in consequence of an article he had written pertaining to a wedding is followed by his absence from the office for three days, during which time he inbibes quite freely, and “by day slept the sleep of the unjust in the loft of Huddleson’s stable.” On the morning of the fourth day he is back at work again—in the composing room, and it takes a month to coax him back into the front room.

“His self-respect grew slowly, but finally it returned, and he sat at his desk turning off reams of copy, which was so good that the people read the paper up one side and down the other hunting for his items.”

The “tramp printer” writes an epistle on temperance to his son, of which this is an example:

“It’s rather up to you, Bub. In the next few months you will have to decide whether you are going to hell or not. Of course, the ‘vilest sinner may return’ at any point along the road—but to what? To shattered health; to a motner heart-broken in her grave; to a wife damned to all eternity by your thoughtless brutality, and to children who are always afraid to look up the alley, when they see a group of boys, for fear they may be teasing you—you, drunk and dirty, lying in the stable filth! To that you will ‘return,’ with your strength spent, and your sportive friends, gone to the devil before you, and your chance in life frittered away.”

Three months later Mehronay attends a revival meeting, after first having ridiculed it. For Easter he writes an Easter sermon, but the following summer Mehronay’s companions notice that he is singing fewer gospel hymns and more sentimental songs than usual, and finally in the fall his intrigue is uncovered when he asks for two show tickets—the first time in his three years’ employment on the paper. Mehronay goes to the opera that night with Miss Columbia Merley—a spinster and teacher of Greek and Hellenic philosophy at the college—to see Madame Janauschek play Macbeth.

After three years of probation, Mehronay finally gets married.

After his wedding we made brave, in a sly way, to rail at Mehronay about his love affair, and he took it good-naturedly. He knew the situation just as it was; his sense of humor allowed him no false view of the matter. One afternoon, when the paper was out, George Kerwin, the foreman, and one of the reporters and Mehronay were in the back room leaning against the imposing-stones looking over the paper, when Kirwin said: “Say, Mehronay, how did you get yourself to ask her?”

It was asked in a joke. The two young men were grinning, but Mehronay looked at the floor in a study as he said: “Well to be honest—hanged if I ever did—just exactly.” He smiled reflectively in a pause and continued: “Nearest I remember was one night we was sitting with our feet on the base-burner and I looked up and says: ‘Commie’—I called her that for short—‘why in the devil don’t a fine woman like you get married?’ And she got up and come over to where I was a-sitting, and before I could say ‘Get away’ she put her hand on my shoulder and says real soft and solemn: ‘I’ll just be damned if I don’t believe I will.’”

He did not smile when he looked up, but sighed contentedly as he added reverently: “And so, by thunder, she did!”

One year after his wedding Mehronay left the employ of the paper, because Mrs. Mehronay, knowing his worth, asked for twenty-five dollars a week for him, which the office could not afford. They moved to New York, where they “have lived happily ever after, for Mehronay has never broken his word” and has always remained sober.

“Don’t you think,” asked Mrs. Oldcastle, “that the new minister was somewhat recondite last Sunday?” “I didn’t know what it was at the time,” replied her hostess as she toyed with her diamond-studded fan, “but I do remember that his face looked kind of red and his eyes was sort of glassy. Still, we oughtn’t to be too hard on the poor man. He might of taken it for the ‘la grippe.’”—Chicago Record-Herald.

Automobilist—“Is there a good place to eat here?” Austere Citizen—“No, sir; I don’t know of any place that really could be called edible, but if you are looking for one where you can obtain what is designated technically as a square meal, you will find it two doors north of the postoffice, and in the next block.”—Chicago Tribune.

Mrs. Youngwed—“The other day you declared I talked almost continuously.” Youngwed—“Yes, so I did.” Mrs. Youngwed—“And last night you told the friend you brought home to dinner that I seldom said anything. Now, which statement is correct?” Youngwed—“Both.”—Chicago Daily News.

“Do you think it would be well for a young man who is ambitious to rise in politics to study law?” asked the earnest youth. “No,” answered Senator Sorghum. “If I were a young man and wanted to get a lofty official position, I’d learn to be a stenographer.”

OLD FAVORITES.

On the Rio Grande.

We chased the wild guerrillas
Through chaparral and glade,
And they fell beneath the sabres
Of the fearless Tenth Brigade;
Then faint with wounds and parched with thirst,
We pitched our tents that day,
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

Up spoke our gallant leader,
Astride his fretful roan,
“Sleep ye who can, my comrades,
I’ll watch the camp alone;
A restless spirit in my brain
Keeps sleep and rest at bay.”
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

All in the misty moonlight
I saw him come and go,
With his long Kentucky rifle
Across his saddle-bow;
And he hummed a tender love-tune,
A ballad blithe as May.
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

The dew was on the flowers,
The air was full of June,
And the rover on the shallows
Made music to the moon,
While around our still encampment prowled
Wild beasts in search of prey.
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

A rustle in the coppice!
A shadow on the grass!
Is that a friend, O sentinel,
That you should let him pass?
Then the sharp, quick crack of a rifle broke
On the air, and died away.
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

The drummer beat reveille,
The startled war-horse neighed,
And our leader, reeling in his seat,
Tugged at his trusty blade,
Rose in his stirrups once, and then—
We heard the bugles play.
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

And Leavenworth was dying,
His head upon my knee;
“Take these,” he faintly said, “to one
Who long will wait for me.
And tell her—” ’twas a tress of hair
And a three-year-old bouquet.
And it was on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

We wrapped him in our colors—
The red, and white, and blue—
Oh we wrapped him in our colors,
That tender soul and true!
And more than one bronzed hero wept
Like a little child that day,
As we buried him on the sandy
Banks of the Rio Grande
Where we lay.

Tantalus—Texas.

“If I may trust your love,” she cried,
“And you would have me as a bride,
Ride over yonder plain, and bring
Your flask full from the Mustang Spring;
Fly, fast as western eagle’s wing,
O’er the Llano Estacado!”

He heard, and loved without a word,
His gallant steed he lightly spurred;
He turned his face, and rode away
Toward the grave of dying day,
And vanished with its parting ray
On the Llano Estacado.

Night came, and found him riding on,
Day came, and still he rode alone.
He spared not spur, he drew not rein,
Across that broad, unchanging plain,
Till he the Mustang Spring might gain,
On the Llano Estacado.

A little rest, a little draught,
Hot from his hand, and quickly quaffed,
His flask was filled, and then he turned.

Once more the sky above him burned
On the Llano Estacado.

How hot the quivering landscape glowed!
His brain seemed boiling as he rode—
Was it a dream, a drunken one,
Or was he really riding on?
Was that a skull that gleamed and shone
On the Llano Estacado?

"Brave steed of mine, brave steed!" he cried,
"So often true, so often tried,
Bear up a little longer yet!"
His mouth was black with blood and sweat—
Heaven! how he longed his lips to wet!
On the Llano Estacado.

'And still, within his breast, he held
The precious flask so lately filled.
Oh, for a drink! But well he knew
If empty it should meet her view
Her scorn— But still his longing grew
On the Llano Estacado.

His horse went down. He wandered on,
Giddy, blind, beaten, and alone,
While upon cushioned couch you lie,
Oh, think how hard it is to die,
Beneath the cruel, unclouded sky,
On the Llano Estacado.

'At last he staggered, stumbled, fell,
His day was done, he knew full well.
And raising to his lips the flask,
The end, the object of his task,
Drank to her—more she could not ask.
Ah! the Llano Estacado!

That night in the Presidio,
Beneath the torchlights' wavy glow,
She danced—and never thought of him,
The victim of a woman's whim,
Lying, with face upturned and grim,
On the Llano Estacado.

Lasca.

I want free life, and I want fresh air;
And I sigh for the canter after the cattle,
The crack of the whips like shots in a battle,
The melody of horns, and hoofs, and heads
That wars, and wrangles, and scatters, and spreads;
The green beneath and the blue above,
And dash and danger, and life and love.
And Lasca!

Lasca used to ride
On a mouse-gray mustang close to my side,
With blue serape and bright-belled spur;
I laughed with joy as I looked at her!
Little knew she of books or creeds;
And Ave Maria sufficed her needs;
Little she cared save to be by my side,
To ride with me, and ever to ride,
From San Saba's shore to Lavaca's tide.
She was as bold as the billows that beat,
She was as wild as the breezes that blow;
From her little head to her little feet
She was swayed in her suppleness to and fro
By each gust of passion; a sapling pine,
That grows on the edge of a Kansas bluff,
And wars with the wind when the weather is rough,
Is like this Lasca, this love of mine.
She would hunger that I might eat,
Would rake the bitter, and leave me the sweet;
But once, when I made her jealous for fun,
At something I'd whispered, or looked or done,
One Sunday, in San Antonio,
To a glorious girl on the Alamo,
She drew from her garter a dear little dagger,
And—sting of a wasp!—it made me stagger!
An inch to the left, or an inch to the right,
And I shouldn't be maundering here tonight;
But she sobbed, and, sobbing, so swiftly bound
Her torn reboso about the wound,
That I quite forgave her. Scratches don't count
In Texas, down by the Rio Grande.

Her eye was brown—a deep, deep brown;
Her hair was darker than her eye;
And something in her smile and frown,
Curled crimson lip and instep high,
Showed that there ran in each blue vein,
Mixed with the milder Aztec strain,
The vigorous vintage of Old Spain.
She was alive in every limb
With feeling, to the finger-tips;
And when the sun is like a fire,
And sky one shining, soft sapphire,
One does not drink in little sips.

* * * * *
The air was heavy, the night was hot,
I sat by her side, and forgot—forgot;
Forgot the herd that were taking their rest,
Forgot that the air was close oppress.
That the Texas north comes sudden and soon,
In the dead of night or the blaze of noon;
That, once let the herd at its breath take fright,
Nothing on earth can stop the flight;

And woe to the rider, and woe to the steed,
Who fall in front of their mad stampede!

* * * * *
Was that thunder? I grasped the cord
Of my swift mustang without a word.
I sprang to the saddle, and she clung behind.
Away! on a hot chase down the wind!
But never was fox-hunt half so hard,
And never was steed so little spared,
For we rode for our lives. You shall hear how we fared
In Texas, down by the Rio Grande.

The mustang flew, and we urged him on;
There was one chance left, and you have but one—
Halt, jump on the ground, and shoot your horse;
Crouch under his carcass, and take your chance;
And if the steers in their frantic course
Don't batter you both to pieces 'at once,
You may thank your star; if not, good-bye
To the quickening kiss and the long-drawn sigh,
And the open air, and the open sky,
In Texas, down by the Rio Grande.

The cattle gained on us, and just as I felt
For my six-shooter, behind in my belt,
Down came the mustang, and down came we,
Clinging together, and—what was the rest?
A body that spread itself on my breast,
Two arms that shielded my dizzy head,
Two lips that hard on my lips were prest;
Then came thunder in my ears,
As over us surged the sea of steers,
Blows that beat blood into my eyes,
And when I could rise—
Lasca was dead.

* * * * *
I gouged out a grave a few feet deep,
And there, in Earth's arms, I laid her to sleep;
And there she is lying, and no one knows;
And the summer shines, and the winter snows;
For many a day the flowers have spread
A pall of petals over her head;
And the little gray hawk hangs aloft in the air,
And the sly coyote trots here and there,
And the black snake glides, and glitters and slides
Into a rift in a cottonwood-tree;
And the buzzard sails on,
And comes and is gone,
Stately and still, like a ship at sea.
And I wonder why I do not care
For the things that are, like the things that were.
Does half my heart lie buried there,
In Texas, down by the Rio Grande?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Several prominent couples have recently celebrated their silver weddings. Among those who celebrated were Ambassador and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, Dr. and Mrs. W. Seward Webb, Mr. and Mrs. Grenville Kane, Mr. and Mrs. William Kent and Mr. and Mrs. Ogden Mills.

There was apparently no decline in Mr. Roosevelt's popularity in the Indiana Republican convention last week. Senator Beveridge keeps in close touch with popular feeling, and he rose to say in his convention address that God Almighty raised up for great crises Oliver Cromwell, George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt. The hall "rang" with "applause."

Washington is already speculating on the probable fate of ex-Senator Chandler as a Federal officeholder. He is president of the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, and if he does not resign very soon some executive measure will be taken to separate him from his salary and position. It is assumed that Mr. Roosevelt, however great his anger against Mr. Chandler, will not do anything so crude and obvious as to request his resignation. It is intimated that another method will be taken, and the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission dissolved. Under the law creating the Commission it was to continue for two years, and then to be renewed for periods of six months by executive order. The latest order extended the life of the Commission to September 1. It is now said that when that time comes no new order will be issued.

E. H. Harriman sent his $100,000 automobile to a repair shop in New York City in January and when he got a bill for $1797 refused to pay it. The owner of the repair shop refused to surrender the vehicle and Mr. Harriman proceeded to recover it by writ of replevin. The men who are trying to collect this large sum will now have to sue for their money. Good for Harriman.

Charles H. Graves, American Minister to both Sweden and Norway, has been selected to represent the President as a special envoy at the coronation of King Haakon of Norway, at Christiania, June 28. It was the intention to have this charge placed in the hands of H. H. D. Peirce, the Third Assistant Secretary of State, in the expectation that he would be confirmed by the Senate as Minister to Norway in season to attend the coronation ceremonies. In fact the matter had gone so far that passage had been taken for Mr. Peirce on a steamer next week. But Mr. Peirce has got into the thirteen hole in the Senate, and that body has not yet confirmed Hence the henceness.

A passenger in a train in Norway, who had heard an American traveler angrily railing at the conductor because he was obliged to take an upper berth in a second-class compartment, although he had paid for a first-class berth, proffered an exchange of berths. In the morning the traveler learned that the man who had offered his berth was Prince Bernadotte, second son of the King of Sweden and president of the Y. M. C. A.

"Victor Hugo and Juliette Drouet," by H. W. Wack (Putnam's) purports to contain "the letters" of this amorous couple. But the book contains only a part of their letters, not very important ones at that. These letters were picked up by Wack at a shop in the Isle of Jersey, where they were left by accident; the vast mass of the letters are nearly all in the hands of P. Meurice, Hugo's literary executor, and this author did not have access to them. The book looks like the work of a rich man who wants to make a book regardless of expense. He does not say: "I have a book in me—I shall write it." He says: "I ought to write a book."

The book entitled "Paul Jones, Founder of the American Navy," by Aug. C. Buell (Scribner's), is an excellent life of Commodore Jones. It somewhat idealizes and glorifies Jones, or rather it omits and minimizes the less creditable events in his life. For example, his preposterous letter to the Countess of Selkirk is omitted. Still, a very good biography. It is painstakingly documented; the author seems to have gone to original sources in every case. Where other biographers repeat the errors of the earlier Jones historians, he often corrects their errors by dint of original research. This biography makes out Jones to be a most remarkable character. Son of Scotch peasants, he goes to sea at twelve, learns navigation, studies French and Spanish; becomes mate, captain, part owner; makes money as a slaver; inherits the estate of his brother in Virginia, which brother is a bachelor planter who had been adopted; leaves the sea; becomes a Virginia planter; in 1776 joins the patriots. He practically founded the American navy. An up-hill career against jealousies and cabals. He gets a ship; wins a couple of sensational victories; then practically spends nearly all the rest of his life ashore, most of it in France. He spent a year in the Russian navy, where he could do nothing on account of jealousy. He died at 45, prematurely old and worn out.

"Commodore Paul Jones," by Cyrus Townsend Brady (Appleton's) compared with Buell's biography is far inferior. There is not so much research, and a great deal more "fine writing" and "tall talk." The author quotes several pages from one of his own novels—in a biography!

"Roma Beata," by Maud Howe Eliot (Little, Brown & Co), is made up of records of the life of the artist, John Eliot, and his wife in Rome, from 1894 to about 1904. It is interesting and brightly written; it gives much information about the superstitions (jettatura, etc.) of the Italians. The book is principally about Rome, with one or two side trips to remote parts of Italy. They attended the Pope's receptions and the Queen comes to their studio. In fact it is the regular Roman business, but handled in an unusual way.

"The Jewel of Seven Stars," by Bram Stoker (Harper's), is a story of a jewel stolen from a mummy near Assouan, in Upper Egypt. Astral bodies, hypnotism, and all sorts of occult lore make up the story—something like Bulwer Lytton brought up to date with radium, the X-ray and liquefied oxygen, as agents. It seems odd that Stoker should use so old a clout for his Egyptian novel; it has been exploited by Gautier and others. The description of entering the tomb is very similar to that in Gautier's "Romance of a Mummy."

Libraries Damaged by Fire.

The California State Librarian has issued a pamphlet showing the damage done to libraries throughout the State by fire or earthquake in April. From points outside of San Francisco come the following statements of loss: Santa Rosa, $25,000; San Mateo, building badly damaged and condemned; Hayward, $1,750 damage to library building; Martinez, $1,400 damage to $7,000 building; Oakland, $3,000 damage to $80,000 building; Redwood City, building ruined, loss $5,000; Berkeley, $200 loss to building.

The University of California suffered the loss of 1,000 volumes, which were at a bindery in San Francisco, and about 250 volumes which were in the hands of officers and students.

The loss of library books and buildings in San Francisco is summarized as follows: The San Francisco Public Library lost three-fourths of the 160,000 volumes contained in the main building and its branches. The books were insured for $10,000. All buildings gone except two branch library buildings valued at $53,000. The destroyed buildings were valued at $25,000 and carried $15,000 insurance. The Astronomical Society of the Pacific lost over 1,400 volumes; B'nai B'rith library, destroyed, over 12,000 volumes; the Bohemian Club library, destroyed, about 5,000 volumes; California Academy of Sciences library, destroyed, over 12,000 volumes; Chamber of Commerce library, destroyed, over 2,000 volumes; Mechanics-Mercantile library, destroyed, 200,000 volumes, insurance on books $59,000, insurance on buildings $30,000; St. Ignatius College library, destroyed, over 50,000 volumes; San Francisco County Medical Society library, destroyed, over 1,600 volumes, insurance $1,500; San Francisco Reading-room and Library for the Blind, destroyed, 400 volumes, insurance $800; San Francisco Verein library, destroyed, over 4,400 volumes; State Normal School library, destroyed, 8,500 volumes.

Supreme Court Library, destroyed, over 17,000 volumes; Theosophical Library, destroyed, about 1,000 volumes; University Club Library, destroyed, over 2,500 volumes; Wells-Fargo library, destroyed, about 5,000 volumes, no insurance; Young Men's Christian Association, destroyed, over 2,500 volumes; San Francisco Law Library, destroyed, about 35,000 volumes; library of the Society of California Pioneers, destroyed; library in Crocker mansion, destroyed; Mills Law Library, destroyed, about 15,000 volumes; Sutro Library, consisting of 200,000 volumes, 125,000 volumes saved, rest destroyed; French Library, destroyed, over 25,000 volumes.

The principal libraries saved are the Bancroft Library of 60,000 volumes belonging to the State University, which has been moved to Berkeley; the Microscopical Society's Library of 2,500 volumes, moved to State University; Cooper Medical College Library of 7,400 volumes, and California State Mining Bureau Library of 5,000 volumes.

For the first time since the fire, George Hamlin Fitch appeared in the "Literary Page" of the San Francisco Chronicle on May 27. He speaks of the loss of his treasured books in a tone which is affectionate as it is pathetic:

"Many months seem to have passed since last I addressed the readers of this book page; yet it is scarcely more than four weeks since the great cataclysm which has left an indelible scar on the memories of thousands of San Franciscans. Looking back over these weeks—which in my case have been weeks of strenuous labor in the making of a big daily newspaper in the face of many handicaps—they seem like an ugly dream from which an awakening must soon come to the old life, so rich in all that made life worth living. In these weeks, for the first time in thirty years, I have had no leisure to read a single book, or even a single magazine. The few books reviewed on this page were all read before the fire. The material needs of existence, the material claims of daily work have shouldered clean out of my life the literary leisure that means more to the spiritual nature than one can actually conceive until he has been brought suddenly face to face with primitive conditions.

"Of those who were burned out of house and home in San Francisco by that terrible fire which followed the earthquake, fortunate were they who had to respond at once to the demands of profession or business. The hardest work, which leaves mind and body so tired that there is no energy for thought, no strength for regret, is the kindest; for in these weeks such exacting labor has served to dull the edge of grief over the loss of things that were invaluable. Three-quarters of those who were burned out had ample time to save their most valued possessions, had they been able to convince themselves that the fire would actually reach their homes; but most of those with whom I have talked were optimists, like myself, who were sanguine that the flames would be checked long before they climbed the steep hill above Chinatown. Even now it is difficult to convince oneself that the fire actually spread over this great area and that it ate up remorselessly so many pleasant homes, so many, many little treasures that were the work of a lifetime, the joy of leisure hours, the pride of the household.

"One woman of my acquaintance summed up the effect of the disaster on the two sexes when she said: 'All the men I have talked with mourned over the loss of their books. Pictures, art work, bric-a-brac, clothes they did not seem to care for; it was their libraries that were dearest to them. The women grieved mainly for the heirlooms that had come down to them; the family pictures, the family plate and china, and the hundreds of pretty things in silver and china and glassware that go to make the house beautiful.'

"That is a pretty good summary of the effect of loss on men and women. For myself, nothing would have mattered had I been able to save my books, or even a quarter of them. From my fourteenth year, book collecting has been my one absorbing hobby. Many a time in early youth have I passed by a book seller's window and looked longingly on a volume which I yearned to possess, but the price seemed beyond my means. Day by day the desire for possession grew until finally some material need was sacrificed and the cherished volume took its place on my shelves. Before my college days were ended I had a choice library of a thousand books—each volume of which represented the work of self-denial. Each also represented careful study and was enriched with many annotations. In the last twenty-five years every year has seen my library grow slowly but gradually. First editions, rare copies, freak books never appealed to me; but in my eyes the greatest treasures were finely printed and well-bound editions of the great English and American classics. These, with beautifully illustrated books on art and architecture, formed the bulk of my collection.

"Hundreds of these books were the gifts of authors; they were enriched with autograph inscriptions and in many cases letters from their authors, discussing my estimate of their work. Scores of these letters were from men who have laid down the pen and gone to 'the undiscovered country.' One beautiful letter I recall receiving from Maurice Thompson just a week before death closed his tired eyes in the sleep that knows no awakening; a letter which revealed perfectly the man's sensitive mind and his singularly sweet and lovable nature. Another was from Mrs. Custer in grateful response to a criticism of her first book—one of the earliest and most appreciative she had received. Still another was from the author of 'John Inglesant,' a shy, constrained letter but full of pleasure that his book had found an admirer so far beyond the bounds of literary England. And the author of 'The Virginian' sent a long and delightful letter in which he expressed his pleasure that the critic had noted the rare art of the lynching of Steve—that everything grim and ghastly took place out of the sight of the reader and only the shadow of the tragedy darkened the scene.

"Such intimate letters as these add to one's insight into the nature of authors, and they add immeasurably to the value of the books themselves. Yet these and hundreds like them have gone up in smoke. Walking over the site of my home a few days after the fire, I found several heaps of books that looked as though they had suffered little from the flames. I stooped to pick up a book that seemed to have escaped, but it crumbled to dust at my touch. Beneath my feet were the remains of thousands of books—mere dead ashes that no earthly power could restore. Then it came home to me, as never before, that these treasures were gone beyond recall; that the companions of years, whose pages I had sought when weary with work or depressed by grief, were lost to me forever. Dear beyond all expression, gathered with infinite labor, at the cost of many sacrifices, they vanished in a brief hour and left no trace but these ashes that mocked me by their semblance of reality.

"Yet out of this crushing loss one emerges with the courage to form a new collection, for life still remains, and courage and fortitude and the power of work. Until that power is gone there is always hope of restoring one's fortunes and of gathering again the books that delight the eye and make the heart young with their inspiring counsel and their words of faith and cheer."

Speaker Cannon's Daughter.

If Uncle Joe's charming daughter, Miss Helen, isn't turning her efforts toward the Presidency for her dear little parent, she'd better take in her sign. She bears every symptom of heading toward the White House. Until the last few months, the daughter of the autocrat of the House of Representatives has held herself rather aloof, evidently assuming the prerogative of the top liners in the great society caste who receive calls but return them only on pasteboard.

But all this season fair Helen has suddenly been turning over new leaves. She goes everywhere. The obscurest little tea of the obscurest little Congressman's wife is sure to find her there with her smiles, her avoirdupois and her affability. Every struggling hostess even upon the remotest outskirts of official life has been flattered all season by the unaccustomed presence at her small at homes of the Speaker's daughter. She is ubiquitous and urbane, this important offspring of an important sire, and the knowing have it that she is building up votes for papa.

Mrs. Fairbanks also, with a possible White House on her architectural horizon, solicitously adds on her visiting card, in her own or her secretary Miss Wade's handwriting, after the engraved "Mrs. Fairbanks," the words "regrets she is unable to call in person." No vice presidential or cabinetial spouse has ever been expected to call in person upon the masses, and the hoi polloi, so the added legend is unique and touching. It never hurts to be polite, as the old woman said when she bowed every time the name of the devil was mentioned.

Washington Helps San Francisco.

The San Francisco sufferers have been beneficiaries of Washington's generosity. Madame Hengelmuller, wife of the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador, celebrated as one of the best dressed women in America—she even buttons her clothes with diamonds—was the originator of a "food show" at Rauscher's for the benefit of the California sufferers, where all sorts of toothsome edibles were sold by all sorts of toothsome soliciteuses. Sweet Mistress Longworth was one, in summery array, who disposed of her goods in a summary manner; Miss Boardman of "Taft party" and Red Cross fame; the British Ambassador's graceful daughter, Miss Josephine Durand, and many other spectacular personages. Alice still holds her vogue as a best seller. She will figure remuneratively at the most brilliant and ambitious of all the humanitarian exhibits, a great May charity fair to be held upon the baronial estate, "Friendship," of John McLean, the most superb place in this part of the world. There are to be all sorts of open-air stunts, cavalry drills, dog shows, Japanese tea gardens, school children choruses—everything. The piece de resistance of the whole show is to be artistic Mrs. Barney's eighteenth century pastoral a la Versailles, with the procession of the seasons, the farandole and all sorts of Watteau-esque things that happen on French fans, a replica of the fetes of the days of Louis XVI.

Young Ned-McLean, the chief host of the affair, a handsome and attractive young chap, a great cross-country rider and all that sort of thing, used to be Alice Roosevelt's "steady." At least so the gossips said, and so all the signs headed. Even now a warm friendship exists between the two young people, and Mrs. Longworth more than once since her marriage, together with her husband, has been a luncheon guest of young Ned McLean at Friendship, where the first two days of her honeymoon were spent. Mr. and Mrs. Longworth seem to have peculiarly congenial tastes. They are both baseball enthusiasts, attending almost every big game that's pulled off in Washington.

The Pope's Democracy.

Stories multiply of Pope Pius's democracy. Visitors are received with great simplicity. As soon as one enters, he causes him to be seated in an armchair by his side, chats, laughs, and relates anecdotes and stories. The other day the pope, while receiving some ladies, remarked that they had trains to their skirts.

"This is not hygienic," said he; "one gathers thus in the streets a quantity of microbes and other things. As to myself, when they compel me to add a train to my cassock it bothers me much, although there are four prelates to uphold it."

"But, holy father," said one of the visitors, "we hold up our trains when in the streets."

"That must be very inconvenient," replied Pius X.; and passing from word to action the pope made several tours in the room, holding up his robe in mimicry of a fine lady.

The Recall of a Minister.

In regard to his recall from Madrid Arthur S. Hardy makes the following statement:

On taking official leave of him when retiring from the service, President Roosevelt said in substance: that he had offered me the first assistant secretaryship of State, but that I had preferred to go to Spain; that he had no use for a man who was unwilling to go where he was wanted, instancing his own acceptance of the vice presidency from a sense of duty and against his inclination; that he had determined I should go to Spain, since I wanted to, but that I should go nowhere else, especially as, when offered the secretaryship, I had inquired what I was to get next if I accepted it. It required some patience to listen to these statements, but interviewers of the President know that patience becomes a necessary virtue when no interruption is brooked. The facts in the case are that I had already been appointed, without solicitation of any kind, Minister to Spain when Mr. Hay offered me the assistant secretaryship of State, being then on leave in Washington on my way to my post. As throwing further light on the President's attitude to the diplomatic service, I may say, that having taken leave of the President in September, on my way to Spain, without the slightest intimation that my recall in March had been already decided upon, when my brother called upon the President, at my cabled request from Madrid, to learn the reason, Mr. Roosevelt informed him "your brother has had his cake and eaten it."

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Eliot M. Miller, a civil engineer of New Orleans, tells how General U. S. Grant made his father, Chaplain Miller, swear.

It was one of the chaplain's duties to receive and distribute the mail to General Grant's staff. Whenever the mail was late he was greatly annoyed by questions as to the cause of the delay, time of arrival, etc. On one occasion, when the post was unusually late, the chaplain, for fear of losing his temper, attached the following notice to the door of his tent:

"The chaplain does not know when the mail will arrive."

Shortly afterwards General Grant, passing the chaplain's quarters, noticed the sign. He paused before it a moment and then walked slowly on his way. Coming out of his tent a few moments later, Chaplain Miller was horrified to read:

"The chaplain does not know when the mail will arrive, and he doesn't give a damn."

A chief of bureau in the Navy Department tells a good story of the time when one of the Secretaries of the Navy got the notion into his head that officers should not permit their wives to reside at the foreign stations to which their husbands might be attached. So an order to that effect was promulgated. Soon thereafter considerable perplexity and no little amusement was afforded the Secretary when he received the following cablegram from Commodore Fyffe, then in command of the Asiatic Squadron:

"Secretary Navy, Washington. It becomes my painful duty to report that my wife, Eliza Fyffe, has, in disobedience to my orders, and in the face of regulations of department, taken up her residence on the station, and persistently refuses to leave."

There is a concert singer in the West whose voice is not only of great sweetness and compass, but of such extraordinary power that no orchestra ever drowns its tones.

Now the husband of this singer frequently acts as her conductor, and he is ever anxious to impress upon the public the fact of the great power of his wife's voice. On one occasion the lady was rehearsing for a concert to be given in a large hall. In one of her songs she was to be accompanied by a trumpet obligato. Although the performer, in obedience to instructions from the conductor, blew with all his might and main, yet his best efforts were invariably met with a call of, "Louder, louder!" from the insatiable leader.

Finally the performer rested his instrument on his knee and, surveying the leader with every evidence of indignation on his purple face, broke out with:

"'Louder and louder' is fery easy to say, but vere is de vind?"

The late Beriah Wilkins came to Washington as a member of Congress, and left a good many political friends in Ohio.

He was in his office one day several administrations ago, when a very seedy man came in. He was ragged and dirty, unshaven, and generally woebegone.

"Beriah," he said, "I am down and out. I have lost everything I had, and I want you to get me some kind of a job."

Wilkins looked the man over and found he was a lawyer who had done him some service in Ohio. He said he would do what he could. But first let me make you presentable," he continued.

They went to a barber shop, where the man was shaved and had a haircut and a bath. Then Wilkins took him to a clothing store, and bought him a complete outfit—froek coat, high hat, good shoes, shirt, collar, and everything he needed. The change was marvelous. The Ohioan looked distinguished and prosperous in his new rig.

Next morning Wilkins took his friend to the White House and introduced him to the President. He told the President that this man had been of much help to him, and he wanted to get him a place, thinking he might secure a clerkship of some kind.

"Are you a lawyer?" asked the President.

"I am," said the visitor.

"All right," said the President, "I will make you chief justice of one of the Territories."

"But—but—" stammered the surprised Ohio man.

"Shut up!" commanded Wilkins, and the fellow subsided.

The appointment was made, and the man served out his term. Wilkins said he got the place solely on his high hat.

Among the Washington properties affected by a recent condemnation proceedings instituted by the government was a house belonging to a most attractive widow well known in the Congressional set. Now this lady was convinced that the sum offered for her property was far below its actual value. After many fruitless attempts to get her protest before the proper committee, the lady finally addressed a pathetic appeal to a Senator, chairman of a committee having nothing whatever to do with the condemnation proceedings. "If only I could have an opportunity," wrote the lady, "to look into your kindly gray eyes, I am sure you would hear my side of the case."

This unique appeal was "respectfully referred" by its recipient to Senator Scott, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings. He carefully read it through several times, and then for the information of his clerk endorsed it as follows: "Risk one eye, Nathan R. Scott."

A number of Wall Street men at luncheon one day were discussing the remarkable ability of a certain operator in the street to weather any financial storm.

"Why," said one of the financiers, "that chap's a wonder. I don't know how many times they've had him against the wall, yet he always contrives to get away."

"I have heard it said," observed another, "that Blank is resourceful enough to make a living on a desert island."

"Yes, he could do that, too," affirmed the first speaker, "if there were another man on the island."

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS

Engagements and Weddings.

Before a temporary altar erected in the ruins of St. Dominic's Church, at Bush and Steiner streets, Miss Ethyl Kelly, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred R. Kelly, of 2155 Devisadero street, and granddaughter of James J. Kelly, president of the Hibernia Bank, became the bride of John Gillespie Ewing of Chicago. The ceremony was performed by Father Thomas Sherman, S. J., son of General Sherman and cousin of the groom. Mr. Ewing is the son of General Ewing of Ohio, and the nephew of James G. Blaine. He is well known in literary circles for his scholarly contributions to the history of this country. Mr. and Mrs. Ewing will make their home in Chicago, where Mr. Ewing is engaged in the practice of law.

The engagement has been announced of Dr. Raphael Lorini, at one time a popular member of society in San Francisco and a prominent physician as well, to Miss Carolyn Louise Chase of Derry, New Hampshire. Three years ago Dr. Lorini left San Francisco to accept the position of resident physician at Coronado and it was while he was acting in that capacity he met the woman whom he will wed in the early summer. Miss Chase is a graduate of Wellesley College.

The engagement has been announced of Miss Enid Yale, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Yale of Linda Vista, and Wilmer T. Gracey, at present Consul General at Hongkong. The news is of interest to many Oaklanders, among whom Miss Yale has spent her childhood years, and the marriage will probably take place in the late summer. Mr. Gracey planning to return to his post of duty in September. Mr. Gracey is well known in the consular service, having spent some fifteen years in China.

The engagement is announced of Miss Leila Evans, third daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Talliesin Evans, of 212 Fourth street, Oakland, and George R. Guppy, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Guppy of Berkeley. While no date has been set for the wedding, it will take place probably during the coming month.

The marriage of Miss Griswold and Colonel Edwin Emerson was a notable event of the month of May. Among the guests at the ceremony and informal reception were Dr. and Mrs. John Bakewell, Charles Vail Bakewell, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Aiken, Mr. and Mrs. William Greer Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Taylor, Mrs. Bryan, Mrs. Herbert Ponting, Mrs. William Irwin, Miss Brooks, S. S. Fish, Rothwell Hyde, Major William Stephenson, Dr. Arnold Genthe, Miss Mary Bell, Mrs. David Bixler, Howard Stevenson, Charles Norris, Charles R. Field, Dr. Devine, John McNaught, Allan Dunn, Miss Anna Frances Briggs, Miss Fiske, Dr. Charles V. Cross, William Whitney, Miss Blanche Letcher, Professor W. D. Armes of Berkeley.

Miss McMillan, of 1027 Oak street, announces the engagement of her daughter, Gertrude E. McMillan, to Milo Edmund Hixcox of Alameda.

Colonel and Mrs. George H. Pippy announce the engagement of their daughter Florence to John William Plant of St. Louis. Mr. Plant is general manager of the Folsom Development Company. The date of the wedding has not been set.

Mr. and Mrs. M. T. Cole of 3352 Sacramento street announce the engagement of their daughter, Mabelle C. Cole, to John F. Sherburn of Sacramento. The marriage will take place on June 6th.

Capt. J. J. Heneker, who has been at the War College, Newport, the past year, is leaving there this week for the West.

Californians in the East.

Mrs. C. B. Alexander, who returned last week to her home in New York, is planning to get away to her Tuxedo cottage shortly. In July they go abroad. Next winter one of their daughters is to be brought out, and the beautiful home at No. 4 West Fifty-eighth street promises to be the center of some brilliant functions. Its magnificent Georgian style hall room is the only one of its kind in Manhattan.

Mrs. Mayo Newhall and the Misses Margaret, Elizabeth and Marian Newhall were in Chicago when news of the disaster here reached them, but they will continue on their way and go abroad to remain indefinitely. Miss Margaret Newhall's marriage to Frederick Houghtelling of Chicago was set for September.

Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs is in Newport for a short stay. She will not open her villa, but will spend the summer in Europe.

Miss Jennie Blair, who came from New York with Miss Jennie Crocker in her private car, is the guest of Mrs. C. F. MacDermot at her Center street home.

Mrs. McKinstrey, wife of Major McKinstrey, is visiting her father, Colonel Frederick W. Lawrence at Bay Side, Long Island. She will return to San Francisco in about a month.

Mrs. James Watson McClure and Miss Josephine Eastland left last week for Tennessee, where Miss Eastland is to spend several months. Mrs. McClure will join her husband in New York.

Mrs. T. W. M. Draper and Miss Dorothy Draper have changed their plans and, instead of going to Oregon for the summer, will leave in a few days for New York to spend several months. Miss Elsa Draper is there at present as the guest of relatives.

Colonel Sedgwick Pratt, U. S. A., and Mrs. Pratt have left for New York, and

Colonel Pratt will take station in the East.

Californians Abroad.

Mr. J. W. Byrne and his mother, Mrs. Margaret Irvine, have been at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York. They expect to spend the summer in Europe.

Col. John A. Darling, U. S. A., and Mrs. Darling and Miss Ella Hastings, who have been spending the winter in Sicily, have arrived in Boston from the Azores.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Augustus Spreckels have left their home in Paris en route to New York. Miss Lurline Spreckels was married to Spencer F. Eddy in Paris the Saturday following the earthquake.

From Finland comes the news of the arrival of a little daughter in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Marten Ekblom, the latter of whom was formerly Miss Weenonah Williams of this city. Mrs. Ekblom is a cousin of the Van Ness and Clement families and a niece of Gardner Williams, the well-known South African mining man. She has lived abroad for a number of years, and was married a little over a year ago in London, since which time she and her husband have been on his estate near Borga, Finland.

Mrs. George Page and Miss Leslie Page, who have been traveling in Brittany since they left Paris, where they spent the winter, have recently gone to Switzerland to remain during the summer months.

Mrs. Edward Pringle, Miss Nina Pringle and Miss Hess Pringle, who have been traveling in Europe for the past year, were in Paris at the time of the San Francisco disaster, have determined to remain abroad until August.

Mrs. Lillie Hastings Onativia, Miss Zelia Onativia, and Mr. Hastings Onativia arrived in Boston on the White Star S. S. Canopic during the week.

Mr. T. C. Van Ness, who was in Southern France en route to Italy to join Mrs. Van Ness and Miss Daisy Van Ness, when he received news of the earthquake and fire, has returned to California.

Among the San Franciscans returning to this country on the White Star S. S. Canopic were Mr. and Mrs. William Clark.

Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase and Miss Francis Joliffe, who were in Paris at the time of the earthquake, have returned to California.

Californians who returned last week from Europe included Dr. William Boericke, Miss Dorothy Boericke, Miss Ruth Boericke, Mrs. Boericke, Mrs. H. L. Turbush and Miss Beatrice Turbush of San Francisco, Count de la Rocca, brother of the French Consul at San Francisco, and Dr. and Mrs. W. Seward Webb.

Californians at New York hotels last week were: Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Blakeley, Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Randall, Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Rea, A. F. Burns, Mrs. S. Burns, Miss Maxwell and Mrs. J. Coleman, Mrs. C. Brand, Mrs. J. W. Wright, Mrs. W. S. O'Brien, Miss Buckley, Mr. and Mrs. M. Ashe, Miss Foley, Mr. and Mrs. A. Cahn, Mr. and Mrs. M. Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. G. F. Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. C. Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. G. M. Palmer, Mr. and Mrs. J. Watkins, Mrs. F. S. Rose, Mrs. Burke, Mrs. E. M. Greene, Mrs. W. C. Eisen, Mrs. E. F. Franks, Mrs. R. S. Haviland, Miss MacDonald, at the Martha Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. George Newhall, who were in Paris when the news of the great fire reached them, left on the first steamer for New York. In mid-Atlantic they received a wireless telegram that their little daughter was safe, which greatly relieved their anxiety. They are now at Burlingame.

Those San Franciscans on the passenger lists of departing liners who sailed last week were: Dr. and Mrs. Roy K. Belden, Miss Ella Belden, Mrs. A. Mack, Charles Brummenbaum, Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Emig, Miss Lena Emig, Mrs. Schultz, Miss Anna Schultz and Miss Martha Schultz.

Across the Bay.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard H. Pease and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Barry Watson are in Mill Valley, where they will spend the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. William H. Mills and their daughter will be in Oakland for the summer, having taken a residence at 490 Sherman street. Their Pacific avenue house is now occupied by Judge MacFarland.

Mr. and Mrs. Latham McMullin are visiting Mr. and Mrs. James Follis at their home in San Rafael.

Victor Metcalf Jr. is spending some weeks with his parents in Oakland, and will not rejoin his ship until next month.

Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels will probably remain in Oakland until the fall.

Mrs. William Tevis has been visiting friends in Oakland.

Among the San Francisco people who are planning to build homes in Piedmont are Mr. and Mrs. John Breuner and Mr. and Mrs. William Cluff.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Butters, who had planned an automobile trip through Europe for the summer months, have decided to remain in America. Mr. Butters has been called East on business.

Mrs. James Potter Langhorne and Miss Julia Langhorne, who have been staying in Alameda for the past month as the guests of relatives, have returned to their Pacific avenue home.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Meek have closed their Oak street home and have returned to their San Lorenzo ranch, where they will spend the summer.

Mrs. Edwards and Miss Atnette Edwards, who lost all their belongings in the burning of the Bella Vista, are comfortably settled on Adeline street, Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Allen, with Miss Gertrude Allen, have taken the Harry Farr home in Piedmont, and are planning to move from their Jackson street home very shortly.

Mrs. Henry A. Butters, with Miss Marie, Miss Marguerite and Master Harry Butters, leave early in June for Chico, where they have taken a house.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Parker Currier are in Alameda, where they have taken a house on Santa Clara avenue for the summer.

Mrs. John F. Swift, her sister, Mrs. M. R. Norris, and her nieces, Miss Mary S. Bailey and Miss Helen Bailey, are living at 2402 Warring street, Berkeley.

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Hewlett, who lost all their personal belongings in the burning of the St. Dunstan, are settled temporarily with Mrs. Hewlett's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Fore, in Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Stent (Miss Frances Harris) have purchased the Wadsworth house in Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Wingate will soon leave their home in Oakland for a season at Del Monte.

Dr. Boericke and his two daughters arrived from their European trip a few days ago and are at their country home in Mill Valley. They were in Naples at the time of the fearful eruption of Vesuvius.

Southern California.

Mrs. Timothy Hopkins has been the guest of Mrs. E. S. Pillsbury at her villa at Montecito, where Mrs. Pillsbury's mother, Mrs. Kohl, is also visiting.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Driscoll and their little son have gone to Santa Barbara, where they will spend the summer with Mrs. Driscoll's parents, the Bacons.

Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Bancroft, who camped in the vicinity of Fort Mason, San Francisco, for several days after the destruction of the St. Dunstan's, are occupying apartments in Berkeley. They contemplate leaving in a short time for Southern California.

Notes About the Clubs.

The Olympic Club, which is most comfortably quartered in the spacious Eugene Lent house on Eddy street, has daily a large attendance of members, and has shown much hospitality to the officers of the First Regiment stationed across the street. On Thursday evening the First Regiment Band serenaded the Olympians from 8 to 9.

The Bohemian Club expects to move into its new quarters at 1925 Octavia street about June 1st. At present the club members are receiving their mail at 2171 Pacific avenue.

Proceeds from an auction sale of places for the Ladies' Gambol under the auspices of the Lambs Club, New York, have netted $7000 and that amount has been donated to the Bohemian Club.

Uncle George Bromley is in comfort at 344 Clay street. He started on the morning of April 18 after the quake, to catch the train for Norwich, Conn., according to the itinerary, but was not able to break through the fire line. The journey to New England is not canceled, but simply postponed.

The San Francisco Press Club has a new home. On June 1st they will take possession of the Withrow residence at 2016 Pine street, and on June 9th will formally open the new quarters with a reception to the members of their guests. The Withrow place is a handsome, three story house. It is beautifully furnished and equipped throughout. Six apartments will be set apart for the members who desire to live at the club. At a meeting of the Board of Directors it was decided to do away with the initiation fee for active membership during the three months ending September 1st. The monthly dues have been reduced to $150.

The Union League Club having secured the Hellman residence, northwest Franklin and Sacramento streets, for new headquarters, will have an opening and housewarming on Saturday at 8 p. m., to which all members have been invited.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter McG. McBean and Mrs. Harry Kierstedt are staying at Burlingame at present.

Mrs. Russell Wilson, who has leased her house on California street, has moved to Burlingame with her daughters for the summer months.

Mr. Harry N. Stetson gave a "stag" dinner at the Burlingame Club on Thursday night last. The guests of honor were the officers of the marine corps who did such magnificent work in preserving order and promoting the relief system in the city. Covers were laid for twenty. Among the officers of the corps present were Captain Evans, Captain Wise and Lieutenant White. Among others present were Peter Martin, Walter Hobart, George De Long, Jos. S. Tobin and Clement Tobin.

Mrs. Edward Barron, Miss Marguerite Barron and Mr. Ward Barron are at their country place, near Mayfield, where they expect to spend the summer.

Mrs. William Bourn, Mrs. James Ellis Tucker and Miss Ida Bourn left immediately after the fire for their country place at St. Helena.

Mr. and Mrs. William Ede, who arrived from the Orient to find their home in ashes, have taken a house on the corner of Broadway and Fillmore streets. Mr. Ede was the owner of the Majestic Theatre.

Colonel and Mrs. W. R. Smedberg and Miss Cora Smedberg, whose home on Larkin street was burned, are at present living with Major and Mrs. Melvor (nee Smedberg) at the Presidio.

Dr. James W. Ward, president of the Board of Health, has resumed his private practice and is now in the home of the W. W. Van Arsdale, corner of Scott and Jackson streets.

Dr. H. Hipkins, who was formerly at the Wenban, will open his offices on Sacramento street on the 1st of June.

Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Hellmann Jr. and family are settled in their home at San Leandro and have the elder Hellmanns and the Hellers as their guests.

The Hechts have given up their lease of the Bishop house, near Fruitvale, for six months. Mr. Bishop wanted the house and the Hechts have gone East, and will probably go to Europe. Colonel Hecht's daughters, Mrs. Mark and Mrs. Will Gerstle, have gone to San Rafael, where they have taken a house for a year. The Mark Gerstle house has been rented by the Gerstle and Thomas law firm.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry St. Lawrence Farr, who have rented their Piedmont residence for some months, are to make their home temporarily with Mrs. Farr's parents, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Sharon.

Mrs. Andrew Carrigan, who has been the guest of Lieutenant and Mrs. Clarence Carrigan at Fort Baker since the fire, has returned to her home on Jackson street.

Mrs. Alexander Loughborough has rented her home on O'Farrell and Franklin streets to one of the banks.

Mr. and Mrs. Worthington Ames, who are at present the guests of Mrs. Ames' mother, Mrs. E. P. Preston, at the latter's country place, Portola Hall, near Redwood City, are building an attractive home at Fair Oaks, which will be completed shortly. It is of concrete, and was entirely uninjured by the earthquake.

The residence of Mr. and Mrs. George S. Fife at Menlo was very much shattered by the earthquake. It will have to be rebuilt before it will be again tenable.

Mrs. Mary A. Huntington, the former wife of Henry E. Huntington, accompanied by her daughter, Miss Marian Huntington, arrived in San Francisco May 29 from Japan. News of the catastrophe of April 18 destroyed their plans for an extended tour of the Orient and brought them back on the same steamer on which they left here.

During the passage of the steamer Caronia from New York to Queens-town, M. Theodore Kearney, of Fresno, a saloon passenger, died suddenly. The body will be landed at Liverpool to be returned to the United States. M. Theodore Kearney was the largest raisin grower in the United States, if not in the world. He was organizer and for a long time president of the California Raisin Growers' Association. He had been in poor health for a long time, suffering from heart trouble, and was on his way to Bad Nauheim, Germany, to take treatment. He was in San Francisco during the earthquake and fire and his condition was aggravated by excitement at that time. Mr. Kearney was a bachelor with no known relatives and no confidential friends. No one in Fresno knows where or when he was born or anything about his early life. He came from England or Ireland, claimed American citizenship by naturalization of his father, and is thought to have at one time lived in Boston. In the early seventies he was a clerk in the office of W. S. Chapman in San Francisco. He came to Fresno in 1873 and dealt in lands, finally becoming the owner of the 5,000-acre "Fruitvale" estate, containing the famous Kearney vineyard.

Mrs. Richardson Clover and her daughters arrived last week from their home in Washington, D. C., and are at their beautiful country place, Lavergne, near Napa.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Parrott, who were living at the Hotel Richelieu at the time of the fire, have taken the O. P. Evans house in Berkeley for the summer.

Sidney Pringle, who has been in Mexico for some weeks, has returned to the city.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Chesebrough, Miss Edith Chesebrough, Miss Helen Chesebrough and Arthur Chesebrough are at San Rafael for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Girvin have taken Mrs. Thomas Selby's house at Menlo for the summer.

Among the houses most damaged by the earthquake was that of Miss Mary Eyre at Menlo. It was leased and occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Agar (nee McDough) of New York. The quake shook down the chimneys, which crashed through the roof and the two floors and into the basement. The water tanks on the roof were broken and the house below was flooded. The house will have to be rebuilt.

Mrs. Porter and Miss Amy Porter, who lost so many of their personal belongings when the Pleasanton was destroyed, are at Cloyne Court and are to remain there through the summer. Mrs. Marguerite Hanford joining them there early next month.

Mrs. Thomas Magee is the guest of Mrs. Joseph Tobin at Burlingame.

Mrs. A. H. Loughborough and Miss Zane are at the Albemarle in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Lee, who owned the Luxor Apartments, which were burned last fall, have the valuable things that they had collected for many years.

Mrs. Houghton and Miss Minnie Houghton have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Houghton on Harrison street. Their home and much of their property was destroyed in San Francisco.

Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Morse are entertaining Mrs. Morse's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Homer Craig, who have been their guests since the disastrous fire destroyed their San Francisco home.

Contrary to their first decision, Miss Sara Drum and her brothers, Frank, John and Will, are to remain in their San Francisco home on Broadway near Devisadero. They are anticipating a visit from Mrs. William Geer Hitchcock, nee Drum, before many weeks.

Admiral Louis Kempff, U. S. N., retired, and Miss Cornelia Kempff, who made their home at the Buckingham, on Sutter street, have since the fire been with Mr. and Mrs. Carl Peter Weeks at the home of the latter on Washington street, near the Presidio gate.

Mrs. Thomas B. Bishop, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Porter Bishop, left early in the month for the Bishop ranch, near Santa Barbara, and expect to spend some time there. Mrs. Bishop has invited a number of her friends here to camp on her ranch during the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. H. McDonald Specker are at Menlo for the summer. Mrs. Spencer is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Josselyn.

Mr. and Mrs. Barry Coleman are at San Mateo. Miss Sophie Coleman and Miss Lucy Gwin Coleman are the guests of friends at the Mare Island navy yard.

The Misses Joliffe are making their home with their aunt, Mrs. Henry Matthews, on Webster street. Though their San Francisco home was not burned, they have stored their furniture and will not go back to town for the present.

Mrs. Henry Clarence Breeden and her mother, Mrs. Emma Butler, are spending some weeks at Santa Barbara, where they are occupying the attractive home of Mrs. Butler's other daughter, Mrs. E. Walton Hedges.

George R. Carter, Governor of the Territory of Hawaii, and Mrs. Carter were passengers on the liner Manaburu, which sailed during the week for Honolulu. Governor Carter came to the mainland about three months ago in very poor health, but has quite recovered during his stay at Del Monte.

Colonel A. W. von Schmidt, aged 85 years, died on May 26th at his home, 516 Eagle avenue, Alameda. He was a well-known civil engineer. He came around the Horn, in May, 1849, and has lived in San Francisco most of the time since. Colonel von Schmidt assisted in surveying the boundary of the State and did other important work for the Government. He installed San Francisco's first water system. He also had charge of blowing up of Arch Rock in San Francisco bay. He was a widower and left five children. He was a member of California Commandery No. 1, Knights Templar.

ARGONAUTS TO THE ARGONAUT OFFICE.

Although it might seem like sending coals to Newcastle, our request to our readers to send Argonauts to the Argonaut office is already being heeded. Although our files were destroyed by the recent fire, we have declined the numerous kind offers of our readers to send us their bound volumes. We feel that it would be asking too much of them. But in regard to incomplete and unbound files and unbound numbers generally, we have no such compunctions. We announced last week that we would be very glad to receive such numbers. Our generous readers have at once seized the opportunity, and during the past week we have received a number of large parcels of Argonauts. With these we shall hope soon to build up some complete files.

If any Argonaut readers have loose Argonauts of any dates before the fire we hope they will ship them to us by express marked, "Newspapers, collect," and also marked with their names, so that we may acknowledge their kindness and treasure it in the editorial memory.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.—The Argonaut (title trademarked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Publication office, 246 Sutter St., San Francisco. Waldorf Astoria in New York is the last word in hotel elegance; to them the inner public rooms of that caravansary, where the light of the sun never reaches, where the electric lights glare both day and night, are portals to paradise; there the richer male inhabitants of Kankakee, garbed in unaccustomed frock coats and plug hats, gaze breathlessly at the richer female inhabitants of Kokomo, mistaking them for Vanderbilts and Astors. In the Middle West these and similar gorgeous New York caravansaries are looked upon as "finer than the White House." But we are heterodox enough to dislike these places, and to think that, whatever they are, they certainly are not comfortable.

And this the old Palace was. To those who are familiar with it the recollection of its spacious rooms, its large windows, its adequate bath rooms, its lofty ceilings, and its magnificent court yards will always bring up a feeling of keen regret that it is gone. Who that has seen the punky little "winter gardens" of Continental hotels, or the dismal blind alleys which stick out from the street into the brick-and-mortar "lounges" of the modern London Strand hotels, can fail to contrast them with the magnificent court yard of the old Palace, into which three or four of them might easily have been placed.

But there are so many buildings to regret in the fiery path of the late conflagration that it seems sentimental to dwell at length on a single one. Yet there are many of us who have a warm spot in our hearts for the old Palace. There never was another hotel like it in the world. And modern ideas as to height and space are so different from those of thirty years ago that there never will be another.

A Sample of Insurance Tactics.

In a daily paper J. A. Bried relates his experience with a Philadelphia insurance company. He went to the San Francisco office with his proofs of loss. The Secretary-Adjuster glanced at them, and pushed before him a type-written sheet saying: "There are our liabilities, $2,750,000. And there are our assets, $767,000." Think over that," added the Secretary-Adjuster, and urged him to sign a non-waiver agreement. Mr. Bried refused to sign. He withdrew, and soon returned to the office of the insurance company accompanied by an attorney. The Secretary-Adjuster repeated his statement. Thereupon the attorney said: "You are an officer of this company, and have made in writing a statement that your company is insolvent. The only place for an insolvent company is in the hands of a receiver." Thereupon the Secretary-Adjuster in alarm hastened to notify Mr. Bried that his company's gross liabilities are largely reinsured in other companies and that thus they were beyond question solvent. Had Mr. Bried been a weak person, however, an ignorant man or a timid woman, he might easily have been bulldozed into compromising or signing a compromising document. But what kind of tactics are these for business men claiming to be honorable? It smacks of obtaining money under false pretences. These insurance companies are talking a good deal about "fighting in the courts." Some of their officials bid fair to figure in the criminal courts themselves.

More Muck-raking.

After the President had delivered his philippic on "The Man With the Muck-rake" there was silence in the country for the space of half an hour. Then there was the sound of many voices. All the officers of the life insurance companies, of the Standard Oil Company, of the Beef Trust, of the Whisky Trust, of the General Paper Company, and of numerous other trusts and corporations broke into a loud chorus of approval. They were followed by the semi-religious weeklies, like the Outlook, the Independent and journals of that ilk. They were echoed by numbers of good-hearted, weak-minded people of both sexes who dislike contention. The general tone of this chorus was about as follows:

"The President is right. The man with the muck-rake must be suppressed. Why rake muck when there are so many more agreeable things in the world to do? Why look down into the mud and muck beneath our feet when we may gaze up into the illimitable firmament jewelled with brilliant coruscating stars? Let us think about things that are pleasant; let us turn our minds toward the pure, the beautiful and the good; let us stop all this destructive criticism; let us be constructive and not destructive; let us destroy the man with the muck-rake."

So said, so done. Even the most censorious critics for a time were hushed. This was the case even among the muck-rake magazines, to which the star muck-rake writers were continually bringing large bomb shells of muck, which at times exploded prematurely, be-mucking the star muck writers, the editors of the muck-rake magazines, and visiting muckers from the citizenry. In these magazine offices there was consternation. The publishers, being sleek, well fed, prosperous men, feared to run counter to the President's order. The star muck-writers, owning nothing but their rakes as yet, desired to rake more muck. As a result there was scission and secession. Like the outcome of Kilkenny cat fights—which always mean more cats—the muck-rake quarrels only mean more muck-rake magazines.

Outside of muck-rake magazine circles, however, the country at large was inclined to heed the President's dictum. In truth the country was somewhat a-weary of all the muck-raking. It was perhaps a-weary of the muck, but certainly of the muck-raking. So it seemed for a time as if we were to be freed from Steffing Linkans, Ida Tarbarrels and System Lawsons with his frenzied financiers.

But it was not to be. Another muck bomb has exploded—this time in the offices of the Pennsylvania System, one of the oldest, richest and most reputable railways in the country. Everybody believed it was honest, although it is a Pennsylvania corporation. But in the absence of the President, Mr. Cassatt, some muck-raker discovered a most elaborate and complicated system of rascality—no, we mean swindling—no, we mean breaches of trust.

[These phrases sound too much like muck-raking, so we will modify them and put it "irregular procedure."]

These irregular proceedings consisted in the acceptance by the officials of the Pennsylvania railway of bribes—no, we mean presents—from shippers along the line. These presents took the form of shares of stock in coal mines, in subsidiary railways, in various corporations. The company manager making the most and largest presents to the Pennsylvania railroad officials had sidings constructed to his mine, or had connections made with his coal tramway. Furthermore, when there was a car famine he had plenty of cars when his loathsome competitors found it impossible to get any. Thus the men who made the presents thrived exceedingly, and so did the Pennsylvania railroad officials who received them. These gentlemen when on the stand testified with great frankness that they had often received shares of stock bringing in incomes of many thousand dollars a year. They seemed much surprised that there should be any question concerning the transaction. Perhaps they thought that the crusade against muck-raking instituted a new statute of limitations.

President Cassatt has hurriedly returned from Europe to meet this hail storm of muck. He says he "deprecates such criticism." Well, that is quite natural. Most of us deprecate criticism when it takes the shape of accusations of swindling on the part of one's subordinates. Furthermore President Cassatt says that he "will not sacrifice efficient officers to a manufactured and mistaken public opinion." By that he means muck-raking. But "manufactured and mistaken public opinion" is a very much prettier phrase.

Another bombshell has exploded since the President's speech, and showered the country with the muckiest kind of muck. This is the Chicago meat muck. If any man can read the report about that muck without a sincere desire never to eat anything that comes out of a Chicago can, we envy him the stoutness of his stomach. In this particular meat muck, however, the President seems to have forgotten his speech, and seems to be vigorously plying the rake. More power to his elbow! Our worthy President never cares today what he said yesterday, when he thinks that what he says today is wiser than yesterday's saying. A philosopher once said that the reason men love women so much is because they are so unreasonable. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why we all love Theodore Roosevelt so.

General Nelson A. Miles has relieved his mind of some expressions concerning the Chicago muck. Addressing the students of Kansas University on June 3d, he said:

"I told these facts about the meat packing houses seven years ago. Three thousand United States soldiers lost their lives from poisonous meat. No one can tell how many soldiers had their health ruined by this impure food. During the Spanish-American War I found that poisons were being used to preserve meat. From the official reports I found that canned meat was sold to the army that had been for months in the Liverpool docks, relabeled, brought back, and sold for soldiers' rations. I reported the matter to the War Department. A white-washing investigation was successfully carried out and the official report was that 'A colossal error had been made.' As a matter of fact it was a colossal fraud, and the persons who perpetrated it and who were interested in it should have been sent to the penitentiary. The adulteration of food products is the colossal crime of the times."

There are many people who do not admire some sides of General Miles' character. But no one can deny that he is an honorable gentleman, a patriotic citizen, and a brave soldier. In 1898 many of us suspected that sinister influences were at work to suppress his reports on the "embalmed beef" scandal. Many of us think still that these same sinister influences have pursued General Miles ever since—have pursued him even into his retirement to private life. Now it would seem that General Miles, like the President, is vigorously working the muck-rake, and as the Duke de Morny remarked of Napoleon III.'s broom, "They are both at the handle end."

In common with many other persons who were weary of muck, we were disposed to heed the President's admonitions and to discourage muck-rakers. But in the light of these very recent revelations we are becoming uncertain. There was once a witty Frenchman, Alphonse Karr, who was requested to write a leading article in one of the Paris newspapers on a question then agitating the public mind. His usual space of two columns was left open for him. He brought in his copy just before going to press. It consisted only of the heading and one line and ran thus:

"ON THE ABOLITION OF THE PENALTY OF DEATH.

"By all means. But let the murderers begin."

We are reminded of Alphonse Karr's saying now. By all means let us discourage the muck-rakers. But let the muck-makers begin.

Widening the Other Fellow's Street.

When San Francisco was burned down there arose a queer chorus of congratulation over the disappearance of street lines. For a time it almost seemed that San Francisco was glad she had burned. The Burnham plan of beautifying the city had been thoroughly discussed. Its civic center, its new boulevards and its widened streets had met with general approval among the people and the press. This lasted as long as there was no particular danger of its ever being carried out. When, however, the greater part of the city was wiped out by fire, the Burnham plan became imminent. Then the chorus of which we speak arose. But as the weeks passed by the members of the chorus disintegrated. They gradually became soloists. The general burden of their song was: "Yes, we believe in street widening, but not in widening our street. We believe in widening the Other Fellow's street." Whereupon the Other Fellow replied with a brilliant fantasia concerning the iniquity of touching his street, and the desirability, nay, the vital necessity, of widening some Other Fellow's street.

Up to the present writing we have observed no change in the music. It is still contrapuntal.

From General Evan Miles, U. S. A.

Colville, Wash., May 23, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed please find my check for a year's subscription to the Argonaut. As my personal effects were destroyed during the sad calamity that overtook the city, I do not know when my subscription expires. Your records being destroyed at the same time, you have no knowledge on this subject. It will be agreeable to me to begin the subscription upon receipt of the check enclosed. I learn with regret that your bound volumes, files and manuscripts were destroyed during the appalling calamity. As these valuable papers cannot be replaced, pray accept my sympathy for your loss. My address until further notice will be Colville, Washington.

Very Truly,

EVAN MILES,
Brig. Gen. U. S. Army, retired.

The Old Friend Will Come Regularly.

Lucerne, Switzerland, May 15, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Permit me to offer my sympathy to The Argonaut Publishing Co. for its recent losses, and to Mr. Jerome Hart personally, whose writings, particularly his travel letters, have been a special pleasure to me. I sincerely hope that all losses may be soon retrieved, and the Argonaut be soon again at home in the new San Francisco. As a native Californian and a reader of your paper for many, many years, I am glad to know that I can continue to welcome each week my old friend unchanged through its many trials. Very truly yours,

MRS. JOSEPHINE L. MASON.

With Interest and Pleasure.

Office of the Quartermaster,
Fort Slocum, N. Y., May 24, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I take pleasure in enclosing my check on the Riggs National Bank of Washington, D. C., for $4 in continuation of my subscription for the Argonaut, a paper which I always read with interest and pleasure. Regretting your heavy loss in the recent great fire, and with best wishes for your future and that of San Francisco, I remain

Yours very truly,
E. N. JONES,
Capt. U. S. A.

An Unsigned Letter.

San Francisco, May 22, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: My subscription to your paper has expired, but I have not renewed, as I cannot afford it any more. When times get easier with me, and I have more than one suit of clothes to my name, I shall remember my old friend the Argonaut.

A Reader for Twenty Years.

Chicago, May 25th, '06.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed please find express money order for renewal of my subscription. Right here I wish to compliment you on the grit which you have shown in not missing an issue of your paper, in the face of the disastrous results to you of the recent earthquake and fire. I have been a constant and appreciative reader of the Argonaut for fifteen years steadily, while living in San Francisco, and a subscriber for the past five years, since coming to Chicago to live. I always look forward, with pleasant anticipation, to its arrival. My wife calls it my Bible. Well, perhaps it is. You have my very best wishes for a speedy recovery from the awful effects of the great calamity.

Respectfully yours,
GEO. M. POND.

Appreciated More and More.

Los Angeles, Cal., May 28, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed please find check for next year's subscription. I have been a reader of the Argonaut since 1881 and appreciate it more and more every year. When the news of the calamity to your city reached here, the writer felt as though he had lost two dear friends: the Argonaut and the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art. I am more than glad that the Argonaut is still in existence. It made me think of Tennyson's lines on the "Death of the Old Year":

"Old year, you must not die;
You came to us so readily,
You lived with us so steadily,
Old year, you shall not die."

Wishing you all success and prosperity, I remain,
Yours very truly,
GEORGE DRAKE RUDDY.

Coals of Fire from a Clergyman.

Tacoma, Washington, May 23, '06.

My dear Mr. Hart: I am enclosing check for $12 for three more years of your paper, which to us is a household necessity. This will help to remove that "straw that stuck in your craw" when the bill came for packing the Argonaut books that burned.

Your pointed touching of the Clergy is refreshing. But don't hit us too hard; the world is a critical congregation; fires and earthquakes are only a few of our troubles; and we are trying to help. Please accept cordial congratulations that the Argonaut saved its pen—and pen-holder. Very truly yours,

A. H. BARNHISEL.

From an Absent Californian.

3 Ave. Marceau,
Paris, May 14, 1906.

Love and sympathy to the Argonaut! Our tears came at first sight of the dear little edition of April 21st just arrived, the first direct news, excepting cables, from our beloved city—more beloved than ever in its misfortune. I suffer with the rest of you. All my possessions, the savings of a lifetime, are buried in its ashes; but like the rest of you, I am ready to devote the work of my remaining years to help rebuild the dear old city, with which I have grown and been identified since the Argonaut days of '49. God bless you all!

WILLIAM J. YOUNGER.

From a Former Resident.

Chicago, Illinois, May 23, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: As a former resident of San Francisco, it has been of the greatest information and interest to continue receiving the Argonaut without interruption from the fire. Such enterprise and fidelity in the face of the disaster that overtook you cannot be commended too highly and is thoroughly appreciated, particularly at this distance, as the pen pictures you have given us of the conditions in our old city convey a better conception of the real situation than has been obtainable through any other source. With best wishes for a prosperous future in the greater San Francisco that is to be, I remain

Very truly yours,
W. A. WORTHINGTON.

Would Rather Miss His Sunday Breakfast.

2236 Pacific Ave., San Francisco, May 22, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Since the late unpleasantness I have received but two issues of the Argonaut, viz: May 5th and 19th (I am a yearly subscriber), and as I would as lief (or rather) miss my Sunday morning breakfast than forego the pleasure of my Argonaut, I would ask that you kindly send me all the copies of the paper published since the fire; also another favor, will you please send the like number to my daughter, Blanche Wertheimer, New York City. Send me the bill and I shall remit. Wishing the best Weekly Journal on Earth Continued Success, I am

Sincerely yours,
J. WERTHEIMER.

Well, Rather.

Denver, Colo., May 21, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Did you issue a number the week of the quake? If so, kindly send me a copy—I have received all the copies issued since then.

MRS. M. K. CORBIN.

Boston Slanders Tamalpais.

Tamalpais, May 23, '06.

Editor Argonaut: I have before me a copy of the Boston Sunday Post, April 22, '06, containing a large picture labeled "Mt. Tamalpais and Mill Valley, Across the Bay from San Francisco. Extinct Volcano, now showing signs of activity." If Boston people could tell the truth it would seem that a time when a city like San Francisco had been so badly hurt by fire, and its neighbors also greatly injured, would be the time. Of course we had an earthquake, but the fire caused the great injury; now why should Boston, which once had a fire herself, attempt to make it so much worse than it is, and resort to such absolute falsehoods, to accomplish that end? The fact is that not a chimney, not a watertank, not a foot of our railway was broken, cracked or damaged in the slightest manner by the earthquake.

Yours truly,
R. H. WARFIELD.

Short But Encouraging Notes.

Iron Mountain, May 27.—Herewith money order for my subscription; am glad my subscription expires at such a time that I can help you a trifle with a bit of ready cash. W. M. Hodgkin.

Oakland, Cal., May 23, 1906.—I enclose check to continue my subscription. I thank you for the numbers since the fire, and I sincerely sympathize with you for your losses, which are so much greater than my own, since I can replace my technical library at least.
Geo. H. Strong.

Los Gatos, Cal., May 28, 1906.—As I resided in the burnt district, I did not receive your earthquake issue. Kindly mail one here, as your very excellent paper has been coming to my home since the very first issue.
W. F. Hooke.

Berkeley, May 28, 1906.—I have for a long time regularly taken your valuable paper. Of all the periodicals that come to my house, the Argonaut ranks first in the estimation of myself and family. Since the fire, I have not been able to secure a copy until your edition of May 26. If you issued a copy the earthquake week I would like to receive one. Am I asking too much to have you forward me one?
W. A. Irwin.

Portland, May 23, 1906.—Herewith find check for my subscription. I hope you will very soon be back in your old quarters, doing business at the old stand and in the old dress. Language fails me in conveying to you my sense of the loss sustained through the destruction of San Francisco, which I sincerely trust will speedily be rebuilt.
Wm. A. McRae.

INTERVALS BETWEEN EARTHQUAKES.

California's Shocks Considered by W. M. Davis, Professor of Geology at Harvard University.

Will San Francisco be rebuilt? Certainly it will be (writes Professor Davis in the Youth's Companion).

Then may it not be shaken down again? No one can promise that it shall not be; yet the geological processes which cause earthquakes work, as a rule, so slowly that comparatively long intervals of relative quiet ordinarily occur between the more violent shocks.

But why live at all in a country where earthquakes occur? Because the perpetual advantages of favorable situation, fine climate and fertile soil, to say nothing of mineral wealth, are great enough to make up for the risk of occasional danger. The advantageous situation of San Francisco in particular, with the Pacific open before it through the Golden Gate, cannot be given up, even if once in a while it be disturbed by tremors from under ground.

There is no reason for thinking that California will be any more unsteady in the future than it has been in the past. Its great population will continue to enjoy its great resources.

Mountains have not been uplifted suddenly, but only by long-continued movements, with very long waits between them. It is this belief in the long endurance of quietness and its rare interruption by disturbance that gives us confidence in the earth today.

Most of the movements of the mountain-making kind have produced only slight tremors at the surface of the earth. Some of them are occasionally stronger and cause more or less destruction over a limited area above the center of disturbance; but even the most frequently shaken mountain chains, such as the Himalayas in northern India, enjoy long periods of repose between their rifts and starts. The continents, with their mountains and plateaus, have been formed by slow movements of this kind, now here, now there; just as the valleys in the highlands have been carved by correspondingly long and patient processes, and not by sudden and vast floods, as was once believed.

The modern view of the order of nature is therefore one which gives us great courage to go on with the world's work. The crust of the earth is so heavy, and it lies so solidly on the interior that to move a large and deep block of the crust even a few inches requires more force than can be accumulated and applied in a hurry. It is only by long waiting and long accumulating of strains within the earth that the crust can be moved at all, and even then the strains are relieved by a trifling movement whereby one crushed block is displaced a few inches, or at most a few feet, with respect to another. As to mountain movements of a thousand or several thousand feet all at once, there is not the least reason to think that such great displacements ever have occurred or ever will occur.

There is not the smallest reason for thinking that the San Francisco earthquake had anything to do with volcanic action.

Thousands or hundreds of thousands of shocks must have occurred as the Coast Range was uplifted in slow disorder; but as the uplifting required millions of years, most of the time that has passed over its peaks was a time of quiet, and most of the shocks were presumably of moderate strength, as have been all the recorded earthquakes in California.

There is nothing peculiar to California in all this. The same thing might be said of many other parts of the world. Most earthquakes have nothing to do with volcanoes. The more closely the occurrence of earthquakes is studied, the larger the number of them that is found to be associated with bends or breaks in the outer and more brittle part of the crust, which slowly wrinkles as the earth grows older.

THE STATE STILL HERE.

The Governor's Admirable Letter—He Tells the World the Truth About the Earthquake—California's Wonderful Resources Unaffected.

Governor George C. Pardee has prepared a formal letter about the recent fire, a copy of which has been sent to the Governor of each State. Governor Pardee prepared the letter at the request of President E. H. Harriman of the Southern Pacific and his traffic chiefs, J. C. Stubbs, William Sproule, Charles S. Fee and James Horsburgh Jr. The letter in part is as follows:

This statement is made to you not to minimize nor gloss over San Francisco's calamity, for that was very great, but to remove the erroneous impression that the destruction of our metropolis was due in large degree to the earthquake. Though California's chief city is momentarily in distress her people are undaunted by the great misfortune, and San Francisco will arise as other cities have arisen from the ashes of her former greatness.

Illinois was not ruined by Chicago's fire. South Carolina did not suffer permanently from Charleston's troubles, and Texas, the only State larger in area than California, did not even pause in her marvelous progress because of the Galveston flood. So California's two million people are not bankrupt nor seriously affected in their courage or resources as a result of the damage to her principal city.

California's mountains, river beds and ancient gravel channels are still rich in gold. Her great valleys, two of which are larger than many Eastern States, are all of unmeasured fertility. On their ten million acres can be raised anything from oranges to potatoes. The semi-tropical fruits can be grown from San Diego on the south to Redding on the north—a stretch of six hundred miles of California soil and California climate.

Thirty or more thriving cities of five thousand or more people each, are centers of rich localities finding their markets in the world, and in their prosperity independent of any local affliction elsewhere.

Our forests of redwood, fir and pine along the coast and clothing the Sierra Nevada mountains never presented greater potential wealth than at the present.

Our oil fields are yearly furnishing millions of barrels of oil and immense electric power is being generated by the streams of the Sierra. Each of these industries has solved the problem of cheap power for California and yet neither has passed the first stage of development. Add to these our winters of gentle spring and our summers without enervating heat, making possible a maximum production per employee, and one may read the future of California among manufacturing States.

The great harbor of San Francisco is still open to the commerce of the world, and this connecting link between America and the expanding interests of the Orient, Alaska, and the islands of the Pacific has no less value than before the day of the disaster. The great steamship wharves of San Francisco are intact and so are the two great transcontinental railways, the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe. The three lines of the Southern Pacific report no diminution in freight or passenger business, not even around the bay of San Francisco, and equally cheering are the advices from the Santa Fe. The third transcontinental line to San Francisco, now building, the Western Pacific, is unaffected by the recent trouble and is going steadily on with its work.

California's markets are all the continents and islands of the earth. Our thirty-five thousand cars of apples, peaches, prunes, pears, plums, walnuts, olives, grapes, raisins and wines; our thirty thousand carloads of lumber, shipped by land and sea; our trainloads of sugar, vegetables and all the multitude of products of our favored soil command that same world-wide market that they have in past years.

Our universities at Berkeley and Palo Alto are not crippled; our schools, from primary schools to high schools, in their buildings, their equipment and the high class of instructors the salaries paid command, offer now as heretofore, the greatest possible inducement to home-seekers desiring the freest avenues for their children towards highest citizenship. California remains, as California always has been, "The Land of Opportunity."

There have been those who by their lurid and wild accounts of thousands dead and dying in the streets; half the city shaken down by earthquakes; the tales of wanton murder and plunder by the California National Guard; stories of stretches of the water-front engulfed in the sea and of deep subsidences of valleys and seashore; of buildings toppling into the ocean, and of yawning chasms swallowing countrysides, made the people of California smile. Let me again say the city of San Francisco is burned but not shaken down by the earthquake shock. Above all other misfortunes, this story of San Francisco destroyed by earthquake is the one most deeply resented by our people and the one most apt to injure us.

It is officially announced that the following graduates of Yale have received the nomination by twenty-five or more graduate electors to the vacancy in the Yale corporation caused by the expiration of the term of Chauncey M. Depew: Charles T. Catlin, Brooklyn N. Y., and Chauncey M. Depew of New York city, both of the class of 1836; Allen W. Evarts of New York and Gardiner Lathrop of Kansas City, Mo., both of the class of 1869; Otto T. Bannard, New York, class of 1876; William H. Taft, Washington, class of 1878; Gifford Pinchot, Washington, class of 1889; Herbert Parsons, New York, class of 1890, and Edward S. Harkness, New York, class of 1897. Of the above Messrs. Depew, Evarts, Lathrop, Bannard, Pinchot, Parsons and Harkness have declined to stand as candidates, leaving as candidates Mr. Catlin of Brooklyn and Secretary of War William H. Taft. The election will be on June 26.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

In a small town in California a new hospital has recently been erected on Salsipuedes street, and the Board of Directors in lieu of something better, suggested that the hospital bear the name of the street. One more cautious than the rest suggested that it would be well to know the meaning of such a name before making indiscriminate use of it, and it is to this man that the present success of the hospital is due, for on finding that Salsipuedes meant "get out if you can," the name was hastily changed to something less suggestive of "who enters here, leaves hope behind."

The recent earthquake brings to mind the similar disaster in Charleston twenty years ago, when among other supplications for Divine succor, that of a negro preacher bears recording. With his eyes turned towards heaven, and hands clasped reverently, he made the following petition: "Oh Gawd! you hab seen fit to visit us with dis affliction, and now we ask you to come an' help us; come you'self, an' doan't sen' you Son, for dis ain't no child's play."

A curious real estate transaction after the earthquake of 1868 was the transfer of the land adjoining the Palace Hotel site. It is told by one who calls himself "A Friend of Ralston and Woodworth," and it runs thus:

In 1866 the Grand Hotel site was owned by Commodore Selim Woodworth, U. S. N., and the Lock heirs. Selim Woodworth owned the larger part and refused to sell it for less than $350,000.

The morning after the great earthquake of October, 1868, Selim Woodworth met Harpending in front of the Bank of California and said: "I want to sell you my Market street property. I am going away and do not intend to return to San Francisco." Harpending offered him $150,000 for it. "Sold," Woodworth said, "but I have no time to give you the deed, because I am leaving now; but come with me into the Bank of California and W. C. Ralston will go on my bond. I will sign the deed if you will send it to me to Rome." The bond was given and Woodworth departed, and in a few days the deed followed Woodworth to Rome.

Real estate had been booming, but the earthquake had "knocked the boom silly." However, before the deed reached Rome the boom started again and the sales were at least 20 per cent higher than ever before. Woodworth's friends informed him by telegraph, and wanted him to hold his property at a higher price.

In due time Judge Crockett, Woodworth's attorney, appeared. Crockett insisted that Woodworth should receive $200,000. Harpending positively refused, and Ralston said, "Very well; I'll give my own check for $50,000 more," which he did, and handed the check to Crockett, who immediately produced the deed to Harpending, executed before the American Minister at Rome, for $150,000. The deed was recorded here, with that amount as the consideration, while Woodworth received $200,000.

Woodworth was honorable, Ralston was more so, but that was Ralston's way.

The late John Hay some years ago sent to Alexander Gunn of Cleveland for his perusal the manuscript of an interesting bit of work by Mark Twain, entitled, "A Conversation as it was at the Social Fireside in the time of the Tudors." Mr. Hay knew that his friend Gunn, a connoisseur of literature and art, would be much interested in what the former termed a "serious effort to bring back our literature and philosophy to the chaste Elizabethan standard." Mr. Gunn was so delighted with Twain's sketch that he wrote to Mr. Hay proposing to print a limited number of copies thereof for private distribution. It is said that Mr. Hay replied as follows: "The proposition you make to pull a few proofs of Twain's masterpiece is highly attractive, and, of course, highly immoral. I cannot properly consent to the suggestion, as I am afraid the great man would think I was taking an unfair advantage of his confidence. Accordingly, I will thank you to send back the manuscript as soon as possible; but if, in spite of my prohibition, you take those proofs, save me one." It were superfluous to add that, with this hint, the proofs were "pulled"—one for Mr. Hay and one for Mr. Gunn.

John A. Boyle of Newton took part in the civil war, and liked to tell about his experiences. At a meeting one evening he told the following incident which he said took place at the battle of Bull Run:

"I saw the men drop their guns and run, so I dropped mine and ran, too, but I was chased by one of the enemy, who had his gun in his hand. I ran the fellow a good race for two miles, and then I stumbled and fell, and was expecting him to come up and shoot me. He didn't come, so I looked around to see where he was, and to my surprise saw him sprawled out on the ground about two yards from me. I got up and looked at him, and saw that he had died from apoplexy."

Boyle's hearers asked what he did next, and he replied: "I wept for the man that I had run to death."

"My son," said the strict mother, at the end of a moral lecture, "I want you to be exceedingly careful about your conduct. Never, under any circumstances, do anything which you would be ashamed to have the whole world see you doing."

The small boy turned a handspring with a whoop of delight.

"What in the world is the matter with you? Are you crazy?" demanded the mother.

"No'm," was the answer. "I'm jes' so glad that you don't spec' me to take no baths never any more!"

One day during an examination a keen-eyed teacher observed one of his pupils take out his watch every minute or two. The pedagogue grew suspicious. Finally he strode slowly down the aisle and stopped in front of Willie's desk. "Let me see your watch," he commanded.

"Yes, sir," was the meek reply.

The teacher opened the front of the case. He looked somewhat sheepish when he read the single word, "Fooled." But he was a shrewd man. He was not to be thrown off the scent so easily. He opened the back of the case. Then he was satisfied. There he read, "Fooled again."

John Burroughs tells these anecdotes of the President in camp:

The Rough Riders, wherever they happen to be, look to President Roosevelt in time of trouble. One who had come to grief in Arizona was in jail. So he wrote the President, and his letter ran something like this:

Dear Colonel: I am in trouble. I shot a lady in the eye, but I did not intend to hit the lady; I was shooting at my wife."

And the presidential laughter rang out over the treetops. To another Rough Rider, who was in jail, accused of horse stealing, he had loaned two hundred dollars to pay counsel on his trial, and, to his surprise, in due time the money came back. The ex-Rough Rider wrote that his trial never came off. "We elected our district attorney," and the laughter again sounded and drowned the noise of the brook near by.

A Denver teacher showed the children a copy of Millet's familiar picture, "The Angelus," and after a full discussion asked them to write the story told by the picture.

The following was the production of one ten-year-old boy:

"It's a man and a lady a-pickin' potatoes. The 6 o'clock whistle blew and they quit."

In his "Story of My Life," Augustus J. C. Hare says that one Friday Cardinal Wiseman was invited by Miss Thurlow to dine with some friends of hers, who had quite forgotten to provide a fast-day dinner. However, the cardinal was quite equal to the occasion, for he stretched out his hands in benediction over the table, and said: "I pronounce all this to be fish," and forthwith enjoyed all the good things heartily.

The forty-year-old Montgomery block in San Francisco escaped unscathed from the fire that devastated the surrounding property, and that fact saved to the Sutro heirs 125,000 volumes, or one-half of the library of Adolph Sutro. After the death of Sutro the library was placed in storage, the heirs being undetermined as to what disposition to make of it. One portion, which was stored in a warehouse on Battery street, was destroyed. Among the other rare volumes contained in the portion saved were early quarto editions of Shakespeare, a collection of misprint Bibles, the first folio edition of Ben Jonson's works, and a priceless collection of pamphlets on the Civil War and the Revolutionary War. Contained among the books that were destroyed were 4000 "black letter" parchment volumes, written by monks, and dating from the second and third centuries up to the time of the invention of printing.

"Young Wife" writes: "I am very fond of reading advice to newly married folk. Recently I saw a hint that every husband is gratified if he finds his slippers ready warmed for him when he comes home of an evening. Please advise me as to the proper way to warm slippers." To her the Minneapolis Tribune gives this sage advice: Go to the cellar and get a hod of coal. You should have a slow fire going in the kitchen range during the afternoon. Rake the coals down to a level bed and pour in the hod of coal, and open the draughts. When the stovepipe shows red to the ceiling, and the top of the range is a cream yellow, and is so hot that a drop of water will evaporate when within two inches of the surface, close the damper and wait until the range cools down to 365 degrees Fahrenheit. If you have no thermometer, borrow one from the neighbor. (It is a small courtesy, but one that will be appreciated, if you suggest to your neighbor to bring her husband's slippers over and warm them on your range.) Put the slippers in the oven, close the door, and go through the house, singing merrily to yourself. From time to time look at the slippers, turning them occasionally so that the heat may reach all sides of them. They are well warmed when the toes begin to curl. When this occurs place them on the back of the range, covering them with a boiler lid. This will retain the heat. When you hear your husband coming up the steps take up the slippers on a toasting fork and carry them to his den. Some practical housewives garnish them with parsley, but this is a matter of choice.

A remarkable incident occurred at the dinner given May 16 by the officers' corps to Lieutenant-General von Mitzlaff, the retiring chief of the army riding school. Towards the end of the dinner, which took place on the second floor of the officers' casino, von Mitzlaff stepped out of the building and soon afterward reappeared in the dining-room mounted on his favorite charger and accompanied by a pack of hounds and made his final discourse on horsemanship from the saddle. Then, with a huntsman "halloo" to the hounds, which scampered away, the General rode down stairs after them and reached the courtyard without a mishap.

Admiral Cervera thus wrote to an American friend about our disaster in San Francisco: "It is with the greatest affliction of spirit that I have read in the papers of the awful catastrophe which occurred in America to the city of San Francisco. I beg to extend, through you, to all your countrymen, the victims of this great calamity, my heartfelt sympathy. All the world is stricken with sorrow and prays for their speedy restoration to their former happiness and prosperity."

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe passed her eighty-seventh birthday at her home in Beacon street, Boston last week, in good health, surrounded by her children.

FLEEING FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

The Exodus after the Fire—The Vast Stream of People Hastening to the Ferry—A Motley and Terrible Army.

The scenes at and after the earthquake, the retreat of the city dwellers before the fire—these have been described by many writers. But there is another episode which has been little touched upon, the flight to the ferries after the fire. For days San Francisco was a sealed city—those outside could not get in; those inside could not get out. The city was girt by dead-lines, patrolled by soldiery and vigilantes. These latter killed one unfortunate man who was attempting to enter on an errand of mercy. After six days the embargo was lifted, and the flight began. It is thus graphically pictured by Will G. McRae:

During the three days beginning Monday, April 23, the exodus from ruined San Francisco reached its height. Five days after the earthquake, five days after the greatest of fires had completed the ruin and devastation, the flight began. For days the seemingly endless stream of humanity flowed down Market street, through the huge portals of the big Ferry building, seeking refuge, on the boats, which carried them away from the scene of desolation.

It was a sight terrible to behold, this fleeing army of terror-stricken people: one that will linger long in the mind's eye. The story of that flight will become a legend to be handed down from generation to generation.

For days following the earthquake and fire no one was allowed to leave San Francisco. Only the lucky and resourceful managed to get to the ferry and to Oakland and thence away. Then came the days when the barriers were thrown down and the chance to go away was given to the homeless people of San Francisco. From somewhere came the word that the railroads would carry folks away from the city free of charge, and in a most incredibly short time, from mouth to mouth, the news was passed. Then began the flow of the endless tide of humanity to the ferry.

Over the twisted city streets, over the heaps of broken bricks, tangled wires and debris, scurrying over the still smoldering ruins, darting in and out beneath the tottering walls, welled and widened the hurrying throng. From north, from south, from east, from west they came, heavily laden with personal effects, household bric-a-brac and pets—a seething mass of turbulent, hurrying people, rushing away from the city of horror, death and destruction.

The sight of the fleeing multitude was a spectacle frightful to behold. It was a motley army. Men old and palsied, young men haggard and dust-stained, old women stumbling and tottering over brick and cobblestones, all bearing bundles, which, under rational and sane conditions, they could not have carried a dozen steps. Young women, weeping and sobbing, laughing and calling out in shrill, hysterical tones salutations to passersby; children, like their elders, half clad, filthy from five days without water, their faces horrible from hunger and fright, following pell-mell in the wake of hurrying parents. It was a mob with but one common thought, "We are going away. Let's hurry, hurry, hurry"; a conglomeration of things human and animal, jostling, pushing, shoving, parched of throat and bloodshot of eye.

And through the mass of moving humanity was scattered indiscriminately beauty and ugliness, gentleness and ferocity. Painted women from the underworld—the riffraff of the "Tenderloin," and ladies who a week before had ridden in their carriages, walked shoulder to shoulder and conversed glibly. Caste and social standing were nothing. It was not a time to pick one's company. What you were before the fire mattered not. It was just hurry! hurry! hurry!

It was a confusion made up of everything and everybody. People rode in hearses, in dead wagons, in express wagons, in trucks, automobiles, in carts and vehicles of every kind and description. Baby carriages were laden with furniture, children's wagons were utilized, and when they broke down the wheels were used to convey trunks and hand baggage. Everything that had a semblance of a wheel was put into service. Men and women, even children, were hitched like horses to trunks which were dragged over the rough streets and broken bricks and debris.

Every characteristic known to the human body and mind was on parade. Diseases and deformities erstwhile hidden were now flaunted before the unseeing and unheeding eyes of the crowd. Here was a face on which were written the lines of nameless vices. There was a face expressing stupidity and fear. Some walked as though they were in a trance, blundering into the path of rushing automobiles and under the feet of jaded horses, paying no more attention to the curses and imprecations heaped upon them by the reckless drivers than they did to the noise and turmoil around them.

From the cut at the end of Market street, from all the intersecting streets came the throng. It was a stream of humanity as far as the eye could see. And this crowd was not without its monsters. The powers that prey, those resourceful evildoers whose wits become the keener in such times, were active. The rifle bullet that stopped the hand of many a looter had no terrors for them. They plied their calling unmolested and unnoticed.

The beggar was there, and his twin brother, the street faker; the blind man, his eyeless sockets staring blankly in front. Insane persons mingled with the crowd, as did people afflicted with contagious disease. At the ferry on Tuesday a man stood and was elbowed by the crowd who had escaped from the smallpox hospital. His face was still covered with scales that were falling upon the garments of those who jostled him about. Others were there with half-dressed wounds received during the fire and earthquake, the smell of drugs and of burned flesh still pungent and strong.

At the Oakland mole were similar scenes. There the people were more clamorous. Railroad clerks groaned under the tremendous task of issuing free tickets. That human weakness for getting something for nothing displaced much that was gentle in the people who were getting away from San Francisco. Never was the motto, "Me first, to hell with the rest," more apparent. Soldiers from the Fourteenth Infantry who were ordered from Vancouver, Wash., and an army of railroad employees kept the ever turning and twisting mass moving. In the hurry of getting tickets and getting away, parents forgot their children, wives became separated from husband, sisters from brothers. Above the clanging of bells and hissing steam rose the endless babel of voices, always in the same discordant key, now and then pierced by the wailing cry of a lost child, or the shrill call of a mother seeking her babe.

Everybody had a story to tell of his or her experience. Without invitation they poured their tales of woe into each other's ears. "We lost everything; just saved what clothes we've got on our back," was the preface to a story which began with the rocking of the earth, followed by nights spent in the parks and hours of dreary standing in the bread lines.

Six days after the disaster, I saw a man dressed in an evening coat and waistcoat, opera hat, blue overalls and a pair of logger's boots. He had been one of an opera party Tuesday evening and in the panic all he could find was the upper garments of his evening suit. The overalls and boots he picked up later in his wanderings. The appearance of this man was ludicrous to a degree, yet he did not mind it. I saw him, with his opera hat tilted far back on his head, the bosom of his evening shirt smeared and stained, cooking on the street for half a dozen women refugees. He was a man of means. His bachelor apartments had been in the burned district, and, like hundreds of others, he knew it was no use to worry, and had turned his attention to helping those who were helpless.

Sunday and Sunday night the scenes of the refugee camps over the city resembled very much the scene on Market street on the days of the exodus. Master and man, Christian and Jew, men and women of all nationalities and creeds were huddled together. Prayers were offered in every tongue, some sang hymns, some laughed and chattered like a lot of startled magpies, and until night came the babel continued, rising and falling in a strange, weird chorus of discordant sound with a thousand different accents.—Oregonian.

An English savant, Sir Jonathan Williams, says that the best English is spoken in Kentucky and the Ohio Valley rather than in London or any other part of the British Isles or possessions. Sir Jonathan has traveled through Australia, all of the different counties of England, Ireland and Scotland and through many of the states of the Union, examining the peculiarities of the different pronunciations.

"I have been interested in dialectical English for many years," said Sir Jonathan to a reporter at Chicago. "Your ordinary Englishman of the isles is, above all, dialectical. The same is true of your New Englander. The southlands of America have a drawl which is totally misplaced; the northlands of your country a nasal twang which is a joke to Englishmen. It is only on the middle ground here in America that I have found the true English, the English of Shakespeare and Dr. Johnson, unmixed with dialectical absurdities or with peculiarities of expression. Slang as such I do not find in Kentucky and the neighboring regions along the Ohio and Missouri rivers. Nor were the crudities of your Western Americanism so apparent there. The clipped and halting speech of Scotland comes nearer to the Kentucky English than any I have heard in my investigations. Australia is overlaid with a slang which is worse than the worst of your West. Your East is imitative of Cockneyisms, unnatural and, therefore, un-English. In the island itself the best English is not that of Oxfordshire or of Cambridgeshire, but of Kent and Southern Downs. This, however, does not approach in purity of diction, clearness of enunciation and adhesion to classical forms the English of your Middle West, which is neither your North nor your South, your East nor your West. I have found in the City of Louisville a pronunciation and a use of terms which is nearer, in my mind, to Addison and the English classicists than anything which the counties of England, the provinces of Australia or the marches of Scotland can offer."

After a conference with a number of his friends, Joseph R. Burton of Abilene, Kansas, handed in his resignation as United States Senator to Governor Hoch on Monday. Burton, no doubt, finally came to the conclusion that it were best to resign before the Senate expelled him. On May 22, the formal procedure looking to the expulsion of Senator Burton was set in motion. Mr. Hale, Senator from Maine, offered a resolution directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to examine the legal effect of the decision of the Supreme Court, rendered the previous day against Burton, and to report to the Senate what action, if any, should be taken. This resolution was adopted without a dissenting vote. It was generally assumed that the report would recommend expulsion. It is significant that Senator Hale, the floor leader of the Republican party, offered the resolution. Mr. Bailey, for the Democrats, said some time ago that he would ask that some action be taken as soon as the Supreme Court decision was made. Burton, however, constantly refused to vacate his seat in the Senate, to the no little embarrassment of his Republican associates, who disliked to move against him before his case was decided in the courts. But when Burton saw that he would in all probability be expelled from the Senate, he finally followed the advice of his friends and resigned.

Refuting a statement that the behavior of John Sharp Williams on Cannon's seventieth birthday was open to criticism, the Washington Star (Ind., Rep.) says: "It is to be doubted if the whole history of the House from the beginning shows relations so cordial between Speaker and minority leader as those that exist between Mr. Cannon and Mr. Williams.

"What do you think of the bill I have introduced?" "Well," answered Senator Sorghum, "after the amendments and the Supreme Court's decisions get through with it it ought to make a pretty good sort of a law. But you can't tell."—Washington Star.

VANITY FAIR.

Gorky and His Woman Companion.

It was a very unfortunate beginning that Maxim Gorky made in America. This domestic scandal became so notorious that no high-class hotel in New York would open its doors to Mr. Gorky, while the woman companion remained with him. The manager of the Hotel Belleclaire felt obliged to turn out the Gorky party. Mr. Gorky's ideas concerning matrimony are evidently not the accepted American ideas. But Mr. Wilshire, his American friend, says: "I knew that Gorky was not married to the lady who accompanied him. I thought everybody else knew it. You have to make allowance for genius. I introduced my wife and mother-in-law to Mme. Gorky. I saw nothing wrong in it. . . . I am not narrow. I am liberal in my views." Mark Twain saw at once the serious mistake that had been made. He is a sincere sympathizer with Gorky's revolutionist aims against the Russian government and had been conspicuous among those who had welcomed the Russian novelist to America. As soon as he learned of the two Mrs. Gorkys, he very properly indicated his disapproval of his Russian friend's domestic arrangements, saying: "Every country has its laws of conduct and its customs, and those who visit a country other than their own must expect to conform to the customs of that country." Doubtless Baron Rosen, the Russian Ambassador, would prefer to have the woman companion stay and accompany Mr. Gorky wherever he may go and thus flaunt the fact that the real Mrs. Gorky and her children are at home in Russia,—for the astute Ambassador well knows what the effect would be. Mr. Howells said: "This is too delicate a matter for me to be quoted on. It would never do for me to discuss or criticize this thing one way or another in the public prints."

Similes in Novels.

Mr. Basil Tozer, in the May number of the "Author," protests against the hackneyed similes which prevail in the majority of present-day novels, where, for instance, the young ladies have their hair invariably resembling (1) a raven's wing, (2) burnished copper, (3) burnished gold, with "Cupid's bows" and "dainty shells" doing duty for other features. The matter is undoubtedly urgent, and something must be done to preserve the taste of the romance-reading public. We can but make the sporting offer of a small assortment of figures of speech to the purveyors of this class of literature. Subject to the ordinary wear and tear, they should prove serviceable for the next five publishing seasons at least. We suggest, therefore, that forthcoming heroines should be re-equipped with some of the following embellishments:

Tresses, like (1) the pinion of a rook, (2) peroxide of hydrogen, (3) American "rolled gold."
 Mouth, a la Jew's harp, or Venus's fly-trap.
 Teeth outvying the morbid growths in an oyster-shell.
 Eyes that rival pools of ink, Reckitt's blue, Kentish cobnuts, or dog violets.
 Eyebrows stippled with an artist's hand.
 Ears, like (a) the half of a bivalve, (b) a periwinkle.
 Forehead, smooth as celluloid or a hard-boiled egg.
 Complexion, dazzling as the finest pearl-powder salts of bis-muth.—Punch.

French Books About American Society.

There has been a large harvest in France in the last few months of books on America, the last being the "Impressions of a French Woman in America," by Mlle. Therese Vianzone. The volume is dedicated to Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, and the writer sings her praises without stint. Mlle. Vianzone says that the President's wife affords the greatest possible contrast to her distinguished husband. She found him all force and energy and push, while Mrs. Roosevelt was distinctly the opposite. To the writer the "first woman of America" appeared to be all grace, finesse and diplomacy. The President and his wife, according to Mlle. Vianzone's impressions, supplement each other perfectly and therefore live in the utmost harmony. From beginning to end the volume is a song of gratitude to the American people. The writer found the hospitality of that country unsurpassed both individually and collectively. She goes into personalities with the greatest freedom, and tells just what she thinks of Secretary Bonaparte, Cardinal Gibbons, Julia Ward Howe, the Pierces, Turnbills, Litchfields and McCormicks. The personal characteristics of all these people—and many others—are commented upon most favorably, and little stories of their home life are given to show how charming is their hospitality. The interest in the United States at this time is manifested by the fact that all of the French newspapers highly praise this volume for its accuracy. It is especially commended for its treatment of American hospitality. Some of the most notable of this book's predecessors in recent months concerning American life and things are entitled "Women of America," "American Things," "Letters on America," "American Reflections," "An Empire at Work," "The Other Side of the United States" and "American Impressions."

Plain Feeding in Regal Splendor.

Ambassador Reid's reception to the American women in London last week was a study in contrasts. Dorchester house, a palace of marble, is the most magnificent private residence in all London. Mrs. Reid wore a gown of white satin covered with black lace. Her jewels were three great sapphire and diamond pendants. The flowers that adorned the reception rooms had cost a small fortune. Refreshments were served in one of the large dining-rooms. The regal splendor of this apartment was in the strongest contrast to the plain but wholesome fare which was set before the guests. There was plenty of bread and butter, dozens of currant buns and of scores cut in half and not buttered. Among the guests were Mrs. Potter, the Bishop's wife; Lady Lister-Kaye and Mrs. John W. Mackay. Mrs.

Reid gave her guests better accounts of Miss Jean Reid, who is still in Ireland, where to gain a change of air her father took her to stay with the Countess of Gosford.

Extravagance in English Society.

The late Duchess of Rutland once alleged that the men and women in a Scotch town, where she was staying during the shooting season, ate eleven meals a day. It is, of course, notorious that the chefs in several private houses in England today receive salaries of $4000, $6000, $7500 and, in one case, $10,000, and would think a dinner fit only for a workhouse feast if its material, including fruit and wine, cost much less than $175 or $200 for a score of guests. One young English peeress, whose husband has an income of $1,500,000 a year, was so disgusted with the waste of rich food with which she was confronted in the principal of her new homes that she dismissed the chef and engaged a woman cook for $325 a year, and she now alleges that she, her husband, and her guests are all much better fed for a third the former cost.

Gentlemen Callers in Nebraska.

Separation of the sexes, so far as boarding and rooming houses are concerned, was the order given by E. Benjamin Andrews, chancellor of the University of Nebraska. Male and female students of the university have mingled indiscriminately heretofore, although recently the practice has been frowned upon. The formal order of Chancellor Andrews is as follows:

"The residence of men and women students in the same lodging houses (as distinguished from families) is not approved and not, as a rule, permitted.

"A landlady rooming students is expected to provide for their use until half after ten on Friday and Sunday evenings a reception room properly warmed and lighted. Women students in these houses will receive gentlemen callers only in the reception rooms. Gentlemen will take notice and govern themselves accordingly."

Moccasin Charley's Marriage.

The circumstances preceding and attending the marriage of Moccasin Charley, at Skunk Point, Okla., have not been fully understood (says the Washington Post). Moccasin Charley had been circulating about Skunk Point rather more fluently than seemed advisable in the opinion of the veteran inhabitants. He was known as the "Cowboy Pianist," and had made successful tours in Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska, returning to Skunk Point with considerable money. Wild West clothes—made in Cincinnati—and several six-shooters that were much too shiny for the popular philosophy. Naturally, he wore his hair very long, like Buffalo Bill and Cherokee Jake and the rest of the swells. Likewise, he cultivated a big drooping moustache, which always made the female seminaries up North break out in spots. Charley had just returned from a melodious raid on Kansas. He was wadded all over with money—he hadn't anything else except his usual harness—and he flashed the long green at the Catamount until it amounted to a sin for any one to keep even half-way sober.

"I guess," said Charley, after the eleventh round of Pike's Mag-nolia, "that I'm about the most desperate and fearless thing in the whole chaparral belt. I'll tackle anything that wears fur, hair, horns, or hoofs, and glad of the chance." Then he sat down at the pianer, and played and sang "Lorena," while the gang wept noisily. Moccasin Charley threw back his hair, ordered "pisen" all around, and then broke out into "Where is My Wandering Love To-night?" And just about that time the Widow Kelly bulged into the arena, with eyes aflame and hair in fine frenzy rolling, and she jerked Moccasin Charley off the piano stool and sat upon his heaving chest. There were some incidental remarks on her part relative to liars, betrayers, serpents, and tarantulas. Moreover, she fished from the deep Charybdis of her petticoat a pair of shears, and took his hair off till he looked like Rockefeller. Then they were married out of hand by a red-nosed gentleman in black, who had kept quiet and consoled himself with heeltaps during the excitement. And this is the true and full history of Moccasin Charley's untimely nuptials.

Perfumed and Musical Motor Cars.

The automobile world hails with great satisfaction the report that Mme. Hengelmuller, wife of Emperor Franz Joseph's Ambassador to the United States, has discovered a way not only to get rid of the vile smell that accompanies gasoline motors, but to substitute therefor "a delicious and ineffable scent like unto myrrh and incense." As one of the belles dames of France recently said: "Think of flying along the roads in an intoxication of speed and perfume! And then we may vary odors. One may have a 12-horsepower machine in simple violet, a 24-horsepower machine in double violet, a 36-horsepower in amaryllis de Japon and a 40-horsepower in jardin du couvent. The highways will hereafter be as sweet as sachet hags." And now the inventors are reported as seriously at work on motors that will play the finest quality of orchestral music as they skim along. "Next year," said the fair Parisienne above quoted, "I expect to take a Wagnerian cure at Baireuth in an automobile that will play en route a complete repertory of Offenbach."

Pope and King.

As a sequel to the presence of the four Cardinals at the dinner given by American Ambassador White, in honor of Archbishop Ireland, April 25, Cardinal Oreglia, dean of the Sacred College, who, by virtue of his rank is entitled to direct matters of ceremony among his brother Cardinals, has written a letter to each of the four Cardinals, Vincenzo, Vannutelli, Santoli, Mathieu and Martinelli, asking them for an explanation of their presence at a function given by a diplomat accredited to the King of Italy instead of the Pope. Some of the offending Cardinals have replied to the letter, but at least one has not done so. On May 8, at the instigation of Cardinal Oreglia, all Cardinals living in Rome received a circular note recalling to their attention the propriety of observing the rules regarding their relations with personages connected with the Italian Court.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Secretary Taft, who has just been visiting New Haven, recovered the huge cane, while there, that he carried while attending Yale College. It was in the possession of Mrs. George H. Hotchkiss.

The recent and serious attack of gout experienced by the Pope has caused a fear to be felt in Vatican circles that the time may not be far distant when it will be necessary to hold a new conclave. When he was elected at the last conclave, scarcely three years ago, Pius X enjoyed robust health.

William J. Bryan was endorsed for President on May 22 by the Democratic Judicial Convention of sixteen counties of northwestern Ohio. The resolutions, which were adopted with cheers, declare that Bryan would have been renominated and elected in 1904 had the trusts not stolen the nomination from him, and that the National Democracy will nominate him in 1908 by acclamation.

The most interesting figure at the ceremony of laying the cornerstone of the United States Engineering Building, was Charles Hayes Haswell. Though ninety-seven years old he is still in the active practice of his profession. Mr. Haswell was the first chief engineer and engineer-in-chief of the United States Navy, and designed and operated the first steam launch.

Some people who called on President Roosevelt recently asked him what he thought of the bitter feeling that had grown out of the allegations of Senators Bailey and Tillman and ex-Senator Chandler. The President's response was that hereafter there were certain Senators and representatives of Senators whom he should always see in the presence of a stenographer. "I hope," he added, "that they will cease caterwauling and pass that rate bill."

Sergius Witte has stepped down from the Russian premiership and M. Goremykin has taken his place. Goremykin's enmity for Witte has been lively since 1899, when Witte, then Minister of Finance, convicted Goremykin, who was Minister of the Interior, of having deceived the Emperor in denying the prevalence of famine in certain provinces. The new premier owns large dairy farms in Novgorod province and sells most of the milk used in St. Petersburg.

In New York recently H. Gaylord Wilshire gave a remarkable dinner to meet the Russian Maxim Gorky. Among his guests were H. G. Wells, the English novelist and scientist, who is also a Socialist; Prof. Franklin Giddings, and Arthur Brisbane, the editor of the Hearst newspapers. "Wilshire's Magazine has now reached a circulation of 310,000 copies a month, a pinnacle of success which none of his friends ever believed he could reach," says the Los Angeles Graphic.

Richard Croker keeps in close touch with American affairs through the newspapers or constant visitors from New York. He said to a visitor a few days ago: "I think Roosevelt is bound to be re-nominated and re-elected. His actions show he is more in the fight today than he ever was. Nothing can get him out of it. If opposition arises to him in the Republican party I should, if I were at home, favor his nomination by the Democratic National Convention, as the situation stands today."

Representative Charles Beary Landis of Indiana, who made a "stand-pat" tariff speech one afternoon in the House, exclaimed with great declamatory effect: "Four members of the Landis family met their death on Southern battle-fields." "Yes," said John Sharp Williams, "but four of them remain to serve their country in offices of public trust." And everybody laughed, for two Landises are members of Congress, one is a Federal Judge in Chicago, and one is Director of Posts in Porto Rico.

Former Chief Engineer John F. Wallace, of the Isthmian Canal, writes to the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, in reply to Secretary Taft's recent testimony before that committee. Mr. Wallace charges Secretary Taft with having abused his official position in order to make a second assault upon him and to place in a public record statements "calculated and apparently intended to affect my reputation for veracity, such as he would not make to me as one man to another, face to face."

Major Frank P. Fremont, of the Fifth Infantry, who is a son of General John C. Fremont, has filed a petition in bankruptcy, with liabilities of $11,297 and cash assets of $23. The debts were contracted in New York City, Plattsburg, Mobile, Washington, D. C., and San Francisco, principally for borrowed money for notes. Among the creditors is the Anglo-Californian National Bank of San Francisco, $400, for money loaned on notes. Major Fremont was appointed to the Military Academy at West Point from Arizona.

In forty-three years Edward Payson Weston has accomplished eight notable feats in pedestrianism and not a few smaller ones. His just-completed task of walking from Philadelphia to New York, at the age of sixty-eight, in less time than he took to cover the same course in 1863, is a performance in a class by itself. In 1867 Mr. Weston walked from Portland, Me., to Chicago, about 1500 miles, in twenty-five days. In 1874 he walked 500 miles in six days, and five years later he added fifty miles to that record, winning the Astley belt. In 1879, too, he tramped 5000 miles in a hundred days.

Reports of the purchase of the Krupp Iron Works by the German Government find support in the fact that Fraulein Bertha Krupp, the world's richest woman, who owns a controlling interest in the concern, which in 1900 was capitalized at 160,000,000 marks ($40,000,000), has announced her engagement—not to a technical man, as long anticipated, but to a young diplomat of no business experience, Gustave von Bohlen und Halbach, Secretary of the Prussian Legation at the Vatican. Since her father's death Emperor William has been her matrimonial adviser. It is believed by thousands that Miss Krupp's father, whose funeral was held in November, 1902, did not die at all, but is alive and hiding in a distant clime to avoid the disgrace incident to a hideous scandal.

THE ALLEGED HUMORIST.

Mrs. Malaprop—"My husband is just crazy since the fishin' season opened. He can't think or talk of anything else." Mrs. Browne—"Fond of angling, is he?" Mrs. Malaprop—"I should say so. He's a reg'lar anglomaniac."—Philadelphia Press.

The advertising manager was in a towering rage. "What's the trouble?" they asked. "Why, they went and placed our prima donna's testimonial for a cold cure on the same page with the announcement that she had a sore throat and couldn't sing."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Mr. Gotrox—"Suppose I were to tell you that I was bankrupt—that every dollar of my fortune had been swept away—would you still be willing to marry my daughter?" Cholly Softy (enthusiastically)—"Why, of course I would! Such a man as you could easily pitch in and make another fortune, sir."—Judge.

"I see that trials by 'phone have been pronounced illegal." "Glad of it. I've been severely tried by mine."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"You are taking a great deal of interest in this investigation." "Yes," answered the Statesman. "I have to give it close personal attention. I want to make sure it doesn't develop anything I don't care to have known."—Washington Star.

"Does your rheumatism bother you much?" "I should say it did. Every idiot I meet asks questions about it."—Cleveland Leader.

Grace—"I hear that Charlie and Helen have made up their quarrel." Gussie—"Only temporarily. They are going to be married soon."—Chicago Daily News.

"He introduced the bill in the legislature, you know." "The bill. What bill?" "Why, the bill. Before his time the grafters were mostly reckless fellows and used checks."—Puck.

First Politician's Wife—"My husband gives me every cent he earns." Second Politician's Wife—"Is that all? Why, my husband gives me every cent he gets."—Judge.

The Man (in street car)—"Take my seat, madam." The Woman—"Thank you, but I also get out at the next corner."—Chicago Daily News.

The Lender—"All right, I'll lend you $5, but don't forget that you owe it to me." The Borrower—"My dear fellow, I shall never forget it as long as I live."—Brooklyn Life.

Maud—"Mr. Wappington asked me for three dances last night." May—"Yes, he told me that he felt it his duty to make a sacrifice of some kind before Lent was ended."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"That man is so honest he wouldn't steal a pin," said the admiring friend. "I never thought much of the pin test," answered Miss Cayenne. "Try him with an umbrella."—Washington Star.

The friend—"There'll be something in the case for you, I suppose?" The Lawyer—"This isn't exactly professional, but I'm free to observe that there'll be nothing in it for anybody else."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"Can't I sell you a painless corn cure, madam?" said the peddler. "No, you can't!" snapped the woman of the house. "I have no painless corns." Then the door was shut with a sudden slam.—Chicago Tribune.

"What is your opinion on this question?" asked the friend. "Let us understand each other," rejoined Senator Sorghum; "do you want my opinion or do you want to know how I am going to vote."—Washington Star.

"Oh, that mine enemy would write a book!" I cried. And straightway he did—a cook book.—Philadelphia Record.

Nell—"I really believe she married him for his money." Belle—"Well, eliminate his money, and what else would there be of him?"—Philadelphia Record.

"Say, doesn't our Congressman do anything but draw his salary?" "Oh, yes." "What?" "He spends it."—Cleveland Leader.

First tramp—"Says in this 'ere paper as 'ow some of them millionaires works eight and ten hours a day, Bill." The Philosopher—"Ah, it's a 'ard world for some poor blokes!"—Punch.

The Wife—"He told me that if I married him my every wish would be gratified." The Mother—"Well, is it not so?" The Wife—"No, I wish I hadn't married him."—Cleveland Leader.

"The vote that I esteem," said the statesman, "is the vote that is not bought." "Yes," answered Senator Sorghum; "you can figure that as clear profit."—Washington Star.

"Rimer takes himself very seriously, doesn't he?" "Yes, indeed." "Most of his poetry is pathetic, isn't it?" "That's what he calls it, but the editors say it's pitiful."—Philadelphia Press.

"Are you ready to live on my income?" he asked softly. She looked up into his face, trustingly. "Certainly, dearest," she answered, "if—if—" "If what?" "If you can get another one for yourself."—Judge.

"Fie, fie! my boy," said old Mr. Goodley. "I'm surprised that you should tease that cat in that way." "Why?" asked the bad boy pausing in his inhuman work, "do yer know any better way."—Philadelphia Press.

"Our John's goin' to be a preacher, I guess," said Farmer Korn-top, "judging from what his college professor sez about him." "What's that?" asked his wife. "He sez he's inclined to be bibulous."—Philadelphia Ledger.

The Baron—"The Duke is but little better than a common tradesman." The Prince—"Ah?" "Yes. He actually solicits marriage with hejresses instead of waiting for them or their mothers to approach him on the subject."—Brooklyn Life.

STANDARD FORM FOR PROOFS OF LOSS.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

A Recollection.

(With Apologies to an Old Favorite.)
I remember, I remember the flat where
I was born,
The little window where the sun came peeping in at morn;
Until the maid of all work pulled down
the window shade
And shut out all the sunshine for fear
the rug would fade.

I remember, I remember the gas lamp
in the hall
That sometimes burned till 12 o'clock and sometimes not at all:
'Twas just a little flicker in all that waste of gloom,
Like someone with a candle illuminating Doom.

I remember, I remember that things both great and small
Were made to fold up into some recess
in the wall;
The bathtub was in sections, and when the bath was o'er
It folded up and fitted a panel in the door.

I remember, I remember the meters
everywhere,
A meter for the sunshine, a meter for
the air,
For heat and gas and water, in every sink and tub,
We had the metric system for everything but grub.

I remember, I remember the furniture
we had,
A grand piano that became a folding-bed for Dad;
The sofa was a clothes-press, the day-
enport a trunk,
The hall clock was a swindle that collapsed into a bunk.

I remember, I remember that I sat on Mother's knee,
There was no nook or cranny that she could find for me;
And also I remember that we moved soon after that—
Our landlord would not let us have children in the flat.

To My Laundress.

My collar is quaintly serrated,
In shreds is the shirt underneath,
My cuffs are so deftly dentated
You'd take them for trimmings of teeth;
Stiffly starched is my evening choker,
My handkerchief's blemished with blue,
And the reason, oh reasonless joker,
My Laundress, is—you!

A philosophy firmer than Plato's
Would falter and fail at the sight
Of my linen like souffled potatoes
And all the good garments you blight.
Can you marvel, O ghoul, that I'm madened
When barely a month has gone by Since the gloss of their novelty glad-dened
My glistening eye?

If I stole from a stately collection
And sent you a sult of plate mail,
Would its coming occasion dejection,
Would armor against you avail?
Or with joy would you prance half demented,
And proudly proceed to display
How the steel hasn't yet been invented
That you couldn't fray?

If I dressed as the Daughters of Dawn dress
(Dear dreams clad in dewdrops and mist)

Should I dodge you, demoniac Laund-
ress,
Or, would you, remorseless, insist
That my dimly diaphanous raiment
Should visit you every week

To endure, for preposterous payment,
The vengeance you wreak?

Now, it may be you're sent as a scourge for
The many misdeeds of mankind;
In the havoc I'm droning this dirge for
Our penance we mortals may find;
But the view that I favor is prosier:
You're just a paid agent of Trade,
You're in lucrative league with my hosler,
Oh, infamous jade.

A Fish's Hornpipe.

As I was wandering alone
Along the wave-washed dunes,
I heard eleven fiddler crabs
A-playing pleasant tunes.
All in a row with each his how,
As merry as could be,
A fish's hornpipe they composed
Beside the sounding sea.

And as they squeaked and twanged and tweaked
The waves began to prance,
As all the folk of Ocean came
To join the merry dance.
The northern seal he took the eel
For his cotillon set,
And every minnow seized a fin
And danced a minnow-et.

The dolphin and the walrus grand
They made a graceful pair—
But, faith, it was the octopus
Drove others to despair!
For with his charms of many arms
His dancing was sublime,
As right among the rest he swung
Eight mermaids at a time.

A portly whale stood on his tail
And said: "Miss Anchovy,
I do declare, we're quite a pair!
Please, won't you dance with me?"
Whereat a shrimp grew pale and limp
Because a swordfish cruel
Had quarreled about a pretty trout
And wished to fight a duel.

At this the gentle fiddler crabs
Were filled with great dismay,
So each one packed his violin
And bowed and went his way;
The little fishes hurried off
In violent alarm;
But the merry octopus went home
With a mermaid on each arm.

LITERARY NOTES.

Jack London's Letter Denying Plagiarism.

If any reader has recently seen printed charges of plagiarism made against Jack London—which we have not—and if anybody believes him to be capable of plagiarism—which we do not—here is a letter which he has written to S. S. McClure concerning these charges:

April 10, 1906.

Dear Mr. McClure: In reply to yours of April 3. Life is so short and people so silly, that from the very beginning of my career, when I first began to get newspaper notoriety because of my youthful socialism, I made it a point to deny nothing charged against me in the newspapers. On the other hand, I have made it a courtesy to deny such things when requested to do so by my friends. Wherefore, because of your request, I am now making this explanation of the similarity between my "Love of Life" and Augustus Bridle's and J. K. MacDonald's "Lost in the Land of the Midnight Sun."

It is a common practice of authors to draw material for their stories from the newspapers. Here are facts of life reported in journalistic style, waiting to be made into literature. So common is this practice that often amusing consequences are caused by several writers utilizing the same material. Some years ago, while I was in England a story of mine was published in the San Francisco Argonaut. In the Century of the same date was published a story by Frank Norris. While these two stories were quite different in manner of treatment, they were patently the same in foundation and motive. At once the newspapers paralleled our stories. The explanation was simple: Norris and I had read the same newspaper account, and proceeded to exploit it. But the fun did not stop there. Somebody dug up a Black Cat published a year previous, in which was a similar story by another man who used the same foundation and motive. Then Chicago hustled around and resurrected a story that had been published some months before the Black Cat story, and that was the same in foundation and motive. Of course, all these different writers had chanced upon the same newspaper article.

So common is this practice of authors, that it is recommended by all the instructors in the art of the short story, to read the newspapers and magazines in order to get material. Charles Reade swore by this practice. I might name a lengthy list of the great writers who have advised this practice.

All the foregoing merely to show that this practice exists and is generally employed by story-writers. Now to the "Love of Life," which the New York World so generously paralleled with "Lost in the Land of the Midnight Sun." "Lost in the Land of the Midnight Sun" is not a story. It is a narrative of fact. It was published in McClure's Magazine. It tells of the actual sufferings of a man with a sprained ankle in the country of the Coppermine River. It is not fiction, and it is not literature. I took the facts of life contained in it, added to them many other facts of life gained from other sources, and made, or attempted to make, a piece of literature out of them. There was another narrative of suffering that I used quite as extensively as I did "Lost in the Land of the Midnight Sun." This other narrative was a newspaper account of a lost and wandering prospector near Nome, Alaska. On top of this, I drew upon all my own personal experience of hardship and suffering and starvation, and upon the whole fund of knowledge I had of the hardship and suffering and starvation of hundreds and thousands of other men.

If you will turn to the end of my "Love of Life" you will find that my rescued hero becomes suddenly fat. This abrupt obesity was caused by his stuffing under his shirt all the spare hardtack he could beg from the sailors. Now I did not invent him. It is a fact of life. You will find it in Lieutenant Greely's narrative of the Greely Polar expedition. I scarcely see how I could be charged with plagiarizing from Lieutenant Greely; and yet if I plagiarized from Augustus Bridle and J. K. MacDonald for some of my material, I must have plagiarized from Lieutenant Greely for some more of my material, and I must have plagiarized from the newspaper correspondent who described the wanderings of the Nome prospector, and I must have plagiarized from the experiences of scores and scores of Alaskan prospectors whose accounts I have heard from their own lips.

The World, however, did not charge me with plagiarism. It charged me with identity of time and situation. Certainly the World is right. I plead guilty, and I am glad that the World was intelligent enough not to charge me with identity of language.

But little remains to be said. It might be well to explain how that half-page of deadly parallel was published in the World. In the first place, Sensation is the goods demanded by a newspaper of its space-writers. The suggestion of plagiarism is certainly suggested. The loose meaning of words in the average mind would make ninety per cent of the readers of such a parallel infer that plagiarism had been charged.

Secondly, the space-writer writes for a living. I hope for his own soul's sake that this particular space-writer also writes for his living. His newspaper wanted the goods of sensation, and by refusing to charge plagiarism, while leaving the inference of plagiarism to the reader, this space-writer sold half a page to the World.

In conclusion, I, in the course of making my living by turning journalism into literature, used material from various sources which had been collected and narrated by men who had made their living by turning the facts of life into journalism. Along comes the space-writer of the World who makes his living by turning the doings of other men into sensation. Well, all three of us made our living; and who's got any kick coming?

Sincerely yours,

JACK LONDON.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Paul Elder and Company's San Francisco retail store will be located on Van Ness avenue, corner of Bush street. They have secured plans for an attractive building. Their publishing business, however, owing to the entire loss of their manufacturing facilities, will be moved at once to New York city to enable them to reprint and bring out their new publications for the fall season. This move will doubtless be permanent, as the difficulties of working so far from the natural publishing center were always found to be a great handicap. Their new title pages therefore will be imprinted "San Francisco and New York."

Paul Elder and Company announce the immediate publication of a work on the San Francisco disaster by Charles Keeler. Mr. Keeler took active part in the relief work and stayed through all the days of the conflagration and first reorganization.

The publishers have secured rights to a number of copyright photographs, and will illustrate the book with a series of plates showing the results of the earthquake, the burning city, the ruins, the relief work and reorganization. Several are from the famous Pillsbury series, and others are by such artists as Oscar Maurer, O. V. Lange and H. S. Hooper.

The book was undertaken by the publishers to serve as an evidence that facilities for good book work still remain in the San Francisco bay region. They confess, however, to many "amusing" difficulties in the process of manufacture, and the completion of the edition will be greeted with relief.

Very notable editorials are those written by Arthur Brisbane for the Hearst papers. Mr. Brisbane is probably the highest paid editor in the world; he is a graduate of one of the leading institutions of learning, and yet keeps in touch and in close sympathy with the masses of the people; a man who is a radical of radicals and a democrat to the core. There is probably no man writing in America today who has a wider and more sympathetic constituency than Arthur Brisbane. The announcement that the editorials in the Hearst papers are published in book form has resulted in a spontaneous subscription by people all over the country.—Oakland Enquirer.

Mrs. C. N. Williamson had intended, on leaving America, to head for Japan in search of novel scenery for a motor-car story. To a friend's inquiry about that plan, Mrs. Williamson answers from Cape St. Martin: "I have such a growing disgust for that big, wet, gray thing, the sea, that I 'funk' Japan: so we will—I suppose—spend our summer in England, and perhaps go to Venice for next September and part of October, till it's time to come back here."

John T. McCutcheon, sailed the other day for Constantinople, then through Odessa, Tiflis, the Caucasus mountains, the Caspian Sea, Myrrb and Andjan, and then by caravan to China, whence a thousand miles' journey northward takes him into Siberia, to proceed either east or west—which he has not yet decided—on the Trans-Siberian Railway. The trip is not for any newspaper; it's a pleasure trip pure and simple.

In the biographical study of Alphonse Daudet, by Robert Sherard, is found the following description of the novelist's methods of working, as they were related by himself to the writer: "I write slowly, very slowly, and revise and revise. My books go through many processes. To begin with, I fill my note books. From these written notes and my memory I write out in copybooks the first copy of my novel. I write this first copy on alternate pages of my copybooks and leave the opposite sheet blank. When the book is finished in its rough state I rewrite it page by page on the blank sheets. The page on the right hand is the amended copy of the page on the left. Then my wife looks at this second copy and suggests to me what improvements might be made. I note these down. Then I rewrite the whole book again with the joy of a school boy who feels that a wearisome task is ended."

Owen Seaman has succeeded to the position of editor of London's famous comic weekly, "Punch," left vacant by the resignation of Sir Francis C. Burnand. The retiring editor is the author of more than 120 plays, chiefly burlesques and light comedies, and has written also a number of books. Now the admirable parodist, Owen Seaman, takes the head of the table. By the way, his engagement to Ethel Barrymore has just been declared off.

WILLS AND SUCCESSIONS.

Suit was brought in San Francisco on June 4 against the estate of the late Jane Stanford for $608,000 by Annie L. Stanford, a daughter of Asa Stanford, a brother of Senator Leland Stanford. The complaint alleges that Leland Stanford, many years ago, secured possession of the shares of stock owned by his brother in the Central Pacific Railroad, amounting to one-sixth of the capital stock, agreeing to pay the brother the sum of $1000 a month, and that upon his death the brother would receive a sufficient amount of shares to make up $500,000.

The daughter of Asa Stanford alleges in her complaint that after the death of Leland Stanford her aunt, Mrs. Stanford, and Attorney Russell J. Wilson prevented her father from coming into the possession of the $500,000 worth of property, and also refused to pay the $1,000 a month allowance. She states that Leland Stanford had placed the $500,000 worth of Central Pacific stock in the safe deposit vault, with the direction on the envelope that it be delivered to his brother Asa upon his death. The complaint alleges that the late Mrs. Stanford, by fraud, secured the shares and ever afterwards kept possession of them.

It is stated in the complaint that Asa Stanford, when he was seventy-seven years of age, was compelled to sign a document against his will, releasing the Stanford estate from all liability so far as the agreement of the Stanford brothers was concerned. The consideration given Asa Stanford was $10,000.

The daughter, in suing, alleges that this compromise was fraudulently obtained and is not binding by law. She, therefore, asks that the courts give her not only the $500,000, but also $108,000, representing the monthly allowance and interest.

Bartlett Doe, of 2002 Laguna street, who died April 18th, was 85 years old and was possessed of a large estate. The estate, before the destruction of many buildings by the fire, was worth about $2,000,000. Doe also had a large amount of personal property. There was real estate on Market near Spear, Brannan and Ninth, Kearny near Sutter, Sutter near Kearny, and much other property. The bequests, were, mainly to nephews, nieces and charities without respect to denominational lines. To his brother, Charles F. Doe (since deceased) is devised much real estate. Suits have been filed in partition by certain of the heirs, the property having been kept intact by the three brothers Doe—John, Charles and Bartlett—all of whom are now dead. One of them, John, was married and had a daughter, Mary Margaret, now about 15 years old, and heirless to perhaps $1,000,000. Mrs. Doe became Mrs. Stetson. The three Doe brothers came here from Maine and embarked in the lumber business, becoming very wealthy.

A few days before the fire the Southern Pacific Company offered $800,000 for the block of land bounded by Third, Fourth, King and Berry streets. The offer was made to the owner, the Hasting Estate Trust. The manager and trustee of that estate, William Giselman, said he would entertain a proposition and accepted $80,000 a deposit. The heirs of Judge Hastings were willing with the exception of one, who demands $1,000,000.

The last will of M. Theo Kearney the Fresno capitalist, leaves to State University property valued $1,000,000. The sum of $50 is to any woman who can successfully claim to be his widow. Another $50 is to be given to any child male or female, who can successfully claim to be his child. In case it will conflict with the provisions of the Civil Code (Section 1313) the following gentlemen will have the use of the estate: William F. Alvo (now dead), James D. Phelan, W. Crocker, John Parrott and Joseph Grant.

'Twas in a literary fog
Beside an inky wave
Some rather handsome skeletons
Were waltzing on a grave,
A very pretty lynching, too,
Gave zest to the affair,
When Jack o' London, stalking in Cried thrice, "Ahoy, Sinclair!"

Then Upton came from Packington
As gay as one can be
Whose progress is accompanied By Reverend Thomas D.,
The latter striking attitudes
And braying at the moon
While flourishing a manuscript
Entitled "Coon, Coon, Coon!"

"Enough, enough! suppress the stool
Quoth Upton of Sinclair,
"I would a bitter tale unfold
Of Sausage and Despair.
My hero is a foreigner,
A stranger yet to soap,
His name Bzzzzisqzyozistnob (Pronounced Bzzzzixstnope).

Up popped a stranger weird and w
Whose chin required a shave.
He tore three handfuls from his bee
And writhed upon a grave.
"Alas! she was a cannibal!"
He moaned as if in pain.
Then all the Club arose and cried,
"Good evening, Mr. Caine!"

Memories of the Blue and Gray.

Memories of the Blue and Gray"
Read at the celebration of the sec-anniversary of the Confederate and Association in Los Angeles,
March 25, 1897.
We gathered here a feeble few
Those who wore the gray—

The larger and the better part
Have mingled with the clay;
Yet not so lost but now and then
Through dimming mist we see
The deadly calm of Stonewall's face
The lion-front of Lee.

The men who followed where they led
Are scattered far and wide—
In every valley of the South,
On every mountain side,
The earth is hallowed by the blood
Of those who, in the van,
Gave up their lives for what they deemed
The sacred rights of man.

And you who faced the boys in blue
(When like a storm they rose)
And played with life and laughed at Death
Among such stalwart foes,
Need never cast your eyes to earth
Or bow your heads with shame—
Though Fortune frown, your names are down
Upon the Roll of Fame.

The flag you followed in the fight
Will never float again—
Thank God it sunk to endless rest
Without a blot or stain!
And in its place "Old Glory" rose
With all its stars restored;
And smiling Peace, with rapture raised
A peon to the Lord.

We love both flags—let smiles and tears
Together hold their sway;
One won our hearts in days ago—
One owns our love today.
We claim them both with all their wealth
Of honor and of fame—
One lives, triumph, in the sun;
And one, a hallowed name.

A few short years and "Yank" and "Reb,"
Beneath their native sod,
Will wait until the Judgment Day
The calling voice of God—
The Great Commander's smile will beam
On that Enrollment Day,
Alike on him who wore the blue
And him who wore the gray.

The Blue and the Gray.

By the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the grave-grass
quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Under the one, the Blue,
Under the other, the Gray.

These in the robings of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat,
All with the battle-blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Under the laurel, the Blue,
Under the willow, the Gray.

From the silence of sorrowful hours,
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers
Alike for the friend and the foe:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Under the roses, the Blue,
Under the lilies, the Gray.

So with an equal splendor,
The morning sun-rays fall,
With a touch impartially tender,
On the blossoms blooming for all:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Broidered with gold, the Blue,
Mellowed with gold, the Gray.

So, when the summer calleth,
On forest and field of grain,
With an equal number falleth,
The cooling drip of the rain:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Wet with the rain, the Blue,
Wet with the rain, the Gray.

Sadly, but not with upbraiding,
The generous deed was done.
In the storm of the years that are fading
No braver battle was won;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Under the blossoms, the Blue,
Under the garlands, the Gray.

No more shall the war-cry sever,
On the winding rivers be red;
They banish our anger forever
When they laurel the graves of our dead!
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Love and tears for the Blue,
Tears and love for the Gray.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Ibsen.

The curtain falls, the lights are low,
For tapers cast a fitful glow;
His drama ends, as dramas must,
With "earth to earth and dust to dust."

We players watch this player go,
With heavy sighs and signs of woe;
While muffled trumpets faintly blow
And in the darkness he is thrust—
The curtain falls.

He leaves the vast and moving show,
His part is played with friend and foe.
He yields the life he held in trust,
His lips are dumb, his pen is rust,
His tragedy is done, and so
The curtain falls.

ome" in New York.

Among the actresses who have done a great deal to make the lot of the chorus girl easier are Marie Cahill, Fay Templeton, and Bessie McCoy. In
"Moonshine," the musical play in which Miss Cahill is appearing, all the girls wear skirts to their ankles.
"When I was poor I had to work in a chorus," Miss Cahill said, "and some of the costumes we were put into were outrageous. I resolved that if ever I came to employ girls they would not be asked to wear clothes that would offend their sense of the propriety of things." In "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway," in which Fay Templeton is appearing, the chorus girls wear dresses that would be appropriate at a lawn party. In some of the newer English musical comedies the skirts of the girls have been lengthened.
The managers are getting over the idea that tights are necessary in the chorus. The skirt that reaches below the knee is now worn in more choruses than are dedicated to tights, and the public is just as well pleased.

In New York last week at Calvary
Baptist Church Miss Bijou Fernandez became the bride of William L.
Abingdon. There was much sobbing among the guests. Miss Amelia Blyham, one of the matrons of honor, used her lace handkerchief openly. The bride insisted that all of the stage hands, wardrobe mistresses and property men who had crossed her path be invited to the wedding. The bridal party consisted of Miss Blyham and Miss Louise Galloway as matrons of honor, Miss Loraine
Price as maid of honor, Charles Richman as best man, and Vincent Serrano, Wilton Lackaye, De Wolf Hopper, Ernest Lawford, Augustus Barrett and John Brander, as ushers. The bride wore the conventional white satin, trimmed with duchesse lace and with a flowing veil of white tulle.

The women guests were dressed quietly. The men present included
Aubrey Bonclault, Henry Woodruff,
Franklin Fyles, William Harcourt, J.
E. Dodson and Edwin Arden. After the ceremony there was a reception at the Hotel Astor. Mr. and Mrs.
Abingdon sail for England next Saturday.

The big gambol of the Lambs the other day in New York was a skit intended to teach clubmen that the light of home is a sure guide to happiness. Harry Woodruff dilated upon the joys of twins and William Courtleigh in a neat coat of hair powder descanted on the beauty of maternity and the evil of race suicide.
They raised a large sum for the San Francisco Bohemian Club.

Grace Van Studdiford, who succeeded Lillian Russell in "Lady
Teetle," is now singing in vaudeville.

George Ade, who has just returned from Europe, has contracted to write a new play for Charles Frohman.

George M. Cohan is to write a new play for Nat C. Goodwin and Lulu Glaser.

T. Daniel Frawley will have a stock company at Reading, Pennsylvania, during the summer.

It is expected that by the middle of this month San Francisco will have two tent theaters, offering musical comedies and comic opera in one and dramatic performances in the other.

Landers Stevens and wife, professionally known as Georgie Cooper, are playing with Bishop's stock company at Liberty Playhouse, Oakland. L. R.
Stockwell, the veteran comedian, is also in the company.

Before her American tour is ended,
Sara Bernhardt will give a few performances of "Hamlet" and "Frou Frou."

Lotta was especially generous in the San Francisco benefit given in the East. She paid $1,000 for a souvenir program at one and $250 for a box at another.

"Raffles" made a hit in London with Gerald Du Maurier in the leading part.

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS

Engagements and Weddings.

Miss Amy F. Sloss and Irving I. Brown were married last Sunday at noon at the residence of I. Wiener, 2138 Pacific avenue, Alameda. The bride is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lee Sloss of 2266 Franklin street, San Francisco. She is a native of Kentucky and came here with her parents about five years ago. The groom is the junior member of the law firm of Voegelsang & Brown, a native of San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. Brown will spend their honeymoon at Del Monte.

The wedding of Miss Mayotte Dickinson, daughter of Medical Director and Mrs. Dwight Dickinson of Washington, D. C., and Ensign Arthur Caffee, U. S. N., son of Colonel Caffee of Carthage, Mo., took place at Trinity Episcopal Church.

The wedding of Miss Ruth Allen, daughter of Judge and Mrs. James M. Allen, to Lucius Allen, took place on Wednesday afternoon at the home of the bride's parents at 3400 Washington street. The ceremony was performed by Father Pius Murphy at half past three o'clock. Miss Elizabeth Allen, the bride's sister, was her maid of honor and only attendant. Wyatt Allen, the groom's brother, was the best man. Only the members of the immediate families were present. After a brief wedding journey Mr. and Mrs. Allen will make their home in San Francisco.

The wedding of Miss Elizabeth Bergin to Lieutenant John H. White, U. S. Marine Corps, took place on Saturday of last week at the home of Mrs. Merritt H. Weed, 1811 Gough street. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Frederick Clappett at noon. There were no attendants of either bride or groom, and only a few relatives and intimate friends were present. Lieutenant White and his bride left for a brief honeymoon at Del Monte, after which they will make their home at Mare Island, where Lieutenant White is stationed.

The wedding of Miss Ruth Miller, daughter of the late Major and Mrs. O. C. Miller, to Dr. Louis Brechemin Jr., U. S. A., will not take place on June 29th, as originally planned, but on June 30th. The event will be celebrated at noon, at Christ Church, Sausalito, and will be followed by a reception to relatives and intimate friends at the bride's home, "The Pines." Mrs. Clarence Percy Nicholson, the bride's sister, will be matron of honor, and Lieutenant Clarence Carigan, U. S. A., the best man.

The engagement is announced of Miss Marie Lucille Butters, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Butters, of Piedmont, to Midshipman Victor Nicholson Metcalf, U. S. N., son of Secretary and Mrs. Victor H. Metcalf. No date has been announced for the wedding, but it will probably take place a year hence.

The engagement is announced of Miss Georgene Shepard, daughter of Mr. C. D. Shepard, to Lieutenant Edwin C. Long, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., aide-de-camp to General Frederick A. Funston, U. S. A. The wedding will be celebrated in September.

The wedding of Mrs. Emma Spreckels Watson, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Claus Spreckels of San Francisco, to Mr. John W. Ferris, took place in the Church of the Heavenly Rest in New York City on June 2nd. It was a very simple wedding and was witnessed by the bride's brother and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. C. Augustus Spreckels. It had been the intention to have the wedding celebrated in the Spreckels home in San Francisco, but that home was destroyed during the recent disaster. This caused a change in the plans, and the ceremony was performed in New York. The bride has been visiting in Europe recently, having gone there to witness the marriage of her niece, Miss Lurline Spreckels, to Mr. Spencer Eddy, which was celebrated in Paris a few days ago. Mr. Ferris came from San Francisco, and, together with Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Spreckels met his fiancée at the pier, and on receipt of a telegram from her father the wedding took place as has been stated above. Mrs. Ferris was the widow of the late Thomas Watson, an Englishman, who died two years ago. Mr. and Mrs. Ferris and Mr. and Mrs. C. Augustus Spreckels will soon leave for California.

Across the Bay.

Mrs. Frank A. Wilkins of San Rafael has as her guest her nephew, Mr. Lawrence A. Van Wyck of the Holluschick Club.

At the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. C. F. MacDermot in Oakland a vaudeville performance will be given next Thursday evening, the proceeds to be sent to the San Francisco sufferers.

Mrs. Will Tevis, who has been visiting Mrs. Miner in Los Angeles, returned to her home at Burlingame to entertain Mr. and Mrs. Fred Sharon. Mrs. Sharon (nee Louise Tevis) is the sister of Will Tevis.

Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Van Sicklen at their Alameda home.

Mrs. Jeremiah Clarke and her son-in-law, Captain Lyman, are domiciled in Mrs. William C. Little's in Oakland.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels in Oakland has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

Miss Helen Woolworth is at present a guest at the Hotel Rafael, but will leave during the summer for Paris, to remain abroad indefinitely.

Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin and Miss Grace Baldwin have taken a cottage in Oakland for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Mailliard and their family are at Belvedere for the summer.

Miss Olga Atherton is spending some time in Berkeley as the guest of friends and relatives.

Captain William L. Merry, United States Minister to Central America, arrived here recently to join his family and with Mrs. Merry, the Misses May and Blanche Merry and Miss May Hill are at Holyoaks in Sausalito for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton, who have spent most of their time at Burlingame since the fire, went, on June 1st, to Sausalito, where they will spend the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. John D. Spreckels Jr. are in San Rafael for the summer.

Mrs. A. N. Towne and Mrs. Clinton Worden have been spending some time as the guests of Mrs. I. L. Regua at Piedmont. They are thinking of taking a house there.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Denis Searies (nee Caroline Ayers), at Piedmont, has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Brunner (nee Kaufman), whose wedding was celebrated in Oakland early last month, have reached New York, which will be their home.

Notes About the Clubs.

The renovations and repairs on the newly leased quarters for the Pacific-Union Club are about completed and beginning with June 1st the dining room was open for the use of members. The Board of Directors (subject to the approval of the club) have reduced the dues of regular members to $5 per month.

The Bohemian Club has leased comfortable quarters at 1925 Octavia street.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Mr. Sherril Schell and Mr. Edward Montgomery leave on June 18th for an extended European tour to be gone for an indefinite period.

Mrs. Mary A. Huntington and her daughter, Miss Marian Huntington, arrived from Yokohama during the week on the steamship Korea. They were met at the pier by Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Brooke Perkins.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Sullivan are at their seaside home near Santa Cruz, where they went immediately after the great fire.

S. W. Waterhouse, of the firm of Waterhouse & Lester, of San Francisco, has just completed the purchase of the Montgomery house on North First street, San Jose.

Mr. James D. Phelan has leased the house at the southeast corner Franklin and Jackson streets, formerly occupied by Mrs. Houghton and Miss Minnie Houghton.

Owing to the recent death of Martin Burke, one of the founders of the firm of Madison & Burke, the firm has incorporated, taking in three of its principal employees, among them John M. Kepner, who has been chief salesman for some years past.

Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Horst and their family have gone to their big ranch, "Wheatland," where they have been entertaining many guests.

Owing to the retirement of Mr. Bigelow, of the Wells Fargo National Bank, the directors announce a number of changes. I. W. Hellman Jr. becomes senior vice president. Cashier F. L. Lippman gets the junior vice presidency and becomes a director. Assistant Cashier Frank B. King has been given the position of cashier. He is a son of President King of the Bank of California, and before the consolidation was an assistant cashier of the Wells-Fargo Bank.

Bryan J. Clinch, architect and author, died last week in an Oakland hospital from an illness resulting indirectly from the irregularity of diet since the fire. Bryan J. Clinch was a native of Ireland, about 60 years of age. He was remarkable for his literary erudition rather than in his profession, being a classical student and master of French, Italian and Spanish. His principal work was a history of "The Missions of California" in two volumes, which appeared about two years ago.

Mr. John P. Dunn, at one time a prominent Democratic politician of San Francisco and State Controller of California from 1881 to 1889, died in Los Angeles on May 29, of bronchial trouble.

Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson has been staying at the Stevenson ranch in the vicinity of Gilroy.

Mrs. Pringle and her daughters, Miss Nina Pringle and Miss Hess Pringle, are expected home very soon from Europe.

Mrs. T. C. Van Ness and Miss Daisy Van Ness were in Paris when last heard from. They expect to return soon to California.

Joseph Cairn Simpson, the well-known sportsman and writer on subjects connected with the turf and breeding of thoroughbred stock, died at his home at 211 Adeline street, Oakland, on May 27th, at the age of 81.

Mr. and Mrs. William Ede, who left for the Orient several months ago for an indefinite stay abroad, returned at once when they heard the news of the disaster to San Francisco. They were in Japan at the time and were able to obtain only meager details of the calamity. They started immediately for America and arrived in San Francisco a few days ago. Their house, filled with beautiful furniture, was reduced to ashes, and the Majestic Theater, which Mr. Ede owned, and all the remainder of his vast holdings were totally destroyed.

The Public Library of San Francisco is now located on Sixteenth street, near Market street.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Sharon, who have lived in Paris for several years past, returned last week to California and are the guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Tevis, at Burlingame. They will remain here but a few weeks.

Mrs. William H. Crocker, who was in New York, en route to Europe at the time of the fire, and who returned at once to San Francisco with Mr. Crocker, expects to leave within a month for Paris, to join her children, whom she sent abroad to her sister, Princess Andre Poniatowski. Mrs. Crocker has taken a country home in England for six months and will remain there until the fall.

Mrs. Minnie Maddern Fiske and maid from New York are registered at Rowardennan, in the Santa Cruz Mountains. Mrs. Fiske makes a point of spending her summers in California.

Mr. William G. Irwin has gone on a business trip to Honolulu. Mrs. Irwin and Miss Helene Irwin are still abroad.

Mr. John D. Spreckels and Mr. William Clayton, managing director of the Spreckels' interests in Southern California, made a brief stopover in Los Angeles while on their way from Coronado to San Francisco. Mr. Spreckels has come to San Francisco to consider plans for the rebuilding of several of the large business blocks owned by him, which were destroyed by the fire. He will return to Coronado in a few days, where his wife and their son, Mr. Claus Spreckels, Jr., are sojourning.

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Miss Sydney Davis has been visiting lately, and from the annexed extract from a letter to James D. Phelan it is evident that he entertains more than a fleeting affection for our beautiful State:

Rome, May 13, 1906.

My Dear Phelan: After the terrible disaster in San Francisco I was obliged to come over to Europe to attend the inauguration of a statue of Sir William Harcourt, which I have completed for the House of Commons in London. I propose towards the latter part of June, as soon as the ceremony is over, to return to San Francisco. It is my great desire, in some way, to co-operate in the re-building of that beautiful city; the three delightful months that I have just passed in California will ever be associated in my mind with most pleasant memories. I am looking forward with great delight to the prospect of spending much of my time there in the future. Yours very sincerely,

WALDO STORY.

Mrs. Page, formerly Miss Mamie Kling, wife of Surgeon Page, U. S. Army, has returned to California from the East to be with her mother, Mrs. Kling, who is dangerously ill.

Mrs. A. A. Waterhouse and her daughter, Mrs. W. W. Dorn, who were in Tokio when they heard the news of San Francisco's great fire, returned once to this Coast and are now located at 3834 Clay street, San Francisco.

Mrs. Charles Neuman, treasurer of the relief fund of the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association, has received from Mrs. Gertrude Atherton $10, this being the amount which Harper & Brothers sent her for her article upon San Francisco's disaster, titled "San Francisco's Tragic Week."

Miss Lutie Collier and Mrs. Atherton Macdonald, with the latter's children, have gone to their mother's home in Clear Lake.

The sale of the Montgomery house on North First street in San Jose has been completed. The Montgomery property is one of the finest residences in San Jose. S. W. Waterhouse, of the San Francisco firm of Waterhouse & Lester, is the purchaser, the price paid being $15,000.

Mr. and Mrs. Ashton Stevens have been stopping at Rowardennan in the Santa Cruz Mountains.

Mrs. P. W. Selby died of pneumonia on June 1st at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Percy Moore, at Fair Oaks. She was born in Chili, but came to Menlo Park when a girl. Her father, Faxon Atherton, was prominent in the early days of the State and did his share toward the building of San Francisco. Mrs. Selby was a cultured and accomplished woman, and many social functions took place at the old Atherton place at Menlo Park.

Mrs. John L. Sabin and Miss Irene Sabin, with Dr. and Mrs. Redmond Sabin, are spending the summer at the Sabin country place at Mountain View.

L. W. Hellman, Jr., W. F. Herrin and Dr. Julius Rosenstirn went in Mr. Hellman's private car to Lake Tahoe, to stop at the Hellman retreat on the lake shore.

Richard Burke of Ireland is due here to consult with the Donohoes of the Donohoe-Kelly bank about the future disposition of the old Occidental Hotel site. Mr. Burke and his children by his wife, who was a Miss Donahue, own a half interest in the property. The Donohoes own the other half.

Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs and her son, Hermann Oelrichs Jr., sailed last week for Europe, to remain abroad for six months.

United States Senator Francis G. Newlands, Mr. Thomas Hesketh (son of Lady Hesketh) and H. L. Wright have arrived from the East and are stopping at San Mateo. They are here for the purpose of conferring with their San Francisco representatives regarding plans for the rebuilding of the Palace Hotel and the other properties of the Sharon Estate company. Mr. Wright is an English solicitor and has come from London with Lady Hesketh's son to represent her interests. Lady Hesketh is a sister of Fred Sharon and of the first wife of Senator Francis G. Newlands. Mr. and Mrs. Norman McLaren left last week for Portland, Oregon, where they will spend a fortnight.

Mrs. John Dabigren, formerly Mrs. Henry McLean Martin, is expected to arrive here next week from her home in Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase, who returned last week from a year's travel abroad, went directly to her country place, "Stag's Leap," in the Napa Valley, where she will remain during the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. George B. Sperry and Miss Elsie Sperry, whose house on Union street was badly damaged by the earthquake, have taken a cottage at Burlingame for three or four months.

Mrs. James Robinson, Miss Ethel Cooper and Mr. Porter Robinson have returned from their sojourn abroad, but Miss Elena Robinson is still in Germany, where she will spend the summer.

Mrs. James Cunningham, Miss Sara Cunningham and Miss Elizabeth Cunningham have given up their European trip for this year and will spend the summer at Beloit, Wisconsin, having gone there recently from New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Tubbs, who have been abroad since the early spring, have recently returned to San Francisco.

The Baron and Baroness Von Schroeder have come up from their San Luis Obispo ranch and will spend a part of the summer at the Hotel Rafael.

Dr. and Mrs. George H. Evans have moved to 2713 Sacramento street. Mrs. Evans and children will spend the next few months in Mill Valley.

Mr. Clarence Follis will spend a part of the summer with his sister, Mrs. Frank Griffin, at the house they have taken in San Rafael.

Mrs. George A. Moore left on Saturday of last week for the East, to be the guest of her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Geissler, for several months.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Bryant Grimwood, whose home on Washington street was burned, were for a time the guests of Mr. Grimwood's parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Grimwood, in Fruitvale, but are now visiting Mrs. Grimwood's mother, Mrs. Henry F. Allen, in Ross Valley.

Mrs. A. P. Niblack, who left for the East, the day before the earthquake, returned to the city last week and went with her mother, Mrs. W. P. Harrington, to the latter's country place near Colusa, for a brief visit. Mrs. Niblack leaves shortly for Portland, Oregon, to join her husband, who is stationed there at present on the Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Brooks Perkins have been visiting Mrs. Perkins' mother, Mrs. Mary Huntington, at the latter's home on Jackson street.

Mrs. Houghton and her daughter, Miss Minnie Houghton, expect to leave soon for Hartford, Connecticut, where they will visit Governor and Mrs. Bulkeley. Mrs. Bulkeley was well known in San Francisco as Miss Fannie Houghton.

Mrs. Percy Williams is at present the guest of her mother, Mrs. Richard Sprague, in San Rafael, and will remain there during Mr. Williams' absence in the East on a brief business trip.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. H. Macdonald Spencer (nee Florence Josse-lyn) at Menlo has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Oddie (nee Treanor) returned recently from their three months' wedding journey abroad, and after a visit to Mrs. Oddie's mother, Mrs. William H. Jordan, in this city, left for their home in Tonopah.

CURRENT PARODIES.

Maud of the Muck Rake.

Maud Muller on a summer's day
Raked the meadow sweet with hay.

Her pa was not a man of wealth,
All that she had was rugged health.

Sighing, she said: "Confound the luck,
I think I'll go to raking muck."

Because she toiled a wild unrest
And an eager longing filled her breast.

"Why should I have to work," she cried,
While others scorn me in their pride?

"With riches they have never earned
Their backs on me are proudly turned.

"The good Lord never planned things
so,
There's something rotten here below.

"An Ida Tarbell I will be,
And whack the plutocrats," said she.

The judge appeared upon the scene,
Bringing an odor of gasoline.

He stopped to buzz the girl awhile;
She was plump, and he rather liked her style.

She knew that he possessed a wad.
He thought: "How sweet a name is Maud."

He spoke of railroad stocks he had.
The maiden listened and was glad.

"In two years if my luck is fair,"
He said, "I'll be a millionaire.

"I travel on passes through the land—"
Maud sweetly said: "Oh, ain't that grand!"

"As far as rebates go, I'll say
That I regard them as O. K.

"A block of Standard stock I claim—
No matter how I got the same.

"Now tell me, Maud, and tell me true,
Don't I look rather good to you?"

Her face against his breast she hid
And gladly answered that she did.

Today she is the judge's wife
And lives in style, enjoying life.

And oft she wonders in her pride
Why people can't be satisfied.

"Why," she complains, "do critics pitch
So foolishly into the rich?"

"Why do they ever scold or sigh
Because the things they need are high?"

"Wise Providence has planned affairs.
We rich, alas, have many cares.

"But while we nobly bear the strain,
Why should the ones below complain?"

"Of all wise words, the best by far Is: 'Take things meekly as they are.'"
—Chicago Record-Herald.

Elegy in a Baseball Field.

The curfew tolls the knell of parting
day.

The bleachers are empty as can be;
The rooter homeward takes his weary way

And leaves the field to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape
on the sight

And all the air is hushed, and calm and still—

Yet here the rooters yelled with all their might:

"O soak it! Kill it! Bust the cover, Bill!"

Around that diamond now dimly seen
The player rushed until his legs were blurred.

And, O, the bleacher's grief was tensely keen

When he was run to earth and died at third.

Let no ambition mock their useful sport,

Nor jeer their captain's sacrificial sign,

Nor grandeur hear, aweary, the report—

The short and simple annals of the nine.

The boast of averages at the bat
And all the bases that the pitcher gave

To shun the long three-hagger now fall flat—

The march of glory sideways to the grave.

Full many a home run finds the field-
er's hand,

And fills the batsman's heart with dark despair;
Full many a strike is born but to be fanned

And waste its purpose on the severed air.

Next to the madding crowd's applauding strife

The pitcher lifts our hope—and then it falls

While we object: "What's that? Not on your life!"

Struck out? Can't you distinguish strikes from balls?"

The curfew tolls the knell of parting
day;

The bleachers gape—just as we said before,

And now a strident voice is hurled
our way:

"Say, mister, did you hear what was the score?"

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clark are at Del Monte, where they will remain until their San Mateo home, which was badly damaged by the earthquake, is rendered habitable again.

Mrs. William Borrowe, who has been in England for a year, as the guest of her daughter, Mrs. Thomas Leggett, has returned to Sausalito. Miss Constance Borrowe has also returned from a visit to Mrs. Gaston Ashe, at the latter's ranch in San Benito county.

Mrs. M. A. Tobin and Miss Agnes Tobin are at San Mateo, where they expect to make their home for the present.

Monsieur Lanet, the French Consul, returned recently from Paris, where he went for a stay of several months, but owing to the disaster here, he cut short his visit and hurriedly returned to San Francisco.

Mrs. Arthur MacArthur Jr. and her little son, who have been visiting Mrs.
MacArthur's parents, Admiral and Mrs. Bowman H. McCalla, at Mare
Island for some months past, sailed this week for the Orient, to rejoin her husband, Lieutenant MacArthur, U. S.
N., who is attached to the Ohio.

Mr. and Mrs. William Henshaw,
Miss Alla Henshaw and Miss Ruth Houghton will leave within a week or ten days for the East, where they will spend the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. George L. Garritt have taken a cottage at Palo Alto for the summer.

Mrs. J. J. Brice, who was the guest of friends at Mare Island for some time after she was burned out at the Knickerbocker, has gone to her country place at Oakville, Napa Valley, for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Lester Herrick, after a few weeks in Seattle, will return to San Francisco for the summer. Mr.
Herrick is one of the secretaries of the Finance Committee of the Relief and Red Cross Funds.

Why the Relief Fund Stands Still.
When this journal some weeks ago deprecated the statements of politicians and newspapers by which it was made to appear that San Francisco was on the threshold of a new era, we met with not a little criticism. We warned the nation that the immediate need of San Francisco was as nothing compared with the need of the near future—the necessity of feeding and caring for thousands for many months. This warning was received in some circles with derision and anger, and this criticism went so far that those who read it even presumed to prate of our attitude as being "disloyal to San Francisco."
It is disloyal to San Francisco to tell the truth about her scores of thousands of sufferers, and to say that they lack food, shelter and clothing, we could plead guilty to the charge.
It is disloyalty, make the most of it.
It is to our thinking to instill sedulously into the minds of the American people that there is little or no need here, when on the contrary the need is pressing and urgent; to impress on the country at large that we are busily engaged in "beautifying San Francisco," when in reality we are trying to stave off starvation from a hundred thousand destitute refugees—this seems to us much more like

"disloyalty to San Francisco."

How true, how lamentably true, were the warnings of the Argonaut is shown by the happenings of the week just passed. Inquiries have come from New York as to "whether there are still any destitute in San Francisco." Chicago asks "whether there is any further need in San Francisco."

Any destitute? Great God!

We pointed out in these columns four weeks ago that there was an impression throughout the Eastern part of the country that a relief fund of twenty millions of dollars had already been received in San Francisco. The size of this enormous (and apocryphal) fund so staggered the Eastern people that they concluded they had sent money enough. The senseless booming of our local newspapers and speculators impressed them with the idea that all urgent need was over. Therefore the papers along the Atlantic Coast notified their readers that the exigency had passed; that San Francisco was recovering from her trouble; that urgent need of assistance no longer existed. In one case (as we quoted from a Boston paper two weeks ago), the local Boston Relief Committee was urged to retain the funds they had received, and to devote them to local necessities as "they had already sent enough to San Francisco."

The two messages from New York and Chicago, to which we refer above, came to the San Francisco Relief Committee. The New York message came from the Chamber of Commerce. This body had raised a fund of over $800,000 for the relief of San Francisco.
Of this amount they had forwarded $250,000,
when they became impressed with the idea that San Francisco no longer needed help. Therefore, like prudent business men, they determined to send no more money until its need should be made apparent to them. The remainder of the fund, nearly half a million of dollars, was placed in the care of J. P. Morgan, Jr., Treasurer of the Chamber of Commerce Relief Committee, who placed it where it would draw interest, subject to the call of the President, Morris K. Jesup, and of the Treasurer, Mr. Morgan.

It so happened that two San Franciscans in New York learned of the existence of this fund, of the fact that it had been temporarily tied up, and of the further fact that it would be placed at the disposal of the San Francisco Relief Committee if the situation were made clear. These two Californians were Franklin K. Lane and Hermann Oelrichs. They telegraphed thus to Chairman James D. Phelan,
"We could use the information most advantageously if you would wire us the total amount to date in cash received by you since the earthquake." To this Mr. Phelan replied under date of June 2. "Actual cash receipts to date $4,243,000." This dispatch was by Mr. Lane and Mr. Oelrichs read to the Treasurer of the Chamber of Commerce fund. They further told him that on the very day they called upon him General Greeley reported to Washington 126,970 destitute persons in San Francisco alone, and 30,000 destitute outside of San Francisco. Further to prove the presence of great destitution in San Francisco, and the fear that it will be with us for many months to come, is General Greeley's warning to Mayor Schmitz—that by the first of next November, before the rains begin, the authorities should erect wooden barracks to house seventy-five thousand persons. For General Greeley believes that at least that number will still be dependent upon charity six months hence.

The officials of the New York Chamber of Commerce replied that the New York papers were reprinting statements from the San Francisco press to this effect: that "money is plentiful in the stricken city;" that "the commercial banks and saving institutions are resuming business;" that "all their resources are intact;" that "a trust company of San Francisco loaned a million dollars in the local money market;" that "San Francisco is so overburdened with money that she has begun shipping it back to New York." Although, as business men, the members of the New York Chamber of Commerce do not of course believe that because the San Francisco banks had plenty of money, this rendered it doubtful that private destitution existed. Still these flamboyant press reports necessarily made them pause. The President, Mr. Jesup, said that the only member of the finance committee whom they recognized was Mr. Phelan, and that the forwarding of the money at their command rested absolutely with him; that if Mr. Phelan informed them that the need of it existed in San Francisco, the money should go forward at once. It is probably on its way
Westward as we write these lines.

The New York Red Cross collected $775,- 262 for the San Francisco Relief fund. Of this amount $501,580 was forwarded to the National Red Cross at Washington. It was intended to forward the remainder to the San Francisco Relief Committee direct, when these same booming newspaper reports made the committee pause. At that time there remained in the custody of Jacob Schiff, Treasurer of the Red Cross Committee, the sum of $205,- 855. This also was held up for the reason that the Red Cross Committee believed that destitution in San Francisco was practically disappearing.

In Chicago the large sum forwarded to San Francisco by the Chamber of Commerce was supplemented by nearly $200,000 more collected by that body, but which the officers concluded was not needed. This sum also remained in the treasury. It is only within the past week that the official reports of General Greeley concerning the grave conditions still existing in San Francisco, and his prediction that they will last for many months, impelled the Chicago Chamber of Commerce to ask information of the San Francisco Relief Committee. They also have been informed of the great need which exists here. They also have made preparations for sending their accumulated funds at once.

This is something. But at the best it is only six or seven hundred thousand dollars. What is that in the face of the appalling situation which confronts us? Let those unfamiliar with the facts go through the stricken city of San Francisco to-day. Let them see the scores of thousands of people dwelling under tents in parks, squares and vacant lots, and on the Government reservations surrounding the city. Let them gaze on the melancholy lines of men, women and children waiting to receive food, clothing and shoes at the various relief stations. Let them reflect on how little hope there is for these hapless, helpless thousands for many months to come. Let them ponder over the fact that these sufferers must still be wards of the charitable, wards of the benevolent, wards of those more fortunate than themselves all over the United States.

And when they think of these things, and when they remember that the freely gushing fountains of benevolence flowing from all over the United States a few weeks ago were checked by the false reports of hysteric boomers, they can hardly find words strong enough, bitter enough to express their condemnation of such folly.

New York is the metropolis of the Union. Chicago is the second city. These two great communities, with their suburbs representing many millions, are bound to us closely not only by electric wires, but by a thousand filaments social, industrial and journalistic. Yet these two great communities, thoroughly as they are informed of the happenings of this vast Republic, were so ignorant of what was going on in the stricken city of San Francisco that they believed the destitution there was over.

The destitution over! With a hundred thousand people living on the bitter bread of charity! Do you know what a hundred thousand people means? Do you know it means the population of a hundred villages, of fifty towns, of half a score of small cities? That all these people, men, women and children, have no food to eat, no roofs to their heads, no shoes to their feet, no clothing to wear? And this is the appalling kind of situation which the hysteric boomers have so misstated as to mislead the warm-hearted and benevolent people of this great, rich, and most prosperous country.

If these two cities, New York and Chicago, with all the opportunities that they have for acquiring full and correct information, should have remained in ignorance as to the true conditions, think what ignorance must have prevailed in the many thousands of little cities, towns and villages throughout the United States. In many of these the sources of information are meagre. In many of them there is but one newspaper, and that a feeble weekly. In many others there is no newspaper at all. If Chicago and New York—with their scores of great newspapers, throbbing and pulsating with life, and with intelligence from all quarters of the world—should have remained in such ignorance, what must have been the lack of knowledge of these lesser communities? And yet it was from these that the great streams of assistance were flowing so freely a few weeks ago—to be checked, alas, by the mistaken activity of the boomers.

As the Argonaut remarked a week after the disaster, the truth is often hard, bitter and unpalatable, but it is better to tell the truth. We told it then. We tell it now. Other people and journals are telling it now. But they are telling it very late. Let us hope that it is not too late.

The Traders Insurance Scandal.

Since the Traders Insurance Company of Chicago went into liquidation facts have come to hand which show how utterly discreditable an affair this proves to be. For many years the Traders has been writing millions of fire risks on this coast at high rates. Yet on the first occasion when a great conflagration ravages a California city, this corporation, which has battered and grown rich on Californians' money, ignominiously backs down and goes into voluntary liquidation. Even among the Traders there were stockholders honest enough or politic enough to see that this course was not the best for them to pursue. These men advocated the levying of an assessment of $200 a share, which would have enabled the company to meet its obligations and to continue in business. Even if the company had been hampered by its heavy losses, such an action would have created in the community a confidence in the stability of the Traders which nothing could destroy. Nearly thirty years ago the Bank of California failed. When its stockholders put their shoulders to the wheel, dragged the institution out of the mire of delinquency, and placed it on its feet again, they amazed the financial world. So great was the confidence created by this course that the Bank of California is now as solid as a rock—nothing could affect its standing in the minds of the community. Correspondingly, had the Traders Company acted with honesty—which was in this case the best policy—that company would have harvested many fold where it had sown. But its stockholders chose to adopt the cowardly and rascally course of bankruptcy. We say rascally, for the figures given out show that the company was only ostensibly unable to meet its obligations. The difference between its assets and its liabilities was so small as to be microscopic.

Among the many fairy stories concerning this bunco company is a tale of the heirs of one of its founders going despairingly from stockholder to stockholder, urging them to change their minds and pay their debts like men. They even volunteered, we are told, to put up several millions of their private fortunes to save the face and fame of the company founded by their father. But there is nothing more cowardly, we all know, than a million of dollars—unless it is two millions. All of the directors and most of the stockholders—the Traders being a close corporation—are reputed to be millionaires. It is needless to state that these rich rascals turned a deaf ear to the prayer that they should pay their debts like honest men. This is about the only part of the story that sounds probable. To those who know millionaires, insurance millionaires, particularly Chicago insurance millionaires, the only thinkable thing about the story is that these millionaires promptly refused to pay their honest debts.

A more credible narrative is that which tells us of the stand of J. J. Mitchell, "President of the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank and a large stockholder in the Traders Insurance Company." Mitchell is quoted as saying that he would have "opposed receivership proceedings had he been in Chicago when the Directors brought about that action." This sensitive and high-minded man, however, promptly refused to do anything toward rescinding the action, because he said he considered that the Traders Company "is a corpse."

So it is. It stinks. And so do its stockholders.

From its actions it is evident that this bunco insurance company will bilk every insurer who holds its policies; it will make a fight on every possible quibble and technicality that can be urged by unscrupulous and pettifogging attorneys. Rich rogues are always harder to deal with than poor rogues. We, therefore, recommend to those unfortunate Californians who are insured in the Traders that they do not attempt to fight that company singly; they will find the chances too much against them. The number of California losers by this swindling corporation is large. Let them incorporate and pool their issues. The Traders losses in California amount to some six millions of dollars. The California policy holders could well afford to spend half a million in attempting to recover their just dues.

The individual liability law found in the California statutes does not exist in Illinois. If it did there might be speedily found a way of making these insurance crooks disgorge.

But even if there be no such Illinois statute, a large body of wronged men, determined and vindictive, can perhaps do something to hurt the defaulting stockholders of the Traders. Life insurance revelations of late have taught us all that high insurance officials are not above low and dirty tricks. Apparently this is not confined to life insurance circles. The French have a story that when a man wishes to get rid of his mistress, all he needs to do is to write to her "All is over; I have discovered everything." They reason that there is always something to discover, and that the lady will accept her dismissal without cavil. Correspondingly there is always something to discover in the careers of such a gang as the directors and stockholders of the Traders. Let the California holders of that company's policies at once organize, incorporate, retain the best of legal talent in California and Illinois, go into the Federal courts, and see if they cannot make it hot for these rascals who have so brazenly stolen their money.

Czar Cannon and the American Douma.

We have had only meager references in these pages as yet to the Russian Douma. That body is now going through a most interesting experiment in the evolution of a parliamentary government. The French went through the same evolution, but in a shorter period. They began the experiment with the fall of the Bastille, and then, having chopped off the head of Louis Sixteenth, started in to govern themselves without a King. It is now a hundred and seventeen years since they began experimenting with representative government. During that time they have had five or six royal regimes under various names. They seem to have settled down at last to a permanent form of republican government. We of the Anglo-Saxon race are not so volatile and are cooler than the Gauls. Our forefathers began their struggle under the Tudor kings, and it was not until the reign of the Stuarts that the people fairly got to work by chopping off the head of Charles First. That was in 1649, and it took two hundred years for them to get down to a genuine representative government, which may be said to have begun after the Reform Bill in the first half of the last century.

Thus we see that it took the Gauls one hundred years to acquire a genuine representative government. It took the Anglo-Saxons two hundred years. It will take the Muscovites less. For, although they are slower than Gaul or Anglo-Saxon, they live in an age of the world when transportation and the transmission of intelligence are very rapid. Therefore, we may look for startling changes in Russia in the near future. Where the process of the English Revolution was marked by decades and that of the French Revolution by years, the Russian Revolution will doubtless be measured by months. Czar Nicholas had better look to his tinsel crown and his bauble scepter, or he may lose them.

And this brings us to the consideration of our own Czar and our own Douma. How long will it be before our Czar accords to us a representative government in these United States? Judging from recent events, that consummation would seem to be still far distant. California recently pleaded with Czar Cannon to be permitted to call up the five per cent school land bill during this session. This bill, be it understood, is a measure which dates back more than a third of a century. By its provision, California would receive certain moneys coming from her school lands, which were appropriated by the Federal Government, instead of beget aside for the use of California public schools, as has been the case in the other commonwealths of the United States. No one denies the justice of the bill. The Federal Government owes us the money. The bill has repeatedly passed the House; sometimes it would pass the Senate and not the House; sometimes it would pass the House and not the Senate; sometimes it would pass both House and Senate, and fail to receive the President's signature. And so the matter has gone on for years.

Now California finds herself confronted with the aftermath of a great calamity. Our low citizens in the East, having given to us freely in a great burst of generosity, are now forgetting us for their own affairs, as is but natural. San Francisco is still suffering from a paralysis of trade and industry caused by the great disaster. Today, long after that event, in the parks and squares of San Francisco, six weeks after the calamity, over seventy-five thousand people are still being fed by the Relief Committee. It is the belief of experienced and serious men that the removal of this deplorable condition is but a matter of a few weeks merely. Major General Greely is urging the municipal authorities of San Francisco to provide before next November wooden barracks to house seventy-five thousand people. No one knows better than General Greely the needs of these refugees. He and General Funston have been in charge of them ever since the fire. They believe this condition will not only last through the summer but through next winter. That a number of people thrice the size of our regular army before the Spanish War must still be provided for, shows how grave is the aftermath of the calamity.

It is for these reasons that California desires that everything shall be done that is humanly possible to raise money for the needs of her unfortunate people. In addition to the relief funds so generously forwarded from all over the United States, California is now attempting to induce the United States Government to pay to her as commonwealth certain sums which are her due. This school land fund is one of them. In San Francisco's schools are nearly all destroyed, her children wandering idly through the ruined streets. Yet Speaker Cannon, who is Czar of our Douma, has just killed off the California School Land bill for this session. June 4th was the last pension day in the House, and with its passage went all hope of passing California's bill at this session. Czar Cannon went further. He is so resentful toward Californians that on the same day he cut off all consideration of a trifling bill appropriating ten thousand dollars for a monument to Commodore Sloat at Monterey.

What is the reason of this resentment of Speaker Cannon toward California? The resentment of Czar Nicholas against Riga for riots could scarcely be greater. But we have had no riots in California, only earthquake; only fire; only destitution, hunger, raggedness; only suffering; only women and children, delicately bred, exposed to the elements; that is all. Even Czar Nicholas fully relented toward the rioters of Riga, pardoned some of them who had women and children dependent on them. Why should Czar Cannon be so relentless in his treatment against the children of California? Why should Czar Cannon attempt to block not only benevolent appropriations, but also to hold up sums of money which are our very own?

The answer is simple. As Czar Nicholas insulted by the attitude of the Douma toward his federal council bill, so is Czar Cannon miffed at the attitude of California toward his Statehood bill. He is bent on the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as a single State because he is violently opposed to any increase in the number of United States Senators. He believes the Senate is already too strong as compared with the House. He fears that if New Mexico and Arizona are not forced into a union as one State, they will be admitted separately later if the Democrats get control of Congress. Czar Cannon is vehement in denouncing California and Californians. "Look at those fellows," said the Czar the other day, pointing to a group of California Representatives, "I have given more to that delegation than to any other. The California Senators have been coming to me for favors ever since I have been Speaker. And now they propose to humiliate me by voting against a Joint Statehood Compromise." Confronted thus as they are with the anger of the Czar, the California delegation has not receded. They believe that an attempt to coerce two territories into an unwilling marriage would constitute a semi-incestuous union. Hence they are determined to oppose it. They will oppose it whatever Czar Cannon may do, and if they were to withdraw their opposition and swap and dicker and bargain with the Czar so that in consideration of peddling out their votes to him he would consent to let California have money which is justly due her, they would be dishonorable and unworthy men. We congratulate them on their stand. Better let California women and children suffer rather than that California and her Representatives should be dishonored.

But when, we ask again, will a purely representative government be established in the United States? When will the commonwealths of this Union be permitted representation on the floor of the American Douma? How long will Czar Cannon be permitted to override with his autocratic will the Representatives of the people of these United States in full Douma assembled?

How long, O Lord, how long?

An Insurance Manager's Resignation.

Last week George D. Dornin, for many years a prominent figure in the insurance circles of California, resigned as Manager of the Pacific Department of the National Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn. It is stated and not denied that Mr. Dornin's resignation was made because he refused to be a party to the very curious methods of the National Company. Among these methods may be mentioned the announcement of the Company, that it would insist upon a horizontal cut of twenty-five per cent on the face of every adjusted claim presented for settlement. As every adjusted claim is prima facie good for the amount of the face of the policy, such procedure as this is simply a hold up. It is no wonder that Mr. Dornin at once resigned. He has lived in this community for many years, and has always been regarded and treated as an honest man by honest men. He doubtless desires to retain such standing. He probably thinks that his recent affiliations, would cause him to lose that standing. Hence his resignation.

San Francisco is rapidly filling up with high officials of Eastern fire insurance companies. Many of these gentlemen doubtless stand high at home. Some of them are capitalists; some of them are bankers; some of them are active business men; many are deacons in evangelical churches or vestrymen in Episcopal ones. Doubtless all of them pray loudly in the front benches with an occasional petition to the Most High for the publicans and sinners out here in California where we do not pray so loudly nor go to church so much. But we usually pay our debts. Most of us are honest, and the thieves and rogues among us we send to jail. Unfortunately California's laws do not extend to Connecticut, whence comes the National Fire Insurance Company. Connecticut was once the home of the old Blue Laws, famous for their severity. Traveling, for example, was forbidden on Sunday. We cannot conceive what kind of laws have succeeded to the Connecticut Blue Laws, if the men now trying to avoid their just debts are typical of the men of Connecticut. If the laws are no better than the men, we fear that the old colony has fallen into evil days. If some of these insurance confidence men shall succeed in their inter-State swindles, and shall rob the citizens of another commonwealth because of differing laws, it will be an added argument to the many in favor of uniform Federal laws throughout the Republic. That, however, will do little good to the defrauded policy holders of California. If these Eastern bunco steerers succeed in their confidence games, we hope that the defrauded policy holders will organize, raise a little money, classify and identify the men concerned, separate the honest men from the rogues, and then blast their business and private reputations in their own homes.

Hearst and Bryan.

Some months ago the Argonaut printed an editorial article speaking of the return of Mr. Bryan to this country after his tour of the world, and predicted that the prestige of his New York reception would probably give a marked impetus to his Presidential boom. Likening great things to small, we compared Mr. Bryan's reception with the return of General Grant. The boom seems to be launched earlier than we had expected. It is somewhat premature, the politicians say, but that may or may not be true.

While Mr. Bryan has been writing regularly for publication during his tour, he has carefully refrained from any comments on American politics. Within a week, however, a letter has arrived in New York City written from Constantinople to a personal friend, in which Mr. Bryan said:

"It is time to call a halt on Socialism in the United States. The movement is going too far."

This significant sentence has been published far and wide within the last few days. It is construed as a direct defiance to William Randolph Hearst.

For some time, so rumor runs, the Hearst newspapers have carefully excluded the name of Bryan from their columns. At this juncture it was deemed interesting by the Indianapolis Star to telegraph to Mr. Hearst asking him for his opinion on the enthusiastic indorsements of Mr. Bryan lately expressed in various quarters. In reply Mr. Hearst telegraphed:

I have been for many years a sincere friend and earnest supporter of Mr. Bryan. I rejoice in his achievements and successes and I approve of every honest indorsement of him.

Personally I would never welcome into the company of loyal friends of Bryan and sincere advocates of good government any such men as Tom Taggart, gambling-house keeper; or Tim Sullivan, keeper of dives and brothels, lord protector of Chinese crooks and criminals; nor would I ever welcome such men as Pat McCarren, election thug, or George McClellan, election thief, nor such Captain Kidds of industry as Belmont and Morgan and Dave Francis, all of whom with their mercenaries were last mustered under the stained and draggled banners of Cleveland and the corporations.

I am confident that Mr. Bryan will repudiate utterly these men and their professions of friendship, realizing that they are not honestly in favor of any man or any measure that will protect the interests of the plain people of this country.

William Randolph Hearst.

The men whom Mr. Hearst scores so bitterly are prominent in the councils of the Democratic party. His declaration is therefore not enigmatic. It amounts to serving notice on Mr. Bryan that he must repudiate the present leaders of the Democratic party and strike hands with the Hearst faction if he would seek to have their support. Whether he would get it or not after repudiating the other faction remains to be seen. We are quixotic enough to believe that Mr. Hearst so bitterly hates the Cleveland faction and the Parker "safe and sane Democracy" that he would support Bryan even at the cost of his own Presidential ambition rather than see Bryan ally himself with that faction.

But where personal ambition is so dominant a factor, it would be useless to speculate as to the action of the two men. It is quite evident that the "safe and sane Democracy" have determined to support Bryan. David Francis—former Governor of Missouri and Secretary of the Interior in the Cabinet of President Cleveland—addressed the Missouri Democratic State Convention on June 10th. He declared that the conservative branch of the Democratic party could now reunite with the radical branch in supporting Bryan for the Presidency in 1908. He uttered these significant words concerning Bryan:

"I have differed with this man on a question of principles, but never have I doubted his integrity. His singleness of purpose and his loyalty to what he believed to be right have won him the admiration of the world. I have never questioned his patriotism or his splendid courage as a statesman."

Further phrases by Governor Francis concerning Bryan are: "A typical American," "receiving honors with dignity," "great breadth of his mind," "he has gained by experience," "ability to fill any office within the gift of the people," "a sincere lover of liberty," "a patriotic citizen." From these it is quite apparent that the Cleveland faction has determined to support Mr. Bryan.

It is only about a fortnight since the Bryan boom began to break out. Indiana began by eulogizing him in the Democratic platform and pledging that State's electoral vote to him. Missouri formally endorsed him in its State Convention for nomination in 1908. Arkansas unanimously endorsed him in its State Convention, and South Dakota in its State Convention also unanimously endorsed him for the Presidency.

There can be no doubt as to the genuineness of the enthusiasm in these Western and South-Western states for Bryan. In the East, however, the Bryan boom is not so spontaneous. It may be looked upon as the outgrowth of a desire on the part of Democratic leaders to kill off the Hearst boom. It may be that they are insincere, and that they hope, after killing off Hearst, to replace Bryan with a more ductile candidate. But we doubt their ability to bring this to pass. As is hinted above, if Hearst should consider that there was danger of Bryan falling into the embraces of the Cleveland faction, he would rather elect Bryan than a candidate coming from the Cleveland camp. There is even talk, in such a contingency, of Hearst being willing to take the second place on the ticket under Bryan. This, however, we doubt.

Republican leaders are gazing on this curious swarming in the Democratic bee hive with mingled feelings. They would denounce Bryan as too radical and as socialistic, but for the fact that President Roosevelt has gone farther in some directions than Mr. Bryan ever dreamed of. The President's latest scheme for a graduated income tax, planned to reduce abnormal fortunes, is much more socialistic than Bryan's; and if, as is not unlikely, the ticket should be in 1908 Roosevelt against Bryan, the "conservative" Republicans, the Republican leaders say, may vote for Bryan.

In the meantime the great Democracy are looking forward with keen interest to Mr. Bryan's return. He is due in New York in August, say some six weeks from now, and special trains are to run from all over the country bearing Democratic statesmen to meet him. The address of welcome will be delivered by James J. Willett of Alabama, heading a delegation of representative southern Democrats. Willett is the man who supported Bryan in '96 and broke away from him in '99. His coming back into the Bryan fold is significant. In the House of Representatives a committee of Democratic Congressmen is being selected to go to New York and welcome the returning traveler. The only trouble is that the entire Democratic side of the House wants to go on the committee.

Altogether the Presidential campaign of 1908 is opening up a trifle early in Democratic circles, but it is going to make mighty interesting reading.

Bunco Game of the Traders Company.

Readers of the daily papers are familiar with the recent attempt of a Chicago attorney at a meeting of the California policy holders of the Traders Company, to make a compromise. It would now seem as if he were not authorized or accredited by any person in authority. He imposed upon the callers of the meeting by stating that he was "the attorney of the receiver"; he subsequently admitted, however, that he was not the receiver's attorney but "represented a number of large stock holders." He offered to induce these benevolent stock holders to pay enough money out of their own pockets to reimburse the California policy holders if the latter agreed to scale down their claims to a sum under sixty per cent of the face value. This proposition was made at a called meeting of the policy holders. It was promptly rejected, and a committee was appointed to ascertain the resources of the insolvent Traders Company.

It now looks as if Bates, the Chicago attorney, had been sent out as a stool pigeon, the stockholders intending to back up his action if he made a good deal, and ostensibly to repudiate him otherwise. J. J. Mitchell, one of the directors of the company, is quoted in a dispatch from Chicago as saying that Bates "was not authorized to make any proposition for a settlement." Mitchell, by the way, is continually giving out optimistic interviews, and persists in saying that he believes "the Traders liabilities will be paid in full."

The process of liquidation is going on in Chicago. Receiver Byron J. Smith last week obtained orders from court permitting him to sell securities belonging to the Traders, including stock in the First National Bank of Chicago and stock in the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad Company. These two items, however, only aggregate about $250,000. Chicago attorneys retained by the Traders Company continue to give out opinions holding that its stockholders are not individually liable. Other attorneys hold differently. As the California policy holders would probably not receive more than thirty or forty per cent of their just dues under the receivership, and perhaps not that, it would be good policy for them to spend some money in testing the question. If they organize in corporate form, they can get a good deal more than the sixty percent offered by the stockholders' stool pigeon. The mere fact that the stockholders offered that amount showed that they thought the claim was worth more. It is whispered that the Traders desire to form a new company or to rehabilitate the old, in order to share in the rich crop of new insurance at high rates which will follow our great fire. Hence the desire to settle.

There are over two thousand policy holders of the Traders in San Francisco alone. So small a call as twenty dollars apiece if they all were incorporated would raise the sum of $40,000. This would do a great deal toward ascertaining the legal liability of some of the rich Traders stockholders as tested in the Federal Court of Illinois. Corporate organization would also do much toward strengthening the attitude of the policy holders in dealing with those of the Traders stockholders who desire to continue in the insurance business. If any of those gentlemen desire to take up that business again, a corporation of policy holders could see that they did it with fairly clean hands, or interfere seriously with their infant industry.

An attempt is now under way to incorporate the Traders policy holders, which will probably succeed. This plan followed an attempt on the part of an "association" of Policy holders to ascertain these facts from the receiver:

1. What are the assets of the Traders Company?
2. What are its liabilities?
3. What is its surplus and reserve?
4. Who are the stockholders?

To these questions the receiver refused a reply. An attempt was then made to get the Federal Court in Chicago, which appointed the receiver, to extend the time for filing proofs of loss. This very moderate petition was promptly denied. Chicago attorneys who were "wise" informed the policy holders committee that the Traders' stockholders had great political influence in Chicago and a strong "pull" with the court. Seeing they were up against a hard fight the wavering policy holders at last decided to incorporate.

We are very glad to hear it. There is now a slight chance that they may get some of their money. Even if they do not they may put some rich insurance rascals behind the bars.

Hearst's Fight in New York State.

Mr. Hearst's battle in New York State for the position of a "favorite son" is going on again. Recent rumors of a possible alliance between Charles T. Murphy and Mr. Hearst are interesting. It is said that an agreement has been arrived at by which Boss Murphy is to receive the assistance of the Hearst organization for his district leaders in the coming primary fight; that in return Murphy is to deliver the 105 New York City delegates to the State Convention pledged to Hearst. A majority of the Tammany men do not believe that Murphy will ally himself with Hearst, but if he does they admit that Hearst's election as Governor is probably assured. If he be elected, Mr. Hearst's first step will be promptly to remove Mayor McClellan from office.

In New York State as in National politics the need of meeting Hearst with a pronounced radical candidate is shown by the talk of District Attorney Jerome as a candidate for Governor. Hearst's following is confident of electing him as an independent candidate, even if he should not succeed in getting the Democratic nomination. In fact, he seems indifferent to the regular nomination. His enemies in the Democratic party believe that Jerome would be more apt to hold the party organization against Hearst than any other Democrat. Furthermore, Jerome's popularity as a vote getter in stumping the State makes them think that he will make the best run against Hearst.

What effect the sudden breaking out of the Bryan boom throughout the country will have on Mr. Hearst's gubernatorial boom in New York State remains to be seen.

The Case of Senator Smoot.

It is evident that Senator Smoot is to be disqualified from serving as Senator from Utah. He is a Mormon, and, while not a polygamist, he is believed to represent polygamists. The case has caused much discussion, and it is evident that there is a strong feeling among many men that the action of the Senate against Senator Smoot is unwarranted and is by way of persecution. We do not believe that the Federal laws against plural cohabitation could go into effect throughout the States of the Federal Union without putting many thousands of ostensible moral men into jail. We do not believe that men generally throughout the States of the Federal Union live on quite so high a moral plane as they seem to demand from the Mormons. But that is not the question at issue. The question is the eligibility of Senator Smoot, and it is one which concerns the Senate only. Under the Constitution that body has the right to pass upon the qualifications of its own members. It has decided against Senator Smoot. Hereafter he will be Mr. Smoot.

Free Building Materials for San Francisco.

We are not going to get them. The California delegation is making too faint hearted an attempt to procure the passage of the bill giving draw-backs on imported building material. Representative Kahn has been the spokesman for the delegation, and he is under the influence of the "stand patters." Furthermore, the California delegation stands in awe of the Pacific Coast Lumber Trust. In excuse for their luke-warm advocacy of this bill, the California members say that they demanded assurance from the Democratic leader that "the whole tariff question should not be opened up." But he refused. What of it? What if it should be opened up? Have not the Republicans enough of a majority to defeat the Democrats? Or do the California delegation fear that there are so many Republicans desiring tariff revision that the Californians might pass their bill and thus help the distress of San Francisco?

Representative Kahn in his speech said: "A bill of this kind would practically afford no relief at all, because it takes more than a year to put up a building of structural steel, and a one-year drawback would probably be of no use to the people at all."

Half a loaf is better than no bread.

Mr. Kahn said: "The members of the California delegation have been assured by the steel manufacturers that California orders would be given preference over all other orders."

Thanks awfully.

Mr. Kahn said: "Steel manufacturers assure us that there will be no attempt to raise the prices on structural steel for San Francisco."

At steel manufacturers' perjuries, they say, Jove laughs.

Mr. Kahn said: "The only cement that has increased in value in San Francisco is foreign imported cement."

Secretary of War Taft declares that all foreign cements are cheaper than any American cements.

Mr. Kalin said: "I have assurances that the prices of California cement will not be raised."

Tariff draw-backs would be more satisfactory than cement manufacturers' assurances or Mr. Kahn's belief in them.

Mr. Kahn said: "The Republican party will not consent to allow San Francisco to be mulcted in the price of cement, or any other commodity that will enter into the construction of her buildings."

If so, why does not the Republican party put its benevolent intentions into the concrete form of law? It has the power.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Newspaper Man's Advance Subscription.

Every newspaper man knows how hard it is for a fellow newspaper man to pay out cold hard cash as subscription to another newspaper, when he has been in the habit for years of receiving the cream of the periodical press all over the country in his exchange list, without money and without price. But here is not only a subscription from a newspaper man, but an advance subscription for two years, and one dated from the present issue, although his present subscription to the Argonaut does not expire until next October. The name of this newspaper man is Virgil Wheeler and he is Circulation Manager of the Tacoma Daily News. We thank Mr. Wheeler for his encouragement and for his advance subscription, but more than either for the eulogistic way in which he speaks of the Argonaut:

Tacoma, Wash., May 26, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed find check for two years' subscription to the Argonaut. My present subscription expires some time in October, but I will ask you to date the renewal from now. I have been a reader of the Argonaut for fifteen or sixteen years and have always greatly enjoyed it. I want to congratulate you on getting your paper to your subscribers without missing a number.

I am in a position to judge of the difficulties you had to encounter, being in the newspaper business myself.

In common with every one else, I greatly regret the awful loss you have sustained and hope you will speedily recover.

Yours truly,

VIRGIL WHEELER.

A Subscription up to 1911.

Merced, Cal., June 1, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have just returned from the East, and seizing on the files of the Argonaut since that fateful 18th of April, I commenced reading up, in detail, current events of which the Argonaut has ever been a faithful chronicler. I grieve over your great and irreparable loss with a grief only less than your own. I think the particular incentive to write this letter was reading the history of that two-dollar bill from Portugal. I have been a subscriber to the Argonaut nearly, if not quite, since its first publication; and during all the ups and downs of that period, I have considered the Argonaut the one luxury, the one necessity, I could not do without.

Now, therefore, regardless of the date on which my present subscription expires, please find enclosed five years' subscription to the Argonaut from April 18, 1906.

Yours loyally after the resurrection.

L. R. FANCHER.

A Reader for Twenty Years Becomes a Subscriber.

San Francisco, Cal., May 31, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Since my first introduction to your splendid journal, some twenty years ago, I have been a constant reader. Like a great many of your correspondents, I have never felt that I could do without my weekly treat. But instead of being provident I have during that time bought the Argonaut from a boy who called at the office regularly with it, and to provide for the future I have been promising myself to buy as many bound volumes as I could. Now this promise can not be kept, and I am a sufferer through my own procrastination. The Argonaut boy, to add to my troubles, no longer comes, so to be sure of my Argonaut, I beg to enroll myself a regular subscriber and enclose herein $4.00 for a year; if towards its close you will kindly call my attention to the matter I shall (D. V., Earthquakes V., Fires V., etc., etc.) take pleasure in renewing the subscription. With best wishes for the future of your journal, and trusting you will soon be able to get it out in its usual attractive style, I am,

Yours respectfully,

A. G. D. KERRELL.

P. S.—I found in our lumber room a few loose copies, which in accordance with your suggestion in last week's issue I am sending by express.

A Subscriber from the First Year.

Salem, Oregon, May 29, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I note that the Argonaut has been issued regularly notwithstanding the fire. But the number following that disaster failed to reach me, and enclose stamps for a copy of that issue.

Permit me to congratulate the Argonaut upon its pluck. If you have saved your old records you will find that I have been a reader from the first year of its publication. There is this to be said of the Argonaut at all times, "It is always interesting."

Yours truly,

CLAUD GATCH

Clear-Sighted Counsel.

San Francisco, May 31, 1906.

Dear Argonaut: Herewith find dollar-bill, for which please send me two each of first two issues after fire and one each of issues since—to such an extent as the money lasts. I want to send them to friends in Europe, for I consider you give the most graphic and faithful story of the double disaster. It is refreshing that such clear-sighted counsellors as your paper still remain for us.

Yours truly,

JAMES SPROULE.

The Argonaut Habit Cannot Be Broken.

Berkeley, June 2, 1906.

Dear Argonaut: Welcome, a thousand times welcome, even though you did appear again for some weeks in long clothes! The only thing which has made us heartily laugh since April eighteenth is your delicate handling of Mr. A. Hartuppe McKee. The unusual events of April eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth, removed us from San Francisco to Berkeley, where we hope you will send the Argonaut. For the Argonaut habit can not be broken without injury to the breaker. The rain has spoiled the cherries, and everything has gone wrong, but so long as you have pen, ink and paper we shall not be utterly cast down.

Reducedly, but sincerely, yours,

REGINA E. WILSON.

Seeing the Old Familiar Argonaut Again.

Denver, May 31st.

Dear Mr. Hart: I have some odd numbers of the Argonaut which I am sending you by Wells Fargo. Not because I do not care for them, for I do, but that I feel I would be selfish to keep them when you tell your readers what need you have of files. I can fully sympathize with you in the loss of your files, for I had a set of bound Argonauts from the first number stored in San Francisco with other of my belongings, and had intended to have them forwarded. Alas, where are they now?

I was never more pleased in my life than when I saw the familiar name of the Argonaut once more after the fire. It seemed like a lost friend unexpectedly come home again.

Sincerely yours,

AMELIA E. NEVILLE.

From Friends in Wyoming.

2103 Warren Ave., Cheyenne, Wyo., June 1.

Editor Argonaut: Owing to the devoted faithfulness of my sister, Mrs. Bernard Faymonville, of San Francisco, my husband and I have had the great pleasure of reading the Argonaut weekly since the beginning of 1882. We have '82, '83, '84 bound. Since then the papers have been given to friends, hospitals, prisons, etc. We are now sending to you by Wells Fargo a few numbers that I have, for various reasons, laid by for the past ten years or more. We hope they will be of some benefit to you.

We have wept, and the tears still blind our eyes at mention, or thought of the fate of beloved San Francisco. We are bound to her by many ties. It seemed to me one year ago that only prosperity belonged to that beautiful city of the Golden Gate.

In sympathy we are yours,
MR. AND MRS. HENRY CONWAY.

Courageous San Franciscans.

Mazatlan, Mexico, May 27, 1906.

Jerome A. Hart, Esq. My Dear Sir: I have to thank you sincerely for sending me your issues from April 21st on, the earlier of which were quite a surprise, for we had hardly expected to see the Argonaut again. It shows amazing fortitude on your part to have gone to work on the morrow of all your irreparable and heart-breaking losses to get out these numbers, which must be ever highly treasured by your subscribers, all of whom are your friends. Indeed, the courageous manner in which all San Franciscans are standing up under this overwhelming calamity is a very noble spectacle. Yet how sad to think that the city one has known and seen grow during the last thirty years is gone, never to be the same again. One can only trust that time may soften the remembrance of the calamity, while repairing at least your financial losses, and that we may always have the old bright Argonaut that we loved "in the years before the earthquake."

With the most sincere sympathy and best wishes of myself and family,

Believe me very truly yours,
GERALD E. WARD.

Argonauts for Our Files.

In response to the Argonaut's request for loose and unconnected copies of the Argonaut which we would be glad to have in order to build up complete files, we have received packages of papers from a number of our readers. Among the many who have very kindly sent us papers and to whom we extend our thanks are the following:

Mr. John Parrott, Chico, Cal.
Mr. E. Roemer, 1726 Lincoln Ave., Alameda.
Mr. Herbert Fryer, Camulos, Cal.
Mrs. Grimes, Cupertino, Santa Clara Co., Cal.
Mr. Geo. D. Hildebrand, 678 16th St., Oakland.
Mr. R. L. Gunn, Hamilton, Canada.
Dr. Raffaele Lorini, Coronado, Cal.
Mr. G. A. Williamson, Modesto, Cal.
Mr. C. G. Lathrop, 349 S. Tenth St., San Jose.
Mr. E. J. Okell, Suisun, Cal.
Mr. J. H. Grvine, Seattle, Wash.
Mrs. Henry Conway, Cheyenne, Wyo.
Mr. George L. Grimes, San Francisco.
Mr. J. F. Bigelow, San Francisco.
Mr. John Lawton, Folsom, Cal.
Mr. Wm. A. Bowden, Alameda Ave., San Jose.
Mr. F. W. Roeding, Cheyenne, Wyo.
Mr. A. H. Nahor, Iowa Hill, Placer Co., Cal.
E. G. S., Ross Valley, Cal.
Mr. A. J. Jennings, Martinez, Cal.
Mr. Geo. W. Morton, Vallejo, Cal.
Mr. A. G. D. Kerrell, San Francisco.
Mr. G. W. Wilson, Vallejo, Cal.
Mr. R. B. Thomas, 2356 Fifth St., San Diego, Cal.
Mr. A. E. Horlock, Hanford, Cal.
Mrs. A. E. Neville, Denver, Colo.
Mr. S. P. Johnston, 1726 Steiner St., San Francisco.
Mr. A. Weill, Bakersfield, Cal.
H. V., San Jose.
W. A. Carson, Chicago.
F. J. Martin, Kansas City, Mo.
G. C. Elliott, Los Angeles.

In addition to the above named we have received a number of parcels of Argonauts by mail with no sender's name on the wrapper.

SCHMITZ AND RUEF.

An Authorized Interview in the Bee—Ruef Denies That Schmitz is a Gubernatorial Candidate—He Pays His Respects to the Press.

Not long after the San Francisco fire the Examiner fell upon Mayor Schmitz and his political and personal friend, Mr. Ruef, with the utmost fierceness. The vigor of the attack aroused some surprise. Its ostensible cause was that the two had been in favor of granting a trolley privilege to the United Railroads. The Sacramento Bee had a long interview last week with Mr. Ruef at Sacramento, whither he had gone to advocate the bill conferring on San Francisco's Supervisors the right to buy and sell the city's real property. Concerning the trolley franchise, Mr. Ruef said:

"I want to say right now that I would have been in favor of granting that franchise to the United Railroads, whether or not the trolley is the best system, simply because of the splendid behavior of that corporation after the fire. Its conduct was most liberal and helpful, and has earned the lasting gratitude of the city. But, considered on its merits alone, I believe the trolley is the right thing under present conditions—the only feasible thing, in fact, if we are to have an efficient street railroad system. Certainly the United Railroads would not spend millions of dollars in putting in underground conduits, so it was a question of sticking to the old, slow cable lines, after long delays in reconstruction, or having a modern electric system.

"All talk of graft in this matter is false. The grant of the trolley franchise is satisfactory to at least nine-tenths of the people of San Francisco. And you will notice that in spite of the Examiner's denunciation of it, it has not opposed the Ocean Shore line, which provides a trolley system on Twelfth street to Market. If the trolley is all right on that line, why not on others?"

Mr. Ruef paid the following tribute to Mayor Schmitz:

"I have known Schmitz for many years as a thoroughly honest, able and independent man, of great force of character and tremendous energy. It is not true, as some say, that he is governed by me. I help him all I can, but the people have had a chance to see lately that he can do his own thinking and take the proper initiative. And I would like to ask his critics if such men as Fairfax Wheelan would have had the magnanimity, in the Mayor's place, to call around him, as Schmitz did, some of his strongest political opponents and detractors to aid in the preservation of order and provide for the rehabilitation of the city?"

Ruef was asked what effect the disaster would be likely to have on the political outlook in California, and especially on the prospects of Governor Pardee for renomination and election.

"I have given no thought to politics since the fire," said Ruef, without a smile. "My time has been taken up entirely with more pressing things. But I may say that most of the San Francisco voters who are now on the Alameda side of the bay will vote in their home districts. They still retain their legal residence in San Francisco, unless they choose to adopt a new one. As to whether Schmitz is a candidate for the Governorship, I am free to say I believe he could be elected, even if he ran on an independent ticket. But he is not a candidate. He believes he is called to stand by San Francisco during the trying time to come, and regards himself as having almost a supernatural call to devote himself to the city's needs and welfare. He certainly is the man for the place and the hour."

It was suggested to Ruef that he might have something to say regarding the charges of grafting constantly laid at his door.

"It is all a pack of lies," declared Ruef, vigorously. "I will give any man $1000 who can produce proof of any grafting on my part. A lot of people think a man cannot be in politics except for money. But let me tell you that I was worth $500,000 five years ago, when Schmitz was first elected Mayor, and that my income has since suffered, instead of gained, for my activity in politics. I worked for his election, in the first instance, not for his sake, but because I wanted to beat somebody else. And I have still enemies to punish and friends to aid."

Ruef then paid his respects to the San Francisco press:

"As to the power of the press in San Francisco, everybody has seen how little it could do against Schmitz. Why, in the last election the newspapers there, with the exception of the little Post, were all against him. And so it has been right along. An honest man, with fighting qualities and independence, can afford to ignore the attacks of the San Francisco newspapers. They do him no harm politically, although he may suffer personally, and his family likewise. No one likes to be abused. I am myself one of the most sensitive of men, but never a quitter because of attack and detraction."

Concerning Ruef personally, the Bee's interview says:

He is of Jewish and French extraction. His appearance does not accord with the popular notion of a political boss. His apparel is of the simple sort, and his manners are quiet and agreeable. In talk he is courteous and deferential. He is ready and adroit in answering questions and stating his views, and with an appearance of candor can skillfully evade a query he is not disposed to answer directly. His ability is superior, in legal matters as well as in politics, and as a campaign and political manager there is probably no more capable, resourceful and effective man in the United States."

Dr. De Vecchi's Appeal.

Dr. Paolo De Vecchi, the well-known physician and surgeon of San Francisco, was in Rome with his family at the time of the terrible catastrophe which devastated the city in which he has lived for twenty-five years, and to which he is as devoted as any native son. Fired by a generous indignation at the apathy of the Italians towards their fellow countrymen in California he sent the following letter to La Tribuna, a Roman daily.

Again I avail myself of the courtesy of your journal to speak of San Francisco. I am mortified at the indifference of Italy towards our colonies, and especially the one in San Francisco, so large, so worthy, and so patriotic, as shown whenever Italy has mourned—in '96 by the misfortunes in Africa, at the time of the earthquake of Liguria, the floods of Veneto and the death of Umberto I, when with warm hearts and with open purses they came to the aid of the mother country.

Today, some 25,000 Italians, who are all a fountain of richness for their own country to whom they send annually millions of francs, today this colony which is the best of all our colonies, crushed by an overwhelming grief, by a tremendous ruin, find no generous response in this Italy which has always been called the land of sentiment.

Why have not the people manifested the sympathy shown by other nations? Why has the government made no sign? Why have all shown such cold-indifference?

Could not the Committee of Emigration offer to reciprocate some of these millionaires, lend them without interest, to assist in the model colony, lend it temporarily, for a national decency, from a grateful fatherland, for nothing else, for the return which is due to come when the colony is on its feet again?

Why could not part of the colonial fund be sent to the Italian banks of San Francisco as a loan to be used only in re-establishing the Italian quarter in San Francisco? Why could they not delegate a commission to rapidly study such a proposition, put it quickly in effect through the Bank of Naples, whom the financial condition of our bank and of our merchants in San Francisco well known? Do it quickly. Say the word which shall comfort and encourage the not sons of Italy who are living in anxiety and who certainly will not forget what the mother country does for them.

The Argonaut of April 21.

Have any readers spare copies of the number? If so, and if they will kindly mail them here they will much oblige the Librarians of several of the great libraries of the country that failed to receive their copies through trouble in the San Francisco Post office the week of the fire.

The conversion of Princess Ena to Roman Catholicism recalls that the Hon. Mary and Hon. Margaret Russell, daughters of the late Lord Russell of Killowen, are now both nuns in the Convent of the Holy Child Mayfield, Sussex; and also the Hon. Violet Gibson, the pretty daughter of Lord and Lady Ashbourne. The Duke of Norfolk has two sisters who are nuns, Lady Minna Howard belongs to the Carmelite Order, a Lady Etheldreda Howard is a Sister of Charity. Lady Edith Fielding, sister of Lord Denbigh, is another Sister of Charity and cheerfully endures exile at a convent in China. Lady Maria Christina Bandiera, daughter of Lord Newburgh, is at a Sacred Heart convent on the continent; La Frances Bertie, sister to Lord Abinger, resides in a convent at Harrow, and La Leopoldina Keppel, sister to Lord Almarley, is a nun of the Sacred Heart.

THE MAN AND THE SNAKE.

All round the circle of the hills the dazzling sky pressed down unclouded to the touch of the parched rim-rock. Between the hills the shallow basin lay baked and breathless. Over it the tense air quivered with heat. Within, no bird fluttered nor water purled nor green plant raised its head. Only the desert children, sage-brush and grease-wood and long-spined cactus, gray but never dying, lived on there in the drought, sterile and forbidding as the land which gave them birth.

Everywhere was silence upon the place, everywhere was immobility, save where the man lay and where beside him the bound snake whirled and writhed and rattled in the impotent fury of fear.

The man lay stretched on the hot earth stark naked, his face turned to the sky. A buckskin thong passed across his throat and was drawn taut between two roots of sage-brush. The noose which held his ankles was secured about a clump of grease-wood and both arms, thonged at the wrists, stretched wide as in crucifixion. Heavy bands of buckskin spanned his body so that to the prisoner there were left but two possible movements. He could turn his head from side to side, facing on the one hand the snake, on the other the miniature forest of sage-brush; and he could clench and unclench his pinioned hands.

In this last freedom the final ingenuity of savage captors had found expression. With the left hand tight clenched, the snake's wild stroke fell just short of its aim. Should sleep or insensibility relax the fingers, the reptile's head might overlap them.

Since early morning, through the increasing heat of the day, the man had lain there, grim and silent as the gray hills around him, save when now and then he raised his hoarse voice in defiant shouts. The snake, on the other hand, struggled and fought unceasingly against the cord which held him, striking impartially at it, at the just removed fingers or at the wooden stake to which the cord was tied, grovelling his body in the sandy earth, writhing and tugging with protruding tongue, and all the while translating in whirr and hiss the blind fear of his captivity.

Sometimes the man turned his head to watch; once or twice when the snake's movements flagged he slightly stirred his fingers in the sand, the ruse each time rewarded by the swift spring and fruitless stroke. But mostly he lay still, all his mind bent on endurance.

The man had been placed there to die. He knew it and the knowledge tinged his thoughts with a strange curiosity. There were three ways in which death might reach him; through the snake, through sunstroke or by the weary route of thirst and hunger. The second and quickest of these ways the light mountain air, vibrantly hot though it might be, rendered improbable. For the snake, it was a part of the man's torment that at any minute he might stretch forth his hand and by the movement invite an end, brief indeed, but horrible to the mind, doubly horrible to the strained imagination.

There was one other chance. An unexpected rain-storm, a heavy night dew in that barren place, would so stretch the slender buckskin thong which held the rattler that unaided he might reach and strike his victim. This was the element of uncertainty in the grim problem. This it was that sent the man's eyes searching the bare horizon with a look half dread, half longing.

On one of these weary journeys of sight a tiny speck of black above the western hills attracted him—a steady pin-point in the dazzling blue. He shut his eyes a moment in order to look again the more intently, and when he opened them, lo! the dark points were two. He watched them uncomprehendingly, as slowly and steadily high in air they moved from west to east. When at last in mid-heaven the sun's sheer strength beat down his gaze, he was the lonelier for loss of this one sign of movement.

The sense of heat had by now grown into anguish. The man's exposed body drew and quivered beneath the sun's rays as though each inch of it were endowed with a separate life. Unseen insects brushed and fluttered upon it, leaving beneath their light pressure a trail like fire on the blistered surface. The snake lay prone, exhausted almost beyond striking. The man, noting it, smiled grimly and scraped his fingers noisily in the loose earth. As the snake whirled to front the challenge, he curled his hand close with a taunt for its futile effort.

He was thus engrossed when suddenly across his face swept a sense of delicious coolness. He turned his head; close above him almost within touch of a free hand, a great black bird, carrion in every movement, hovered on steady, outspread wings. Its shadow fell across his face; its eyes, bead-like and glistening and greedy, looked straight into his own.

For an instant they stared thus, man and bird. Then with a cry the man flung himself against his bonds, struggling and straining at them for escape from this new horror. On his body, dry till now, the sweat poured forth in streams. Blood gushed from his nostrils. With shrieks, with oaths, with stumbling words of prayer, he fought against the fate which held him.

Not once but many times the struggle was repeated. When at last, exhausted, his convulsed body fell back to quiet, the bird was gone. Shudderingly the man raised his eyes. Far up, half lost in blue, but ready, tireless, it hung above him.

"God!" breathed the prisoner, "God!" and turning his blanched cheek to the sand, he fell into a sort of sleep.

All through the waning day he slept, through the approach of night and the swift desert change from heat to cold. When he awoke the first pale amethyst of dawn was in the sky. The snake was sleeping, not as snakes are wont to sleep in freedom, head tucked to tail and sinuous fold lapping on fold, but with his swollen body back-thrown and stiffened against the stake which held him, caught mid-struggle by insensibility.

The man turned his head to face him.

"Hey, rattler!" he called cheerily, and scraped some grains of sand toward the recumbent body.

But when he saw the start and shudder with which the creature woke, the anguish of returning consciousness, suddenly he was sorry for his act. When the snake, writhing round, struck at its cord quivering from head to tail, he would have given an hour of his own rest to have restored the sleep which he had broken.

The sun rose presently. Again the weary panorama of the day unrolled before the eyes of the two victims. The snake was quiet, weakened by his long struggle. The man, strengthened by sleep, restored by the night's cold, held himself strongly in hand.

Sometimes, indeed, the growing heat drew from his lips a broken sigh. Sometimes birds, many now, swooped low around him with hoarse cries and flapping of heavy wings; at such times his whole body grew tense beneath the stress of almost uncontrollable disgust and terror. But he lay still. Not for his reason's sake dared he again give way to the expression of fear. It was a comfort to him in these moments that the snake showed no apprehension of their gruesome neighbors or eyed them only with the avid eyes of hunger. Watching the indifference of the reptile, the man feared less. Fixing his eyes upon it, he could hold hard to sanity and to endurance, though around him perched and hovered the vulture ministers of death.

But as the morning passed a new anxiety should die first? It seemed to weaken with every hour and the man trembled. He spoke to it soothingly at times and had, or believed he had, the power of quieting its paroxysms. In his fevered mind he searched haltingly for some knowledge of its needs. Would it live longer for the taking of his life? And if by stretching out his hand he could delay its end, what then of the lengthening of its pain? Before his dimming eyes, the snake loomed, now a refuge, now a menace. A dozen times, he half relaxed his hand only to draw it quickly close again. Once when the snake fell in its spring, seemingly dead, he thrust the fingers wide with a cry of utter deprivation. When it moved again he drew them in, the instinctive love of life still strong upon him.

A buzzard had risen at his cry and perched on the sage-brush at his head. He studied it quietly for a while, its coarse, dragged feathers, its filmed eyes and cruel beak. When the scrutiny had grown intolerable, he strove to shout to scare it from its place. His voice came dry and breathless, scarcely a whisper, and the bird swayed back and forth unmoved.

He closed his eyes after this and for a long time lay still, only rolling his head from side to side that the vultures might not light upon his body.

At last, when the sun lay low on the horizon, he ceased the movement and again looked about him. Overhead a cloud of birds, scared by the sudden quiet, hung high in air; swarms of ants and lesser insects crawled and fed upon his arms and body; the sage-brush all around rustled with pungent dryness and to the west the sky burned hard and bright as burnished copper.

For a long minute he waited. Then, with a sobbing breath, he flung round, straining his body against the cords which held him.

The snake too had moved. The throng that bound it was drawn taut and painfully it had thrust its swollen head across the fingers. It lay thus, outstretched, not striking, its glazing eyes on the man's face.

And while they lay so suddenly there came to pass the impossible, the one uncounted chance. From far across the desolate sage-brush desert, sounded to them the barking of a dog.

It came nearer and with it the creak and grinding of heavy wheels. The man strove to cry out and, failing, gnawed desperately at his baked lips and tongue. When the feeble trickle of blood which paid his efforts had moistened his dry throat, he raised his voice in shrill and terrible cries. Above him at the sound the startled birds swirled to the west. The snake, too weak to spring, had yet dragged himself to a coil, his flat head raised in air.

Between his cries the man could hear the abrupt stopping of the wagon, the confused exclamation of men's voices. Next instant the dog's moist breath whiffed on his forehead and a man's face bent to his own. There was a sudden tightening of the buckskin thongs as a knife passed beneath them, its cool blade searing like fire on the blistered flesh. Hands dragged him from his place. A man on either side he was held erect. Through a maze of pain and weakness, he could hear the comment of his rescuers.

"Alive, all right!"

"God! He'll die on our hands."

"Carry him to the wagon!"

"Look out! Step wide of the rattler!"

Hands beneath his shoulders, they bent to the task of lifting him.

The sufferer sent out a groping hand in protest. He swallowed hard, struggling to speak. His naked foot thrust close—perilously close—to the fanged head of the snake.

"Turn him loose, too," he commanded.

E. MIRRIELES.

Pacific Grove, June, 1906.

Over 6,000 trunks of personal effects are in the hands of the San Francisco police awaiting identification by owners. The trunks were found in various places by the police, in squares, parks, streets and public places where they had been deserted by their owners. All the trunks have been numbered. It is possible for any one searching for his trunk to learn whether it is in the hands of the police at headquarters and giving a description of its contents. The value of the 6,000 trunks now in the hands of the police is large. It is more than likely that a great number of them will never be claimed. After a reasonable time and all due legal requirements have been observed, it is proposed to sell them, with their contents, at auction, and apply the proceeds to the relief fund.

John Alexander Dowie, the deposed leader of the Christian Catholic Church of Zion, is planning to end his days on the shores of Lake Constance, near the city of Constance which is the home of Ruth Hofer. Shortly after Voliva and his aides had proclaimed a revolution in Zion City, the name of Miss Ruth Hofer became linked with that of the aged First Apostle, and it is now said that he is planning to retire to private life on the shores of the beautiful lake.

FIGHTING THE FIRE.

"Them Littery Fellers"—They Prefer Earthquake to Fire—Not in Reality, But as "Copy"—Chief Sullivan's Death—Dynamite Versus Gun Cotton—Army or Navy Fire Fighters.

It is curious, that amid the miles of matter in newspapers and magazines about San Francisco's disaster there should be so much about the earthquake and so little about the fire. Yet the damage done by the earthquake was trivial compared to the devastation by the fire. Put in figures, a large majority of disinterested men would set the earthquake damage at not to exceed five per cent. Yet the loss from fire—in the burned district—was total. It was the greatest fire in the history of the world. Nothing like it was ever known. Moscow to it was a trifle. Even today Moscow is a city of a few palaces and churches and of hordes of hovels: a century ago it must have been worse. San Francisco, on the other hand, although not among the largest was one of the richest cities in the world.

Hence it would seem as if its destruction by a mighty conflagration would call forth infinitely more literary effort than that evoked by the earthquake which preceded it. Yet it is not so. Fire is commonplace; earthquakes are mysterious. Fire is the work of man; the quaking earth is moved by the hand of God.

Hence it is, perhaps, that so many of the writers who have described the disaster dwell upon the earthquake rather than the conflagration. Yet what a succession of startling stories must have occurred during those three terrible days in San Francisco when the firemen and the soldiers fought the fire.

A hint at them may be found in an extract from a letter written by Stephen Russell, a captain in the San Francisco Fire Department, written to his sister in another city. He wrote:

Our fight with the fire lasted amid harrowing and nerve racking scenes for 52 hours without intermission. My company worked all the way from Hayes Valley to Fifth and Market, thence to Van Ness and Golden Gate avenue, thence around my old home on Polk street, thence to Market and Valencia, finally making our last stand at Twentieth and Dolores.

It took two firemen to hold the hose while two more sheltered them with a wet blanket. And many, many times, we would lie down in the gutter and roll in the water, but it would not be two minutes till we were perfectly dry again. Our coats fell from our backs. Rubber coats lasted no length of time at all. Our caps were burned or baked on our heads. Our feet were blistered by the heat on the rubber boots. Yet every man fought on for 52 hours, when ordinarily a two hours' fight will exhaust a man. The doctors and nurses went up and down the line and injected strychnine into us, so we could go on. And one volunteer citizen, who had good judgment, went up and down the line with a sack and dipped it in the gutter, then applied it to the back of our necks. Many times we were trapped by the fire and could not get the horses to our engines, but always the citizens volunteered and pulled them out for us. The horses were exhausted also and could not pull the engines at times. One place in particular, up a steep hill, we put a rope on the engine and about 500 people got hold and dragged horses, engine and all up the hill. We had over half of our horse burned. And many of the men were delirious at times. We had no conception of time. It was as bright as day at all times. You can imagine how he fought, for we all loved San Francisco and to see her go up in smoke nearly broke our hearts.

The efforts of the fire fighters were largely weakened by the loss of their brave and beloved chief. Had he been in command, the battle against the fire might have been more successful. But he was stricken down by the earthquake in the early morning hours.

Chief Sullivan was not fatally injured at the first shock, but met death on account of his devotion to his wife. The chief's room in the fire station on Bush street, next to the California Hotel, was crushed by the falling turret of the hotel. Had he stayed in it and not rushed into the next room to find his wife it is now certain that he would not have plunged down with the falling floor.

From a report by Captain Cook of Chemical Engine 3, in whose engine house Chief Sullivan made his headquarters, it appears that at the first shower of bricks through the roof of the engine house Mrs. Sullivan was struck and slightly injured. Her cries alarmed Chief Sullivan. He instantly ran from his own room to hers. From his words after he was taken to the hospital it seems certain that he was blinded by the mortar dust and did not pause to see what had happened. The floor of Mrs. Sullivan's room had already given way, and into the hole the chief plunged, to be hurled further into the debris. He picked himself up and it was seen by the men who ran to his assistance that he was not only badly injured by the fall, but was badly scalded by being thrown against the hot pipes of the heating radiator. He was taken to the Receiving Hospital. There the building was in such shape that he was not taken from the wagon, but hurried to the Railroad Hospital, and later in the day was removed to the Presidio Hospital, where he died.

Mrs. Sullivan, who was not dug out from the debris for twenty minutes after the earthquake, was saved from mortal injury by her presence of mind in rolling herself up in her mattress as the floor went down. This covered her and broke the force of the falling bricks.

A pathetic incident of the last hours of the brave chief was when Fire Marshal Towe visited him and successfully concealed from him the fact that the city was in flames. Chief Sullivan died believing that the department he had so long commanded had not met its first defeat.

Concerning Chief Sullivan, an article by William R. Lighton in the Boston Transcript, has this to say:

When the first premonitory shock of the earthquake came, on the morning of April 18, San Francisco's fire department had a chief who knew his business. From all accounts he stood deservedly at the very head and forefront of those in the United States who have spent their lives in mastering the theory and practice of that undervalued, under-paid calling of fire-fighting. His name was Sullivan, and his service in San Francisco had covered a period of many years.

He used to tell the boys that one day San Francisco would be up against the real thing, in the way of a big conflagration—which is the name for a fire that takes on the third dimension.

Sullivan, like many other thoughtful men, had long urged the necessity for an independent system of water supply, under municipal control, designed for fire-fighting. There lay the bay on one side of the peninsula, and the Pacific on the other. His argument was that salt water might be pumped into storage reservoirs on the crests of the scattered hills throughout the city, to be distributed thence through independent mains, which would be at the service of the fire department.

"All right," said Sullivan. "But don't forget what I'm telling you: This town is in an earthquake belt. One of these fine mornings we'll get a shake that will put this little water system out, and then we'll have a fire. What will we do then? Why, we'll have to fight her with dynamite."

For that was another crotchet of his—dynamite. But the people, in their easy sense of security, laughed at him.

On the morning of April 18 came the big earthquake. Then came the fire. It was all worked out exactly according to Sullivan's foretelling.

And Sullivan? His life was crushed out of him at the first shock by a ruined wall which tumbled down upon his engine house, burying him beneath the ruins.

There has been not a little discussion concerning the use of dynamite during the San Francisco fire. Some say that it saved the city; others that it helped to destroy it. Mr. Lighton has very decided ideas about the matter, which he does not hesitate to express:

The fire started in half a hundred places amongst the wreckage. The fire department—as good as any in the West, if not in the country—made a brave start, too; but that was as far as it got with its engines and appliances. The water mains had been twisted and torn and bad burst in many places, and there was no other supply available. The only resource then was explosives, used to demolish buildings in the path of the fire and deprive it of fuel.

No one knows how much dynamite was burned in the struggle; enough for the conduct of a siege. A look over the tumbled square miles of ruins gives proof of the desperate struggle. It was a struggle waged with the hardest courage and the best intentions in the world; yet it was unavailing, because it was not directed by a trained head.

General Funston commanded the situation, to be sure. But (meaning no disparagement of his doughty spirit) his training had not been at all in the line of fire-fighting of that sort. The dynamite squads nominally under his orders worked quite without a common purpose—here a little bunch, there a little bunch, and yonder a little bunch; one of disorganized firemen, one of obedient regulars, and one of willing but inexperienced militiamen. These overwrought groups were scattered over miles, each ordered by its excited subaltern; but more often than not the subaltern voices were drowned by the clamorous hubbub of suggestions, counter-orders and invective from the crowds of spectators; above these puny noises rose the roar of the fire, shot through and punctuated by the thunderous blasts of the explosives.

Mr. Lighton then touches on the explanations offered by the fire fighters for their inability to control the flames:

With this explanation you can understand why

General Funston announced that the San Francisco experience made no new contribution to knowledge, and that he, for one, had his doubts upon the subject.

When it was all over, and when the dynamiters were called upon to make tentative defense of their failure to live up to the accepted theory, there was but one explanation: Nobody felt justified in taking the responsibility of destroying handsome and costly buildings in a district not yet actually touched by the fire, though everybody could see that these buildings were fated sooner or later but the soldiers, hoping against absolute certainty could not bring themselves to assume the responsibility. That is why one is led to lament that there was an opportunity which lacked a trained and fearless man to make it his.

Yet the men appeared at last, and their work gave unmistakable and convincing proof of the efficiency of explosives in combatting a great conflagration. There were only three of these fighters; quite unassisted they undertook what ought to have been undertaken at first. They proved everything, beyond the possibility of a doubt. Hereafter, when folk are studying the lesson of the San Francisco disaster, in this particular they will ignore the madly frenzied acts of the soldiery, fixing attention instead upon the unobtrusive act of those three quiet fellows who did not appear upon the stage at all until just before the final fall of the curtain. In the hurly-burly and the hubbub, what they did came near escaping notice altogether—for they had no press agent.

They certainly have one now. And Mr. Lighton turns out to be a most enthusiastic one. For, according to him, the salvation of what is left of San Francisco is due—no to the San Francisco firemen, nor the regular soldiers, nor the militia, nor the police, but to the navy. Three men of the navy, according to him, saved the city. It is a very great pity they did not arrive a little earlier. Says Mr. Lighton:

Admiral McCalla was at Mare Island, watching, and wondering. On Friday night—the close of the third day of the fire—he told Captain McBride of the Navy to take a couple of good men and go and stop the business; it had gone far enough, and it was becoming disorderly. Captain McBride picked Chief Gunner Adamson and a subordinate gunner; and they took with them a ton and a half of gun cotton—no more.

The fire had then swept outward through the residence district to within a block of Van Ness avenue. That block in width, extending from Golden Gate avenue to the water front, as yet unkindled by the flames, was razed completely. There was no debate about responsibility, no question concerning the money value of the property destroyed, which ran well into the millions. McBride had his instructions; that was enough. He directed the work; Gunner Adamson placed the charges, and the third man, whose very name seems not to have appeared in print, exploded them. Not a pound of gun cotton was wasted; not a charge failed to do the work intended. And there the horror stopped. On the far side of the avenue the buildings show blistered, discolored, shattered in places by the earthquake; but only in one spot did the fire get across the barrier. The Claus Spreckels home was gutted; but that was the last of it.

Save for this achievement, what is left of San Francisco, between Van Ness avenue and the Presidio, would be in ashes, like the rest.

It would be interesting to know the opinions of others on this subject—the San Francisco firemen and police, and the United States engineers who directed the operations of the dynamite brigade.

"Skiddo" and "23," are considered synonymous. They mean "get out," "it's you out the woods," or in other words, indicate the presence of the person so addressed is not desired. "Skiddo" was originated by an Eastern vaudeville performer. "Twenty three" made its first appearance on the stage in "Little Johnny Jones." George M. Cohan, the dramatist, says he first heard the expression in San Francisco several years ago. He does not know its origin. Among the explanations are; When telegraphers try to tell some other operator to get on the wire they signal "23."

The Carnegie Foundation, organized to provide retirement pensions for teachers in the universities, colleges and technical schools of the United States, Canada and Newfoundland has made its first selection of men to receive these allowances. About 50 professors and teachers will be retired at the end of the college year, the total amount to be distributed to them being approximately $70,000 a year. Among the well-known men on the list are John K. Rees of Columbia, Henry Baird of New York University, Charles A. Young and V. A. Packard of Princeton, Edward L. Moley of Western Reserve, George Trumbull Ladd of Yale, Henry P. Bowditch of Harvard, Francis A. Marsh of Lafayette, D. E. R. Merrill, formerly president of Ripon College, Wis., and P. H. Chandler of Ripon

SAN FRANCISCO'S PROBLEMS.

Will the Beautiful or the Useful Carry the Day?

San Francisco, June 9, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Permit me to offer a word of temperate discussion of certain problems connected with the future of our city.

Happily, we have escaped the wave of hysterical optimism which a few weeks ago threatened to engulf us; and though still drenched and blinking, we can dimly perceive a sense of humor abroad in the land. Gush and exaggeration have had their short-lived day. San Francisco has not effloresced with quite the celerity of a phoenix; and our exuberant prophets now find themselves assailed by showers of hard, stubborn facts, which must give them pause. Yet, even so, in spite of disquieting signs, we feel that at least one thing will happen with the inevitable certainty of fate. San Francisco will be rebuilt, and will resume its old position as a place of dominating commercial importance. Whether or not it will be rebuilt after the noble plans prescribed by Mr. Burnham, is matter of opinion. It is agreed that we shall never have another opportunity at once so rich and inviting. But surely a deliberate attempt to achieve the beautiful on a scale of such magnitude, in a community so perennially indifferent to beauty, is not without its touch of the chimerical.

It must be borne in mind that as a municipality we have not been blessed with the artistic sense. Considering its opportunities, San Francisco has probably committed more crimes against good taste than any city of its size and importance on the continent. Many years ago we built a City Hall that cost several millions of dollars; and then, as if in shame at its sordid story of graft and corruption—to which an earthquake has just added a touch of grim humor—we hemmed it in with acres of unsightly shanties! Later, we had an opportunity to redeem ourselves, when the Federal Government appropriated a munificent sum for a Postoffice building. How well we seized the opportunity is apparent only to certain property owners in the dingy purlieus of Seventh street! No organized protest appears to have been made against this outrageous transaction; and I venture to say there was never less interest manifested by an American community in the erection of an important public building. Nothing short of a devastating fire permitted our new Postoffice to emerge from its dingy obscurity. Although we were told that it cost millions, and required six years to build, we have only just now become aware of its existence!

Our sluggish indifference to personal appearance—if I may so express it—was perhaps one phase of our self-compacency. We were spoiled by foolish flattery. Poets told us that our city resembled a queen sitting at the western gate! We were informed that we had a glorious climate and a splendid harbor, and handsome women, and unique restaurants; and tourists from the great Middle West went into bucolic ecstasies over our Cliff House and Chinatown! But now and then, travelers with more intelligence than manners have heaped ridicule and contempt upon us. They have said that our city was an agglomeration of ugly wooden houses; that our streets were hideous in their drab and dingy monotone; that, bearing such natural attractions as our bay, with its picturesque fringe of hills, and the noble prospect of the Pacific from our western headlands, we had nothing to offer but the cheap and the tawdy. Even our much-vaunted Cliff House was to them a ridiculous, down-at-the-heels affair, with its shabby restaurant and seedy waiters. And though we protested indignantly that our climate was the finest in the world, we forgot perhaps that our visitors were buffeted by vicious summer winds, laden with the debris of unclean pavements.

Still others, in charitable search of the appy touch that should redeem our promise, and compensate them, have, in silent misanthropy, passed by our proffered intimacies, and stood in mute astonishment and reverence before the little monument to Stevenson in Portsmouth Square. Here, at least, was the one simple, charming and memorable thing we had to show them!

It may be urged that this is no fitting time to carp and criticize; that it is too much like striking a man when he's down. But is it not precisely the time to strike—when the iron is hot? When the adulation of the world is so likely to turn our poor heads and blind us to the responsibilities and possibilities of the future?

A comprehensive plan for beautifying the city has been submitted to the people. It has been supported enthusiastically by a few high-minded men with ideals above the mere sordid business of money-getting. And it is safe to say, it will be desperately opposed by the majority.

In forming a conjecture as to the outcome, the bitter memory of our last two municipal elections awkwardly obtrudes itself. The obstacles seem overwhelming. But even should all this unselfish effort bear no visible or immediate fruit, we hope that we shall at least live to enjoy the cherished memory of it, as we live to marvel at the spirit of deep affection and faith that gave us the Stevenson memorial.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

The funeral of Henrik Ibsen, the famous Norwegian poet and dramatist, who died at Christiania on May 23, was attended with every demonstration of popular sorrow, in the cemetery attached to the Church of the Holy Trinity. There was a great concourse of mourners, among whom were King Haakon, the cabinet ministers, the members of the Norwegian parliament, and representatives of artistic and scientific societies, home and foreign. A long eulogistic funeral oration was delivered to which the king listened with apparent attention. Ibsen was born in 1828. For many years he held a prominent place among the literary men of the world although his work made but little impression on this country. Outside of his so-called "social dramas"—"Ghosts," "A Doll's House" and "Hedda Gabbler"—Ibsen's work is but little known here.

"Speaking one day in a confidential mood of his selection to succeed to the chair which is now being so adequately filled by Governor-General Ide. General Jim Smith said that he really felt he was being pushed too far. Referring to his own preference, which, like that of Secretary Taft, is for the bench, he said that on the latter a man had a life job, but there was no knowing what might happen to him in the trying and delicate position of governor-general with its hundred and one pitfalls. A man might go in bearing his blushing honors thick upon him and come out looking like a cabbage leaf. By a combination of a little, a very little, ability, and a tremendous boost of good luck, he had managed to get where his head was beginning to swim. He somehow felt that luck was bound to turn and this sort of thing could not go on forever. However, there is yet no indication of Fortune's proverbial fickleness," so discourses the Manila American.

President Roosevelt has an account at the Riggs National Bank in Washington. The bookkeepers have no end of trouble keeping the President's balance straight, because so many people who get checks from the President fail to cash them, preferring to preserve the checks as souvenirs. So many persons are willing to pay from $1 to $10 for an uncashed check signed by the President that hundreds of dollars are saved the President every year.

United States Senator Joseph R. Burton of Kansas has placed his resignation in the hands of Governor Hoch. As has been his custom since the charges were first brought against him, Senator Burton declined to talk for publication. Foster Dwight Coburn was appointed by Gov. Hoch to his place. Senator Burton, F. D. Coburn was born in Jefferson county, Wis., in 1846. He served in two Illinois regiments during the Civil War and settled in Kansas in 1867. He is probably the most popular man in the Republican party in the State.

Senator Arthur Pue Gorman died in Washington on June 4th. He had been ill for several weeks and the end was not unexpected. Senator Gorman was one of the cleverest and most successful of American politicians. When he was 13 he was appointed page of the Senate Chamber, and from that day to the present he was never out of the public eye, and since he became of age he was never without a large and influential following in the politics of his native State. Mr. Gorman was born in Howard county, Maryland, March 11, 1839. He came of Irish Presbyterian stock. He was educated in the public schools and received his appointment through Stephen J. Douglas of Illinois. In 1872 Mr. Gorman became President of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company, which connection laid the foundation of his wealth.

The "touchiness" of the average Briton is proverbial but an extreme case is that of G. H. Williamson, a Conservative member of the British House of Commons for Worcester, who last week was unseated because over-zealous friends had bought votes for him at the February election. It is reported that a royal commission will investigate charges of bribery of ninety-seven voters, and the whole city is in danger of being disfranchised. That fate befell Oxford once.

Merely because a respectable French lady was recently arrested at night on Regent street, where she was awaiting her husband, by the police, who mistook her character, the Government has been called to account in the House of Commons, the Home Secretary, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, has had to explain; and a royal commission has been appointed to make inquiry into the way the Metropolitan Police of London deal with cases of drunkenness and solicitation.

In a diagnosis of the President's intrepid and stern character, Collier's Weekly says, while reviewing a late unpleasantness which involved a question of veracity, "To him, what he believed yesterday and what he believes today are the same, however different they may seem. Much, therefore, that might seem uncandid in the President is really the expression of this trait. If a brick hits him he throws back that brick. If he is displeased by a quotation he denies it. He who is overpraised is often overblamed. Partly because the President is supplanted by the populace to be more of a hero than he is, a hostility to him is insidiously gaining ground among the sophisticated, and this hostility makes the great, the serious error of allowing exasperation to create blindness to the fact that, when all his faults are counted, Mr. Roosevelt is the most widely influential creator of moral political sentiment alive in America today."

The uncertainty attaching to Senator Depew's condition and personal plans has had some light thrown upon it by the discovery that he has fully relinquished the use of his desk in the front row of the Senate. Senator Dick of Ohio has taken possession of it, having moved up from the rear row on the Republican side. Significance is attached to this fact. Senatorial procedure decrees that members may file with the sergeant-at-arms a claim to any seat more advantageously located which they anticipate will become permanently vacant. Following this custom, Senator Clapp of Minnesota filed on Burton's seat immediately after the latter's first conviction, and Senator Rayner of Maryland claimed the refusal of Berry's fine location on the Democratic side as soon as the latter's defeat in Arkansas was predicted. Mr. Depew must have abandoned hope of ever resuming his place in the Senate, or otherwise he would not have relinquished his desirable location in the front row. Mr. Dick's mere withdrawal from the Depew seat hereafter would not restore the previous condition of affairs, as there has been a general reassignment of the other seats affected. Senators have moved up to better locations as follows: Dryden to Clapp's former seat, Hemenway to Dryden's, Warner to Hemenway's, and Brandegee to Dick's. Senator Depew's term does not expire until 1911.

It is not generally known that the drawing of the bubbling spring which decorates the label of every bottle of Apollinaris is by Du Maurier. The original design is in the possession of the Apollinaris Company in London.

LITERARY NOTES.

Summer Fiction.

Among the new books of a new firm (Moffat, Yard & Co., price $1.50), is "In Vanity Fair," by Eleanor Hoyt Brainerd. It appears to be made up of sketches printed in newspapers and subsequently collected in book form. It relates to the lighter phases of Parisian life, and a very fair idea may be had of its scope by some of the chapter headings, such as "Frocks and Femininity," "The Tyrants of the Rue de la Paix," "Le Sport in Paris," "The Fine Art of Dining," "The Hunting Season," "Under Southern Skies" and "Les Americaines." Under these headings Mrs. Brainerd discusses feminine topics in French society; the ladies of the Parisian under-world; dress in Paris; Worth and the old man milliners; Paquin and the new school; racing near Paris; the day of the Grand Prix; Motor Mania; dining in the Bois; the Ice Palace with its crowd of skaters; hunting over the estates of the old nobility; the French Riviera; Nice and Monte Carlo, and last, but not least, American women and their extravagance in buying frocks in Paris. The book contains some fifteen illustrations which are after photographs by some photo process akin to the half-tone. The book is not deep, but it is entertaining.

The fashion for stories about automobiles has brought out a new one entitled "The Pink Typhoon," by Harrison Robertson (Charles Scribner's Sons). This is not like the ordinary motor story in which a man, a girl and a chaperone go through Europe, winding up with a wedding. The scene of this is laid in America and the motorist is "The Judge," who devotes himself to taking a couple of children out motoring and incidentally taking their custodian as well. This young woman might be their nursery maid, but is not. It is a simple story, not quite so complex as the European motor narratives, but none the less entertaining.

"The Challenge," by Warren Cheney (Bobbs, Merrill Co.) is a story of the North. In fact the writer appears on the title page as "Author of the 'Way of the North.'" Mr. Cheney is, if we are not mistaken, a Californian and was at one time editor of the "Overland." The story is laid in Russian Alaska, and its hero is a young Russian aide to the officer in charge of the station. There is not a little curious lore concerning Russian superstitions. One of these, incidentally, is the belief that by casting melted wax one may ascertain what shape of thing is pursuing a dying man. In a death scene in this book the wax assumes the shape of a bell. The son of a mad priest has been executed by the law, but the priest considers it murder and announces to the Russian officer that he is to die and that his death will be announced by the tolling of a bell. Thereupon the priest, who is pious, secures a large bell and prays several times a day, his prayer always being announced by the tolling of the bell. Needless to state that Mikhaïl Etolin dies. The reader may either believe that he died from a natural cause or because the priest prayed him to death.

The charming love story by Herbert Quick (Henry Holt & Co., $1.50), which attracted comment on its first publication, has just appeared in a second edition. It is called a story of Yankee Magic and its hero is a typical Westerner of the humorous order. The book is more than a novel. It is in reality a well considered study of Western life and manners.

"A politician should strive to be a representative man." "Certainly," answered Senator Sorghum. "The question is whether you are going to represent the public or the boss."—Washington Star.

"Binx is always mowing his lawn." "Yes," answered the neighbor who takes life easy. "Binx doesn't realize how a man in his shirt sleeves pushing a lawn mower spoils the looks of a lawn."—Washington Star.

"Don't forget to visit the mystery show while you are in Europe." "Let's see, that's in one of the German cities, isn't it?" "No, it's in Berne, Switzerland. I refer to the international sausage exhibition."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"Our neighborhood is considerably stirred up," said the farmer, as he helped himself to a pipeful of the village editor's pulverized cabbage. "What's the trouble?" queried the editor, scenting an item of news. "Nothin'," answered the granger. "Everybody's ploughin', that's all."—Chicago Daily News.

Wise—"The current magazines have an unusual amount of illustrated fiction in them." Krankley—"That's what! I saw a picture in one of them today of a fellow with Somebody & Co.'s safety razor."—Philadelphia Press.

LATE VERSE.

The City Desolate.

The following poem, by Edwin Markham was read at the recent performance given by players in New York for the benefit of the San Francisco sufferers:

A groan of earth in labor-pain,
Her ancient agony and strain;
A trembling on the granite floors,
A heave of seas, a wretch of shores,
A crash of walls, a moan of lips,
A horror on the towers and ships;
Torn streets where men and ghosts
Go by;
Whirled smoke mushrooming on the sky;
Roofs, turrets, domes with one acclaim
Turned softly to a bloom of flame.
A mock of kingly scarlet blown Round shrieking timber, tottering stones;
A thousand dreams of joy, of power
Gone in the splendor of an hour!

The Sisters.

This is the way of sisters: provoking
When skies are clear;
Jesting lightly together as if they
Were kin nor dear;
Mocking the one the other; unconscious of grief or care;
Veiling their love in laughter so long
As life is fair.
So long as life is sunny; let aught of Sorrow befall,
And the grief of one sets aching the Loving hearts of all.

And so with the sister cities that
Proud and smiling stand,
Each in her own dominion, across the Prosperous land.
They make a jest of each other; they Chaffer a growth and trade
While skies are blue; but let one, sore hurt, murmur a cry for aid,
And the jest is forgot and the laughter
Lost in the love that lies beyond.
As with shining eyes and with helping hands the sister cities respond.
—Wex Jones in New York Journal.

California.

Her mighty, mist-draped mountain rise
To heights, where everlasting frowns
The winter with his snowy crowns,
Encircling nature's paradise.
While, bathed in beauty, as a sea,
Her valleys green securely lie,
Beneath a slumbrous, summer sky,
Symbolic of the Great To Be.

From north to south on rifted shore,
The pure Pacific's pulses beat
In adoration at her feet,
In adoration evermore.
Oft, weary of sonorous chant,
Its passion scoring all control,
Its giant tones in thunder roll
From cliff to cliff, reverberant.
The sun gives her his last good-night;
Such loyal worship well befits;
For, looking seaward, still she sits
An empress in her royal right.

Full fruitage decks her garment's hem;
The riches of all regions rest
Inherent in her throbbing breast,
A wealth of mines, her diadem.
O, fairest land, man ever trod!
O, proudest realm, of youthful fame!
Pray Heaven, that, with unsullied
name,
You own allegiance to your God!
—M. E. Dudley.

The People.

It isn't the streets nor the buildings
That are reared 'neath prosperous
skies,
Nor the domes with their splendid gildings
That we truly revere and prize.
For houses may fall and their wrecks
may strew
The place 'neath misfortune's frown;
But a great voice cries "We will build anew!"
It's the people that make a town.

It isn't the plain nor the mountain,
Nor the ocean that rolls afar,
Nor the waving field nor the fountain
That makes us the men we are.
When the shadows of want and grief
expand,
It is then that we know the worth
Of a gentle heart and stalwart hand;
It's the people that make the earth.
—Washington Star.

I.
Wake! for the clock is several hours
late,
And in the pools the eager troutlets
wait,
All longing for the brilliant-colored fly—
While from your flash sounds gurgle of the bait.

II.
I sometimes think that never grow so hot
The words that we are prone to use a lot
As when some fish is hooked and played quite well
And, when you reach for him you find he's not.

III.
What! if the boy can fling the creel aside
And with a crooked stick that we de-ride
Catch far more fish than we of fancy rods,
Were't not a shame for us to harbor pride?

IV.
Myself, when young, did eagerly frequent
The fishing streams and heard great argument
'Bout fancy lures, and rods and heels and such,
But always caught 'em with a pin up-bent.

Ah, pard, could only you and I conspire
To use worms to our heart's desire,
Instead of sticking to our fly-book
truck,
Could not we each be made a better liar?
—Denver Republican.

"Oh, dear," she said, after the muscale, "I'm so mortified that I don't know what to do. I can't imagine what caused my voice to break as I did. It never happened before. What must Mrs. Waddington's guests think of me? How can I ever explain it?"
"Don't mention it," her friend advised.

New Books for Pleasure and Profit

Superseded

By May Sinclair, Author of "The Divine Fire."

12mo. $1.25.

A story of two strongly contrasted teachers in a fashionable girls' school in London; an old maid arithmetic teacher whose rule-ridden soul finally awakens to the real world of men, women and love, and the classical mistress, a beautiful and vital woman who tried to help her less fortunate colleague. Despite the pathos of the tale, there is a strong sense of the underlying humor and continuity of things throughout the book, and at the close two of the important characters are "trying not to look too happy." The author considers it her best work previous to "The Divine Fire."

The Misses Make-Believe

By Mary Stuart Boyd.

$1.50.

Two Devonshire gentlewomen attempt the conquest of London on all means. Their story has the humor and the pathos of being "hard up," good love interest, telling hits at social foibles, and effective bits of garden talk.

"When the balance at your bank is becoming steadily less and the bill in your private sanctum growing perceptibly larger, take this book into a quiet corner and have it out with your conscience. . . . The two girls are charming and ingenious."—Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

The Professor's Legacy

By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick.

$1.50.

A love story of German university and English country life, notable for humor and fine character drawing.

"Strongly reminds one of Miss Fothergill's 'First Violin' . . . much humor and much excellent character study."—N. Y. Times Review.

"Thoroughly pleasing and femininely sympathetic . . . abundant dialogue naturally told . . . a commendable, clever, pretty book."—The Argonaut.

The Nonchalante

By Stanley Olmsted.

$1.25.

Casual data in the career of Dixie Bilton, who became an operetta singer in a small German city (said to be Leipzig).

"Gives a remarkably vivid picture of Dresden and of the colony of young American men and women who study art and other subjects. The special feature of the book is a full-length study of an American girl who is studying to be an opera singer. She is very well drawn. . . . Unusually clever."—San Francisco Chronicle.

Losers' Luck

By Charles Teaney Jackson, a new Californian Author, 2d printing.

$1.50.

A story of filibusters of reckless humor and courage, who fought at most of whom died, for a woman. The scenes are chiefly aboard a yacht at in Guatemala, and the time to-day.

"These men are swept by the momentum of the game into a fever of enthusiasm, it sweeps you along . . . unusually readable."—New York Times Review.

"For juveniles, and for grown-ups who have not forgotten how to laugh."—The Boston Herald.

The Lark Furnace

By Hildegarde Brooks. Illustrated by Peter Newell.

$1.25.

"To the average youngster who loves fairy tales and revels in 'Alice Wonderland' it will be a delight indeed, for it takes its readers into the queerest places imaginable and gives them a private view of many wonderful people and things."—The Chicago Evening Post.

"As original as amusing . . . positively refreshing."—Boston Transcript.

The Girls of Gardenville

By Carroll Watson Rodkin, Author of "Dandelion Cottage."

$1.50.

This new book by Mrs. Rankin is the interesting and natural story of girls' club, "The Sweet Sixteen" of Gardenville, a picturesque city in northern Michigan.

"Wholesome stories . . . The sixteen heroines are natural, lively girls whose pleasures and trials would be of interest to other young people. . . . The tone of the book is commendable; it teaches sound principles without being priggish."—Critic.

"American Public Problems" Series. Each $1.50 net, by mail $1.65.

Immigration

By Prescott F. Hall, Sec'y of the Immigration Restriction League.

"Readable . . . containing a vast amount of valuable information. Especially to be commended is the study of racial effects. As a trustworthy general guide it should prove a godsend."—N. Y. Evening Post.

The Election of Senators

By Geo. H. Haynes, Author of "Representation in State Legislatures."

Shows the historical reasons for the present method, and its effect on Senate and Senators, and on State and local government, with a detailed view of arguments for and against direct election.

Studies in American Trade Unionism

Compiled by E. V. Luens.

A charming outdoor anthology and a beautiful book. The vacation gift book.

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY 29 W. 20th St. NEW YORK

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous.

Will Irwin's story of old San Francisco, which appeared in the Sun three days after the earthquake, has been revised and will soon be issued in book form, as "The City that Was," by B. W. Huebsch. The motto of the book is that proud saying of Willie Brit, a native wit: "I'd rather be a busted lamp post on Battery street, San Francisco, than the Waldorf-Astoria." Mr. Irwin, it is said, is to be managing editor of McClure's Magazine.

"Lady Baltimore" heads the list of best selling books in the June Bookman.

Henry Holt and Company will issue at once "Superseded," by May Sinclair, author of "The Divine Fire." It originally appeared with another story in a volume entitled "Two Sides of a Question," a small imported edition of which is now exhausted. The leading characters in "Superseded" are two strongly contrasted teachers in a fashionable girls' school in London.

Mr. Winston Churchill's new novel, "Coniston," is announced for issue June 20.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago, have brought out a popular (sixth) edition of their translation of the Baroness von Suttner's "Die Waffen Nieder!"—"Ground Arms!", for which the authoress has lately received the Nobel Peace Prize of $40,000.

Henry Holt and Company will issue at once "A Political History of the State of New York" by the Hon. DeAlva Stanwood Alexander, the Buffalo Congressman. It will be in two volumes and cover the period from 1777 to 1861. Vivid character studies of the Clintons, Hamilton, Burr, Van Buren, Seymour and Thurlow Weed are said to dominate the work.

Barbara's new book, "The Garden, You and I," is said to be more like "The Garden of a Commuter's Wife" than any of her books. The Macmillan Company will publish the book June 6, with twenty-five illustrations from photographs.

Eugene F. Ware, the well-known Kansas lawyer and politician, has collected and translated the various sections of Roman law relating to the use of water. Mr. Ware has arranged the matter by subjects, such as Rivers, Rain Water, Irrigation, Drift, etc.

The publication of Sir Walter Bessant's great Survey of London continues ("Medieval London," Vol. I, Macmillans). As in the preceding volumes, there is a rich storehouse of material of the most varied sort, light and serious, personal and social.

At a recent sale of rare books in New York a copy of Miss Tarbell's "Life of Lincoln," specially illustrated and extended to three volumes, brought the highest sum paid—selling for $300.

A third edition of Judge Walter C. Noyes' "American Railroad Rates" is announced. President Ripley of the Santa Fe Railroad has ordered that this work shall be placed in the thirty reading-rooms maintained by the company for its men.

Henry Holt and Company expect to publish immediately "How Ferns Grow" by Margaret Slosson. The book contains 46 remarkable plates made by the authoress.

C. L. Brownell, author of "The Heart of Japan," lost a considerable quantity of manuscripts in San Francisco. Mr. Brownell writes: "I saw the Palace smoke for two hours and then burst grandly into flames as I had seen the Call building earlier. It was magnificent, fascinating, bewildering, awful."

"The Life of a Star," by Clara Morris, contains innumerable anecdotes of such people of the stage as Wallack, Coghlan, Irving, Salvini and people prominent in other walks of life, such as Garfield, McKinley, Henry Bergh, etc.

In Rudyard Kipling's response to the toast of "Literature" at the anniversary banquet of the Royal Academy, May 5, he said: "If a tinker in Bedford gaol, in a pamphleteering shopkeeper, pilloried in London, if a muzzy Scotsman, if a despised German Jew, or a condemned French thief, or an English admiral official with a taste for letters can be miraculously afflicted with the magic of the necessary words, why not any man at any time? Who are they?" The New York Evening Post says: The best guesses are that the "muzzy Scotsman" is either Boswell or Burns; the "despised German Jew," Helne; the "condemned French thief," Villon, and the "English Admiral official," Pepys.

At the same time that Henry Holt and Company issued their "American Public Problems," "The Election of Senators" by George H. Haynes, they were obliged to reprint the first book of that series, "Immigration," by Prescott F. Hall. This earlier book, though originally published as a work for general readers, has been adopted as a class text-book in the University of Indiana.

Commenting on "The Muck Rakers of an Earlier Day," the New York World says: The "muck-raker" is by no means a new comer in literature. The year of the publication of "The Jungle" is the semi-centennial of the appearance of Charles Reade's "It's Never Too Late to Mend," a book which the critics of the time found "revolting." Its portrayal of prison abuses shocked conservative sentiment. In "Hard Cash," published in 1863, Reade exposed the evils of private lunatic asylums, and in "Foul Play," in 1869, gave to the world a forcible arraignment of the traffic in sailors' lives by ship-owners. Even before Reade, Charles Dickens, in "The Pickwick Papers," in 1836, had dealt a blow at prison evils. In "Nicholas Nickleby," published in 1838, he laid bare the petty oppressions of school life in Yorkshire. Walter Besant's "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," threw light on the deplorable social conditions of London's East Side. Our own great example of muck-rake fiction of a former time is "Uncle Tom's Cabin." On its publication in book form in 1852 Mrs. Stowe despaired of its success. Within five years 500,000 copies had been sold and its place at the head of all novels of moral motives established.

Volume VII of "The Writings of Benjamin Franklin" (Macmillan), edited by Albert Henry Smyth, is now ready. It brings the correspondence down to the end of 1779, when Franklin was enjoying the life of France at Pacey. Among the interesting papers of this volume is the "Proposed Version of the Bible," whose satirical nature Matthew Arnold, by some extraordinary lapse of judgment, overlooked.

A second edition, containing new material, of "Frederick Chopin, His Life and Letters," by Moritz Karasowski, is translated by Emily Hill (Scribners). Almost mechanically, on picking up the second volume, one turns to the pages on which the name of George Sand occurs. It is curious to observe that the sensitive musician was at first rather repelled by the famous woman's appearance. Writing to his parents from Paris, he says: "I have made the acquaintance of an important celebrity, Madame Dudevant, well known as George Sand; but I do not like her face, there is something in it that repels me."

A characteristic story of Tennyson is told in Louis Frederick Austin's posthumous work "Points of View," which has just been published. Walking one day with Mrs. George Meredith, Tennyson was very silent and gloomy. Suddenly he growled: "Apollodorus (Austin's name for some unimportant Scotch divine) says I am not a great poet." Mr. Meredith objected that Apollodorus' opinion did not matter; Tennyson retorted: "But he ought not to say I am not a great poet." That was the entire conversation. This reminds the Academy of a story of Matthew Arnold, to whom a friend once dared to hint that "Merope" was not Greek. Arnold threw up his eyes. "It may not be Greek," said he, "but it is very very beautiful!"

While reading the papers one day in January, 1902, Sir Conan Doyle was fired with the idea of vindicating the British soldier from the calumnies circulated against him in the pro-Boer press of Europe. How he got the money for this undertaking, how in eight days, working sixteen hours a day, he wrote his defense, and how the book was received—he now relates in the June Cornhill under the title of "An Incursion into Diplomacy." The total output of the work was 300,000 of the British edition, about 50,000 in Canada and the United States, 20,000 in Germany, 20,000 in France, 5,000 in Holland, 10,000 in Wales, 8,000 in Hungary, 5,000 in Norway and Sweden, 3,500 in Portugal, 10,000 in Spain, 5,000 in Italy and 5,000 in Russia. There were also editions in Tamil and Kanarese. The total sum at his disposal amounted to about £5,000, of which, speaking roughly, half came from subscriptions and the other half was earned by the book itself.

There is said to be a possibility of Ellen Terry being seen in this country, next season, in "Alice Sit by the Fire."

E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe propose to produce three new American plays next season. Two are by Eric Mackaye, and the third by H. W. Boynton. They also promise plays by D'Annunzio and Sudermann, including a revival of "The Sunken Bell." In "As You Like It," Mr. Sothern will appear as Touchstone and Jacques in alternation.

It is reported that Nat Goodwin will both sing and dance in a piece called "Popularity," which he is to produce in October in New York.

STAGE GOSSIP.

A. B. McCreery, the well-known capitalist, has decided to erect one of the finest theaters in the United States at Eighth and Market streets. He was the owner of both the Majestic and Central Theater properties. He announces that the new McCreery Theater will be of the class A variety—a steel frame, re-enforced cement, modern structure, fire and earthquake proof, fitted up with the latest improvements and inventions in theater construction and stage mechanism.

Howell & Dodge, the theatrical managers, will put up the big tent used by Sarah Bernhardt, in which the great benefit for San Francisco sufferers was held in Chicago. They expect to open July 1st.

"Romeo and Juliet" by real moonlight was played June 6 on the grounds of the Doheny home, in Chester place, the millionaire's residence park of Los Angeles, by Constance Crawley's Company of English Players. The proceeds were for the benefit of the theatrical people who suffered in the San Francisco disaster. The audience was seated on the lawn surrounding the magnificent Doheny home, in amphitheater form. For the carrying out of the famous balcony scene between Romeo and Juliet a porch with stained-glass window accessories was set above the porte-cochere.

In discussing her eventful farewell tour that is just ended, Sarah Bernhardt said at New York June 12 that her greatest experience was at Berkeley, Cal. "There," she said, "in the great Greek theatre I played Phedre as it has never been played before, under blue skies and in a classic theater of the true Greek type." Bernhardt closed her eyes in reminiscent mood and said: "There sat before me three thousand folk who had been made homeless by the terrible earthquake and fire, and they forgot—yes, I believe they forgot all. So this ends my tour," concluded Mme. Bernhardt, with a sweep of her expressive hands. "I go back to my dear France—to return never. With me I carry images of tents, pavilions, theaters—all places where you dear people came to see me."

Reginald de Koven, the well-known composer of light operas, including "Robin Hood," "The Fencing Master," "Rob Roy" and "Happy Land," who has been missing from his favorite haunts in New York for several days, has been ill at a sanatorium at Yonkers. The nature of his illness is not known, but his condition is said to be serious. This information came out in the Harlem Police Court when De Koven's wife appeared in a case of her chauffeur for persistent violation of the speed law. The chauffeur was held for trial. He was arrested while returning from the sanatorium, where Mrs. de Koven and a party had been to see the stricken composer. In the party was Robert S. McGann, president of a big engineering company of this city, and the chauffeur's trial also developed the fact that McGann is engaged to marry Mrs. Dudley Winston, sister of Mrs. de Koven. The chauffeur let out this secret, which was not denied.

The great show in New York today is entitled "The Fall of San Francisco."

Henry Miller is to seek in England for new plays for Margaret Anglin.

William H. Crane has gone to Europe to spend the summer.

Robert Edson, has completed a one-act play which he has styled "An Honest Moment," founded on Bret Harte's story of "Brown of Calaveras." Bronson Howard recently addressed the Actor's Church Alliance, his theme being the growing dignity of the dramatic profession.

E. S. Willard will be one of the actors to appear at the benefit performance for Elieff Terry in London.

Charles Stevenson, who has been leading man with Mrs. Leslie Carter for eight years, retired from her company last week, and will sail for Europe for a long rest.

Ethel Barrymore has gone to Maine to spend the summer on a place recently purchased.

Eastern managers say they will continue to send attractions to the Pacific Coast. They will depend upon Sacramento, Oakland, Stockton, San Jose, Los Angeles and other cities.

Speaking of Clara Morris, Salvini says: "The instinct of the actor was twice plainly shown—once, when, in making a mistake, instead of atamering or going back to correct his error, he swiftly 'jumped' the faulty lines and dashed on securely with the others. And again, when he recited the words of 'The Light Brigade' on the occasion of his first appearance in America, it was in a town hall at Yonkers. Standing as if looking in an open grave, he plucked a white flower from his coat, and cast it down. It was a hit of business that caught the house."

Ellen Terry's Jubilee.

The lasting and affectionate regard in which the London playgoers hold their favorites found splendid exemplification on June 12 in the matinee at the Drury Lane Theater in commemoration of the theatrical jubilee of Ellen Terry. It was the most remarkable manifestation of its kind in the history of the British stage, not only drawing to the historic auditorium immense throngs of people from all walks of life, but crowning the star with notable names in the dramatic and musical profession, including playwrights and composers, in an unprecedented program which continued from 12:30 to 7:30 o'clock. The most notable event on the program was the first act of "Much Ado About Nothing," with Miss Terry as Beatrice and twenty-two other members of the Terry family in the cast. But perhaps the most moving and memorable event was reserved for the end in the reception scene on the stage. Here Miss Terry was surrounded by 500 of her friends, embracing the participants in the program and other well-known members of the profession, including Sir Charles Villiers Stanford and Alexander Campbell Mackenzie. The enthusiasm of the audience was roused and each appearance of Miss Terry was greeted with handclapping and cheering lasting many minutes. A notable feature of the performance was W. S. Gilbert's "Trial by Jury," which the veteran author himself directed and in which the jury was composed of famous playwrights, Capt. Robert Marshall being the foreman while the "crowd" was made up of host of well-known actors and actresses.

Before the performance began Miss Terry was given a tribute by the pites and gallery gods, who for more than twenty-four hours had patiently waited for the doors to open, amidst themselves meanwhile in good-natured fashion, the long vigil being rendered eventful by the appearance of Miss Terry at the gallery doors at midnight to look at those friends through the dimmed eyes.

Miss Terry made a short speech thanking all for their kindness. Shaking hands with M. Coquelin and kissing Signora Duse, whose hand she retained to the end of her little speech, Miss Terry proceeded:

"Though I stood here as long as the pyramids have stood, I could never say what this day has been to me; have the heart to wonder at all you have done for me, but not the tongue to praise you. I will not say good-bye. It is one of my chief joys today that I need not say good-bye just yet, but can still speak to you as one who is still among you on the active list, still in your service, if you please."

Everybody then joined in singing "Auld Lang Syne." Arthur W. Pine announced that the receipts approached $30,000. The exercises closed with the singing of the national anthem.

VANITY FAIR.

The rapid increase in the number of clubs for women in London and a growing practice of admitting Americans to membership has brought about a distinct step forward in international amenity. It is doubtful if a more successful means could be devised to facilitate a greater mutual understanding of the variation of social customs and that indefinable but weighty factor, the personal equation. For the American women it has added a new zest to a stay in London. The testimony of those who have enjoyed the hospitality of the club to the extent of the two weeks' house stay permitted to out-of-town members, or who have simply used the club as a meeting place for entertaining purposes is overwhelmingly appreciative. Living in the house for that length of time and constantly meeting the members penetrates even the traditional English reserve and places acquaintance on a more personal and intimate basis than is often the lot of women who have been in the habit of regularly visiting London. The number of social clubs for women in London is astonishing. They have no counterpart in America, although English women quite generally and mistakenly believe that the hundreds of study clubs which flourish in our country are of the same order as their clubs. In fact, they will often say they got the club idea from America. They are, however, a very natural outgrowth of London conditions. Distances are so great, difficulty and slowness of transportation so trying, that all social intercourse is a real burden. The club makes it easy to entertain in a central and accessible place for tea or dinner, and it is possible to have a regular "at home" day and thus see friends. As a rule the meals served in the clubs are much better and more varied than members succeed in having in their own homes, as the art of cooking in England is still in a very primitive stage. Prices of club meals are extremely reasonable; in fact, probably too low priced for good business management. Men experienced in club management contend that a club cannot meet expenses except for the profit in sales of tobacco and liquor, and that no woman's organization can be made self-supporting, as the revenue from such sources counts for very little.

The bankruptcy of the Empress Club recently illustrates the contention. This club is a fashionable one where a great deal of expensive entertaining was done. The annual subscription was $25, and the yearly revenue something like $50,000, which makes a high-priced club for England. The premises in Dover street were unpretending and not nearly so costly as several of the other clubs, the Lyceum Club, for instance, which has the handsomest house in the choicest club region in London—facing Green Park near Hyde Park corner, on Piccadilly. The Lyceum pays the huge sum of $20,000 a year rent. This club has not succeeded in paying expenses in its three years' existence, though the membership numbers about 5,000, inclusive of the German and French branches and large American membership. The annual dues are $15 and $20. The most expensive club is the "Ladies' Bath," which has the swimmingbaths and other athletic features. The club, which is building on Madison avenue for New York women, more nearly resembles the "Ladies' Bath" than any other. The newest club is "The Imperial," which is to have a strong political leaning, although it is explicitly stated in their charter that they are opposed to woman suffrage. The Duchess of Marlborough is one of the founders and an officer. Every time a new club is founded in London the smoking-room feature is dwelt upon in our papers as if it were a new and shocking departure. As a matter of fact, the club without a smoking-room causes comment in London. Smoking is general among women of the upper classes in England, as it is in France, Germany, and Italy. The middle and lower class women, as a rule, do not smoke. Several successful clubs have men and women members. Men are very much in evidence in these women's clubs. The imperativeness of the afternoon tea function renders men available quite generally between the hours of four and five. The general air of ease and delightful social intercourse at tea time at the club causes a pang of envy to the American man or woman having a share in it.

Paris, which was conspicuously left out of the Princess Ena's wedding trousseau, is having magnificent revenge. The War of Roses was a mild exchange of amenities in comparison. The French modistes have made no moan. They have only laughed to scorn the "uninspired" "unemotional"

British hats of the Queen-elect of Spain. The affair was brought about by the enterprise of Le Matin, which before publishing pictures of some of these creations, submitted them to experts of the Rue de la Paix for their criticism. A feminine artist, who has crowned many a head that supports a royal diadem, lifted a supercilious lorgnette and examined the first picture. Then with round eyes of infant wonderment she inquired: "What on earth is that? A hat? Never! It is not possible to believe it. Monsieur has made some error. That mass of feathers and strings a hat! Mais non! Ridiculous!" The climax came, however, when the head of the establishment, carefully putting her finger on the picture of the ponderous wedding-cake of the royal bride, said gravely: "Now that has meaning. For my part I should prefer to wear that."

Princess Ena's wedding cake was the first royal wedding cake ever seen in Spain. The English custom was introduced by King Alfonso as a compliment to his bride. The cake is six feet high and weighs more than 340 pounds. It stands upon a huge silver salver, on which the bride's mother's wedding cake was placed. The cake consists of three glistening silver white tiers, and is 46 inches in diameter at the base.

The lowest tier is divided into eight panels, separated by Corinthian columns, and is surmounted by Cupids disguised as postmen and messengers. The spaces between the columns are filled with panels of sugar work representing Spanish vines. The panels are festooned with orange blossoms, white heather, myrtle and white roses. The flowers were chosen by Princess Ena. There are four panels on the second tier. In the center of each is a shield with the monogram, "A. V.," mounted by the Spanish crown. Medallions, sprays of myrtle and tiny white roses embellish the third tier, on top of which is a beautiful group of children in white Parian marble, bearing aloft a vase holding a bouquet. Four long floral festoons reach from the top to the bottom tier. A gold knife with an ivory handle two feet long accompanies the cake, and will be used to cut it for presentation to the guests.

In London, on May 29, Gen. Lord Roberts presided at the Pilgrims' dinner in honor of Bishop Potter, of New York. There were 150 guests, including the Archbishop of Canterbury and several bishops and titled personages. Andrew Carnegie, Alfred Sutro, W. Butler Duncan, Don M. Dickinson, David Bispham, G. M. Cassatt, Sir Thomas Lipton, Victor F. Lawson and John Wanamaker. The Archbishop of Canterbury toasted the guest of the evening. Bishop Potter, in replying, described his recent tour of the East, and complimented Great Britain on the work the nation has done in Egypt. He said he did not know whether it would be any comfort to his hearers to know that the American Eagle is going about the streets of Cairo with its tail between its legs.

The Elysee Palace, where the President of France holds court, was built in 1720 by the Count of Evreux, a favorite of Louis XV., and was afterwards inhabited by la Pompadour, who spent a fortune on its decoration. But it went through strange vicissitudes of fortune before reaching its present office. During the reign of Terror it was owned by Citizen Hovyn and used as a gambling house and place for public balls. Two sets of these balls are notorious—those of the Benedicks, and those of the Victims, thus described:

So it was that these balls were given, to which "boarding schools" of young girls desirous of marriage were conducted by agents, the bachelors being asked to attend, in order to make their choice. It must be confessed that some people remained old fogies and disapproved of these innovations.

As to the celebrated Ball of Victims, nobody was admitted but those who affirmed that they had lost relatives on the scaffold. They danced in mourning garb and bowed to each other with a short, sharp movement of the head, as if they had been suddenly struck by the knife of the guillotine. So it appears that these amusements partook somewhat of the Dance of Death. At times they developed into tragedy, as, for instance, on one occasion when a bloody fight broke out between the Youths of the Revolution, who adopted the light-colored wig and black collar, and the troop of "red collars," who were democrats. Pleasures, debauchery, blood-flowing, cold irony—those in truth were the characteristics of that troublous and disorderly period.

of the nouveau riche, says the Bookman. He was, to instructed minds, a most pathetic sight—so grossly conscious of his wealth, so anxious to spend it in an impressive way, to do something princely, something really "big," and yet being so hopelessly ignorant of how to do it. He purchased urban dwellings with "brown-stone fronts" and plate-glass windows. He procured horses and carriages, and stocked his cellars with champagne. In the country he built for himself enormous wooden mansions painted in many colors, surmounted by wooden cupolas and towers and battlements, and adorned with a maze of wooden pillars representing what some one cleverly styled "the jig-saw renaissance," while his lawn was dotted with cast-iron statuary painted to resemble bronze. Many of these war-made millionaires ultimately lost their money as quickly as they made it. Some of them left it to be squandered by their sons. The wealth of those days was seldom perpetuated, and this fact was crystallized in a popular proverb to the effect that "There are only three generations from shirt-sleeves to shirt-sleeves."

"Men should not wear trousers," says Mr. Redfern, the famous Parisian ladies' tailor, in giving his views on the subject of men's attire. According to Mr. Redfern trousers are either too long and have to be turned up, or are too tight and have to be jerked up when the wearer sits down, which is anything but a graceful gesture. He declares that knee-breeches, with leggings for out of doors would be the most becoming things in which men could encase their lower extremities. According to Mr. Redfern, still collars and cuffs are not only uncomfortable, but ugly. Frills at the wrist and a soft turnover collar would be much more graceful. His idea is that coats with spreading tails, something like the modern frock coat, but much more ample, would be an ideal garment for men, and this should be, if not entirely made of silk, at least lined throughout with it. Fancy waistcoats should be worn at all times. They live up a man's appearance. Lastly, says Mr. Redfern, high and stiff hats should be replaced by soft felt, with wide brims, the broader the better.

Our guide was showing us the new apartment houses in the great city, says Puck.

"Over here," he announced through his megaphone, "we have 'Bonaparte Court.' This, ladies and gentlemen, is occupied by the middle-class."

"Ah, indeed!" we exclaimed. "And what is that other rather imposing structure called?"

"'Piccadilly Court.' Occupied by people a little better off in the world's goods than those in Bonaparte Court."

"And that grand building to the left?"

"'King's Court.' Occupied by only the wealthy."

"Wonderful! But how about that extraordinary model of architecture with Cupids shooting broken arrows at iron hearts?"

"Oh, that is 'Divorce Court.' Occupied by the ultra-smart set."

Somebody has dug out a copy of the New York Herald for June 1, 1840, in which James Gordon Bennett, the elder, announced his approaching marriage "to the readers of the Herald," under the heading: "Declaration of Love—Caught at Last—Going to Be Married—New Movement in Civilization."

"I am going to be married in a few days. The weather is so beautiful—times are getting so good—the prospects of political and moral reforms so auspicious—that I cannot resist the Divine instincts of honest Nature any longer; so I am going to be married to one of the most splendid women in intellect, in heart, in soul, in property, in person, in manner, that I have yet seen in the course of my interesting pilgrimage through human life."

"I cannot stop in my career. I must fulfill that awful destiny which the Almighty Father has written against my name, in the broad letters of life, against the wall of heaven. I must give the world a pattern of happy wedded life, with all the charities that spring from a nuptial love."

"In a few days I shall be married according to the holy rites of the most holy Catholic Church to one of the most remarkable, accomplished and beautiful young women of the age. She possesses a fortune, I sought and found a fortune—a very large fortune."

"She has no Stonington shares or Manhattan stock, but in purity and uprightness she is worth half a million of pure coin. Can any swindling bank show me as much? In good sense and elegance, another half a million; in soul, mind and beauty, millions on millions, equal to the whole specie of all the rotten bar in the whole world."

"Happily, the patronage of the public to the Herald is nearly $25,000 annum—almost equal to the President's salary. But property in world goods was never my object. Fair public good, usefulness in my day's generation—the religious association, female excellence—the progress of true industry—these have been dreams by night and my desires day."

"In the new and holy condition which I am about to enter, and enter with the same reverential feelings as I would heaven itself. I anticipate some signal changes in feelings, in my views, in my pursuits. What they may be I know not; time alone can tell. ardent desire has been through life reach the highest order of human excellence by the shortest possible. Associated night and day, in sick and in health, in war and in peace with a woman of this highest of excellence must produce some serious results in my heart and feelings and these results the future will develop in due time in the columns of the Herald."

"Meantime I return my heart thanks for the enthusiastic patronage of the public, both in Europe and America. The holy estate of wed will only increase my desire to be more useful. God Almighty bless all. JAMES GORDON BENNETT."

The following poem is one of the finest things Bret Harte ever wrote and it is a cause for wonder that should be so little known. It was read by him upon the occasion of opening of the California Theater, San Francisco, January 19, 1870. So the imagery of the poem is exquisitely beautiful, and it is hard to count how material things could be trod of with more poetic skill. MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS.

Engagements and Weddings.

The wedding of Miss Sadie Farrish to Lieutenant Rowland Beverly Ellis, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., took place on Thursday, June 7th, at the home of the bride, 1813 Nineteenth street, Washington, D. C. The ceremony was performed at half past eight o'clock in the evening. A large reception followed. Lieutenant Ellis is stationed at Fort Walla Walla, Washington.

The wedding of Miss Ruth Foster to Mr. Robert H. Sherman took place in Los Angeles on Wednesday, June 6th. Mrs. D. W. Wurtsbaugh, the bride's mother, was the matron of honor, Miss Mattie Milton the maid of honor, and Miss Lucy Sherman and Miss Hazel Sherman, the groom's sisters, the bridesmaids. After their wedding journey Mr. Sherman and his bride will make their home in Los Angeles.

On June 9 in Santa Rosa Mrs. Catherine Wickersham, widow of the late Fred A. Wickersham of Petaluma, was married to Allen Lewis Dowler of San Francisco. Mrs. Dowler is well known, both in Santa Rosa and San Francisco. In Denver on June 10th Mr. Allen Choate of San Francisco and Miss Mary S. Powell of Denver were married and left at once for San Francisco, where they will make their home. The bridegroom is in the railroad business in California. He is a nephew of Ambassador Choate.

The engagement is announced of Miss Edna Foote of Sonoma county to Mr. Porter Garnett. No date has been announced for the wedding.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Elizabeth Allen, daughter of Judge and Mrs. James M. Allen, to Mr. J. Otis Burrage, will take place on Thursday, June 19th, at the home of the bride's parents, 3400 Washington street. The ceremony will be performed at 3:30 in the afternoon. Mrs. Julius Allen, the bride's sister, will be the matron of honor and only attendant, and Francis Allen, the bride's brother, will be the best man.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Gertrude Jones, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Jones, to Mr. Webbillard of Minneapolis, Minnesota, will take place Tuesday, July 10th, at the home of the bride's parents on Buchanan street, near Pacific avenue. The ceremony will be performed at three o'clock in the afternoon. There will be no attendants and only the members of the families and a few very intimate friends will be present. Mr. Ballard and his bride will leave after a honeymoon trip for Minneapolis.

Across the Bay.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boardman, whose handsome home on Franklin street was totally destroyed, are at San Anselmo for the summer months.

Mrs. J. C. Cantwell entertained at luncheon on board the McCulloch in the harbor at Sausalito, on Tuesday last, in honor of Miss Ruth Miller.

Commander Charles F. Pond, U. S. N., and Mrs. Pond entertained at a dinner at their home at Mare Island last week. Their guests were, Medical Director M. H. Simons, U. S. N., and Mrs. Simons, Captain R. M. Cutts Jr., U. S. M. C., and Mrs. Cutts, Surgeon Charles P. Kindleberger, U. S. N., and Mrs. Kindleberger, Miss Elizabeth Pond, Miss Clotilde Williams, Commander De Witt Coffman, U. S. N., Lieutenant Commander John L. Leonard, U. S. N., Lieutenant Frederick Freeman, U. S. N., and Ensign John Pond, U. S. N.

Mrs. Victor Metcalf has left Washington for California, and expects to spend most of the summer in Oakland as the guest of her mother, Mrs. J. F. Nicholson, on Linden street.

Among the San Franciscans who have taken up their abode in Berkeley are Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Mills and the Misses Ardella and Bessie Mills, who have taken a house in the college town for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. R. Porter Ashe, who have been occupying Mrs. Edward Griffith's cottage in Ross Valley for several weeks, went on June 1st to San Rafael, where they have leased a house at West End for a year.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Olney (nee Elby), who have been living at Danville, Contra Costa county, since their marriage, have returned to Oakland and will live at the old Olney house. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Hubbard at Oakland has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

Austin Lewis, who left for the north on May 15th, to deliver a series of lectures on the San Francisco earthquake and fire, is at Revelstoke, British Columbia, after lecturing at Seattle, Tacoma, Everett and other cities.

In British Columbia he lectured at Vancouver twice, at Nanaimo, at Ladysmith and other points.

A dinner was given by Mr. Osborn at the Piedmont Clubhouse Saturday evening. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. George McNear Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Edward Lacy Brayton, Mr. and Mrs. Willard Wayman, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Augustus Bray, Mrs. G. B. Cook and Mr. Harry Smith.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs for the past week are Mrs. Henry Williams, Judge and Mrs. Frank H. Kerrigan and Mr. Fred Meyerstein, from San Francisco; Professor and Mrs. Henry Senger, from Berkeley, and Mr. George C. Deacon, from Honolulu.

S. D. Brastow, who for about thirty-five years has been the western division superintendent of the Wells Fargo Company, died at Alameda on June 6th. Death was due to pneumonia, contracted a few weeks ago while on a trip to Portland. The deceased came to this State in 1850 by way of Cape Horn. He engaged in business in San Francisco and a few years after arriving on the Pacific Coast accepted a position with the company with which he had been associated for half a century. Deceased was a brother of Professor Lewis O. Brastow, of Yale College. A wife and two daughters survive him.

Frederick Greenwood has reached New York and is domiciled at one of the uptown hotels.

Mrs. Robert McCreery, who inherited much San Francisco real estate from the estate of her mother, Mrs. Clark Crocker, is here from her home in Chicago and is visiting with her sister, Mrs. Van Fleet.

Notes About the Clubs.

On the links of the San Francisco Golf Club near Ingleside on June 22d at 10 a. m. a handicap tournament for men will be begun. It will be a match play for the club cup.

The postponed annual meeting of the Pacific-Union Club was held on Tuesday, June 12th, at 8 o'clock p. m. The president's report was read and the proposed amendments to the by-laws were passed upon. A table d'hôte was served from 6:30 p. m. for the convenience of the out-of-town members who stopped over for the meeting.

After the shooting contest on the grounds of the Oakland Country Club, a large number of members and guests of the club were served luncheon.

Among the many present were Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Goodall, Dr. and J. O. Cadman, Miss Helen Cadman, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Folger, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Crellin, Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Fitzgerald, Mrs. E. C. Prather, Miss Edna Prather, Mrs. Harry Hinckley, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Hathaway, Mr. and Mrs. Egbert Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Will Taylor and Mr. and Mrs. James G. Allen.

A formal housewarming was given by the members of the Union League Club last Friday afternoon at their new home on Franklin street. The club has leased the commodious old Louis Parrott house and is comfortably installed there for the present.

The San Francisco Press Club held an informal jinks on Saturday evening at its new quarters, 2016 Post street.

The low-browed party with a pistol in one hand paused in front of the pedestrian. "I'm goin' to hold youse up," he said. "T-that's real k-kind of you. I'm sure," answered the pedestrian. "I b-had a sinking s-sensation when I saw you a-approaching."—Chicago Daily News.

"Now, witness, your master lives in morbid trepidation, doesn't he?" "No, sir; he lives in the suburbs."—Baltimore American.

Mary—"Did she make a good match?" Ann—"Splendid. Lots of money, good social position, and all that. In fact, the only drawback is the man."—Brooklyn Life.

Mosely Wraggs—"You used to move in good society, didn't ye?" Wareham Long—"I never done any movin' when I could help it, in any kind of 'society."—Chicago Tribune.

Backlotz—"Does your servant girl oversleep herself?" Suburbs—"Not only that, but she oversleeps us."—Philadelphia Press.

Him—"I don't like young Higgins and he doesn't like me." Her—"Well, that is certainly very much to the credit of both of you."—Chicago Daily News.

ARGONAUTS TO THE ARGONAUT OFFICE.

Although it might seem like sending coals to Newcastle, our request to our readers to send Argonauts to the Argonaut office is already being heeded. Although our files were destroyed by the recent fire, we have declined the numerous kind offers of our readers to send us their bound volumes. We feel that it would be asking too much of them. But in regard to incomplete and unbound files and unbound numbers generally, we have no such compunctions. We announced last week that we would be very glad to receive such numbers. Our generous readers have at once seized the opportunity, and during the past week we have received a number of large parcels of Argonauts. With these we shall hope soon to build up some complete files.

If any Argonaut readers have loose Argonauts of any dates before the fire we hope they will ship them to us by express marked, "Newspapers, collect," and also marked with their names, so that we may acknowledge their kindness and treasure it in the editorial memory.

"This bill for your new frock is really a bit high," observes the plutocrat to his daughter. "Six thousand dollars is considerable to pay just for an auto suit." "But, papa, the suit itself really is quite inexpensive. The most of that bill is for the trimmings." "Trim-mings?" "Yes. I spent $5,200 for an auto of the right tint to match the suit."—Puck.

Czar Cannon Pardons California.

Last week we addressed a humble petition from the citizens of California to Czar Cannon. It seems that the Czar, in delivering a speech from the throne to the American Douma, informed the California delegation that this State had fallen under his displeasure, and that he would therefore refuse to recognize any member of the delegation for the purpose of calling up the California Five Per Cent Land Bill. This bill carries with it about a million dollars, which sum represents five per cent of public land sales since California was admitted into the Union. Every State has received its quota except California. The Federal Government owes the money to California. The justice of the debt has never been denied, but on various pretexts the payment has been postponed or refused. The opposition of Czar Cannon to the Five Per-Cent Bill was partly general, as he strongly deprecates paying any money out of the Treasury outside of the regular appropriation bills. He says frankly that the enormous appropriations of recent Congresses have so endangered the chances of the Republican party that it is not improbable a Democratic majority may be returned at the next election. But the specific objection of the Czar to the Five Per Cent Bill is based on a personal matter. The Czar is deeply interested in the Statehood Bill. By this iniquitous measure Oklahoma and Indian Territory are to be admitted to the Union as a single State, Oklahoma, while the people of Arizona and New Mexico are to be clubbed into becoming a State called Arizona. All of these four commonwealths are averse to this forced union. Oklahoma and Indian Territory, however, have become resigned to their fate, as they fear that otherwise they will not be admitted for years to come. But Arizona and New Mexico are still strenuous in their opposition. At least Arizona is. New Mexico has been temporarily placated by Federal pap. A number of Republican Congressmen, particularly from the Pacific Coast, have opposed this malodorous political job. As Czar Cannon for personal reasons is deeply interested in the passage of the Statehood measure, he has determined to revenge himself on the State of California for the action of our Representatives in opposing this bill.

Since last week, however, a compromise has been patched up in the conference between the Senate and the House. By this arrangement the people of Arizona and New Mexico will be allowed to vote separately, and thus to express their opinions on coming into the Union as a single State, while Oklahoma and Indian Territory will be so admitted. This is, in a way, a victory for the far Western Representatives—although, like most compromises, it is claimed as a victory by both sides. But Czar Cannon, to save his face, has concluded to claim it as a victory. He therefore gave notice to Representative Smith last week that he would recognize him on Monday of this week for the purpose of calling up the California Five Per-Cent Bill. As it has already passed the Senate, this means that it will probably pass the House, and California will receive the money which has been justly due her from the Federal Government for many, many years.

Among the redeeming features of oligarchies and despotisms is the capricious benevolence of their arbitrary rulers. In Turkey, for example, a Grand Vizier never knows from one day to another whether his lord and master the Grand Turk intends to send him as a present a bow-string or a beautiful Circassian. In either event it is his duty to be ostentatiously grateful. Since Czar Cannon has seen fit to forgive us for sins which we never committed, and to give to us money which was already ours and which he never owned, let us be grateful.

Long live the Czar!

Fair Treatment of the Insurance Companies.

Last week a friend who has been for years an Insurance Manager in California, and who stands deservedly high in this community, said to the writer: "The tone and temper of your articles on the insurance situation seem somewhat unusual for the Argonaut. Do you not think that you are joining in an unwarranted clamor raised by the yellow journals?"

The reply we made is here set forth in substance. The Argonaut is not conscious of having denounced any fair dealing insurance company. There are two sides to every shield. To the policy holder who has been burned out of house and home, who has lost his place of business, his cherished household belongings, and often his livelihood, the present sluggish attitude of the insurance companies seems utterly intolerable and flagrantly dishonest. The policy holders to a man expect that their claims shall be adjusted immediately and their money paid in full and paid instant. Furthermore, the policy holders to a man deny that any damage was caused by the earthquake. In fact, as the insurance adjusters remark with bitter humor, "We are beginning to doubt whether there was any earthquake here at all."

On the other hand, the insurance managers claim that in many cases they, too, have been burned out and their records destroyed; they say that in the case of such a colossal catastrophe much time would be required to adjust claims, even if all the records were intact; but where, as in this case, many insurance companies have lost their records and know not where they stand, time and patience on the part of the policy holders is required to bring about a settlement. So maintain the insurance men.

There are side issues to these two propositions. There is the claim of the crooked policy holder for insurance damages at high rates on property which was worthless; or on property which had been removed before the fire; or claims for fire damages on buildings which had collapsed from the earthquake shock. On the other hand, there is the crooked insurance company's demand that all policy holders shall submit to a sweeping horizontal cut. This demand is apparently for the reason merely that the insurance stock holders do not want to pay their losses. Then there is the attempt of the crooked insurance companies to force a reduction on the ground of earthquake damage when there was none—for the number of buildings destroyed by earthquake in San Francisco was less than three per cent of the whole. Minor pieces of crookedness on the part of insurance companies include attempts to evade the filing of proofs of loss; attempts to influence policy holders to file their proofs of loss in methods that would be construed as void by the courts; attempts to bulldoze ignorant or timid policy holders into accepting sums far beneath their just dues by threatening them with the total loss of their claims if they do not compromise. And last of all we come to simple, naked dishonesty, like the fraudulent bankruptcy of the Traders' Insurance Company of Chicago.

There are solid companies which are honestly endeavoring to adjust their claims, and which are paying them, when adjusted, fully up to their face value; there are many of these solid companies whose affairs are adjusted by honest and honorable men; from these to the gang of crooks who control the welching companies is a far cry. They are as widely separated as is the North Pole from the Antarctic seas. It is of these and of kindred crooks that the Argonaut's language leads our insurance friend to ask us whether we have joined the yellow journals. We have no hesitation in saying that if denouncing thieves and crooks be yellow journalism the Argonaut is quite willing to join the yellow journals and proud to stay by them.

Still we must not be misunderstood as making sweeping charges of crookedness or dishonesty against all the insurance managers and all the insurance companies. If we made such charges they would be false, and we do not make them. But we intend to let the world know which companies have acted honestly and which companies dishonestly in this great catastrophe in San Francisco. The Argonaut is by no means merely a local journal; its circulation is not confined to the Pacific Coast, or even to the United States; we not only have readers in every State and Territory of the American Union, but our foreign list of subscribers is large. The Argonaut intends to avail itself of this wide circulation to warn the people who read it of their danger from insurance crooks and thieves. This is no local matter. It is world wide. And nothing more nearly concerns people, wherever they are, than questions of insurance, life or fire. When a man insures his life he wants to know that at his death his loved ones will be provided for, and that his money will not go to feather the nests of luxury-loving insurance magnates. Correspondingly when he insures his home or his place of business he wants to know that if it burns he will get the insurance money. The Argonaut proposes that information concerning the doings of crooked insurance companies shall be widely disseminated.

But fair play is a jewel. It is no more than fair that we should let the people of the world know who are the honest men and which are the honest companies among the one hundred and sixteen licensed to do business in California. And that also we intend to do.

We recommend to the California policy holders of weak, crooked and dishonest insurance companies that they advertise as widely as possible the actions of these companies. It will be a very simple thing to do, particularly so where the policy holders have incorporated. Men who are held together in the loose bond of an "association of dissatisfied policy holders" will accomplish little. Some of these policy holders will settle in full, some at seventy-five per cent, some at fifty; some will get no settlement at all, but will conclude that it is inadvisable to throw good money after bad, and will let the whole thing drop. But those policy holders who are banded together in an incorporation will have to stay by it and the minority will have to stand by the majority, whether they will or no. It is to these organizations—and already several exist as we are glad to know—that we address ourselves. They will have to spend some money to get back what is due them, but it will only be a tithe of what they would have had to spend were they working as individuals rather than as an incorporation.

Let us take a case in point. Take the Traders Company of Chicago. Up to the present time this is the only large company which has welched." It has gone back on its honest obligations, although its stockholders are abundantly able to meet their debts. Let us for brevity call the incorporation The Traders Bunco Victims, Ltd.; let us suppose that the attorneys of the Traders Bunco Victims have carried the war into Illinois and have sought in the Federal Courts to get at the funds of the defaulting stockholders; let us suppose that these rich crooks have got their funds safely hidden away; let us suppose that the process of the courts follows them even to the recesses of their safe deposit vaults; let us suppose that, like other rascals, they exhaust the resources of knavery to avoid payment; let us suppose they adopt the last refuge of scoundrels, and put their property in the names of their wives or other relatives. Even then it would be easy for the Traders Bunco Victims, after exhausting the process of the law, to resort to other methods, yet still within the law, to keep these crooks from further preying on humanity.

They might do it in some such way as this: There are nearly twenty thousand newspapers published in the United States and Canada. Advertisements in most or all of these papers could be easily placed through the great Eastern advertising agencies. Naturally when the agencies do business at wholesale they do it at a much lower rate than when an individual merchant advertises at retail. Such advertisement could be inserted for a term of weeks or months; or even for terms of years, three or four times a year, for a comparatively moderate sum. It might read something like this:

THE TRADERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF CHICAGO.

Founded 18—. Went into insolvent bankruptcy May —, 1906.

Assets of the Traders just before the San Francisco fire —.

Capital Stock —.

Reserve Fund —.

Amount of policies written, $160,000,000.

Difference between their assets and their liabilities, only $150,000.

Wealth of the aggregated stockholders, $200,000,000.

— Estate, assessed for — millions, office — St., Chicago.

Mr. —, President of the — Trust Co., assessed at — millions, Chicago.

Mr. —, President of the — Bank, — St., Chicago.

And so on. These facts could be easily found. They can all be made matter of record in legal proceedings before a Federal Court. Anything which is a matter of record in a court is not libelous. Therefore, the Traders Bunco Victims will have the legal right to print throughout the United States matter of record in a court of the United States. Some lawyers would differ, and would hold that the individual libel laws of the various States prevail. Such lawyers would believe in South Carolina's nullification and in the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798. We do not. We not only believe but we know that any citizen may freely print in any part of the United States, whether State or Territory, that which is matter of record in any Federal Court, whether it be the Supreme Court of the United States of America or only a Territorial Court in Alaska.

The libel laws of the United States are infinitely more lax than those of the Old World. So strict are the laws concerning libel in Continental Europe that newspapers are frequently obliged to print local news with only the initials of the persons concerned when the matters involved are calculated to disgrace them in the eyes of the world. For example, a man arrested for a nameless crime is usually mentioned in the Continental press as "Mr. X." But when he has been examined before a committing magistrate and has been held for trial, the affair becomes a matter of public record, and then the papers dare to speak of him as "Mr. John Smith." Correspondingly a common procedure in Europe, after suits for defamation or slander, is for the court to order the facts to be published in a certain number of newspapers, thereby rehabilitating the character of the injured person. Thus it will be seen that, rigid as are the laws of the Old World against libel, they are equally rigid in holding persons and corporations to a strict accountability for their acts; they not only permit, but they require the publication of advertisements in the press re-establishing the true state of affairs after a suit at law. It would be quite safe and comparatively easy for the Traders' Bunco Victims, after merely formal proceedings in a Federal court, to set forth the way in which they were buncoed in twenty thousand newspapers in the United States and Canada. And it would also be not difficult for the policy-holders in any foreign companies which may contemplate robbing their clients to print the facts concerning the robbery in the newspapers of Great Britain and the Continent, after first seeking the advice of skillful lawyers in those countries, as to how to comply with the requirements of the European codes. For be it known that there is very little indulgence shown by the European courts to scoundrels. Rich rascals and poor rascals—at the bar of a British, a French, or a German court they are treated just the same. When the Bank of Glasgow made a bad failure some years ago, the directors were held personally liable; most of them forfeited their fortunes to make good to the defrauded depositors, and several of them were sentenced to the penitentiary for life.

And it was right. We badly need some European justice in the United States.

We commend these facts to the Traders' Bunco Victims Ltd. And we also commend them to those holding policies in any foreign insurance companies which have not yet buncoed, but are only trying to bunco their policy-holders.

"The Other Fellow's Street."

Concerning the vexed questions of widening streets, running boulevards and changing the present limitations of San Francisco, we have received the following communication:

Editor Argonaut: Your semi-cynical, half optimistic, and altogether amusing comments on San Francisco affairs are a very timely tonic to take in these tectonic times. I have in mind particularly your recent editorial entitled "Widening the Other Fellow's Street." I read that aloud at the supper table, and it assisted digestion materially. It is funny, but after all, not strictly full or fair, for there are many San Franciscans who possess a different spirit from the one you were satirizing in that editorial.

The Burnham plan includes the extension of Van Ness Avenue southerly into Capp Street and the widening of Capp Street its full length into Bernal Heights. This would bisect the Mission District with a splendid boulevard, and would add vastly to the beauty and safety of that region.

Clients of mine who own a large piece of land right in the course of this proposed improvement desire the project carried out. Their motive is twofold; first, their own advantage; second, the public benefit. They are willing to devote all the land necessary for the purpose. By correspondence and personal interviews they are ascertaining how all the property owners along the line stand on the question. Up to date they have heard from a great many of these owners, and thus far more than fifty per cent not only favor the project, but are willing to donate all the land necessary to carry it out.

They all understand that it will take time to accomplish this purpose, but now is the supreme moment for organizing all such movements.

It goes without saying that a city of the size and seismicity of San Francisco should have many broad boulevards, and I trust your love of epigram and satire will not lead you to throw all your great influence indiscriminately against them.

Yours very truly,
JOSEPH HUTCHINSON

The Argonaut has not thrown such influence as it may have against the widening of streets, the piercing of congested quarters with boulevards, the increasing of the public squares, or the enlargement of the parks of San Francisco. The Argonaut firmly believes in spacious streets, broad boulevards, large squares, and generally what have been aptly called the breathing-places or lungs of a large city. We know of no large city so inadequately provided with such needs of modern congested city life as San Francisco. In London one may walk for miles upon turf; one may go from park to garden, from garden to square, from square to park again. The Temple Garden, the Victoria Embankment Garden, the Albert Embankment, Birdcage Walk, Constitution Hill, the Mall, St. James Park, Green Park, Hyde Park, Kensington Gardens, Holland Park—there is one string that stretches for miles. Then there are innumerable other squares, parks and gardens to be found in the great city. Even in the appalling East End of London, and in the hopelessly utilitarian precincts of the Transpentine quarter, or the Surrey side, may be found the large playgrounds known as Victoria and Battersea Parks. So with other cities. In the very heart of Munich there is found a park called, oddly enough, the "English Garden," which instead of being laid out with prim and artificial beds as wild as if it were a bit of forest. So with Paris; so with Vienna; so with Berlin; so with Dresden; so with many other cities which, although old and crowded, rejoice in much park space and breathing room. Yet San Francisco, one of the youngest cities in the world, and which is the heir of all the ages, is more inadequately provided with parks and squares than any other city of its size of which we have knowledge. We mean distinctly within the city precincts, and do not include the 1200 acres in Golden Gate Park. What is more, although San Francisco is only half a century old, some of its downtown city front streets resemble the narrow noisome alleys of the slums of Naples.

Knowing these facts, and entertaining some uncited ideas concerning elbow room, space and air, it is unthinkable that we should oppose anything in the way of improving and beautifying San Francisco. What the Argonaut has done in this regard has been merely to state what is the trend of public sentiment. We do not create public sentiment; we record it. We do not believe that newspapers direct the people; we believe they run along behind and pick up nickels. Other newspapers affect to believe that they lead. The Argonaut is very candid, and admits that it does not. Vox populi, Vox Dei.

We have no uncertain sentiments on the improvement of San Francisco, and have not hesitated to express them, now as in the past. But we believe their realization is impracticable. We do not believe that the land-owners of San Francisco desire any marked changes or improvements—except on The Other Fellow's Street. Immediately after the catastrophe of the 18th of April, when everybody was rejoicing over the approaching beautification of San Francisco, its magnificent boulevards, its wide and well-paved streets, its spacious squares and so on, the Argonaut ventured mildly to remark that this meant a readjustment of old boundaries and vested interests which we did not think the land owners would stand for. Our remark met with unanimous disapproval, which confirmed us in our opinion that we were right. At that time the land owners were silent. Speech is silver, silence is gold. Land owners are always conservative and frequently timid. They realized that to oppose the beautification idea on the morrow of the catastrophe would be extremely unhealthy for them, and they were right.

After the lapse of a week or two the land owners crawled out, and began to peep timidly about titles and boundaries. They were informed with superb disdain that there were no titles; that there were no boundaries; that all the records were burned; furthermore, that they had better keep quiet and be good. They kept quiet, for a little while. Then the title companies got gay, attempted to hold up San Francisco, and announced that the abstracts which they had copied from the official records were their very own and no one could copy their copies unless at an exorbitant fee. Their Attorney McEnerney strode into the arena, bearing his bill, by which with an action "in rem" anybody could clear his title against all the world. Then all the land owners crawled out like beetles from under their brick piles, plucked up heart, and began to talk about "vested interests" and "confiscation."

That Mr. De Young is a progressive citizen and has always had the interests of the city at heart cannot be denied. Yet he preserved a judicious silence for a couple of weeks on these burning questions. But when the post-seismic heart-to-heart talk-feasts began to dry up, he announced that he was opposed to disturbing ancient land marks, established street lines, and vested interests. He said in his journal that the main thing and the vital thing now was to get to work, to clear away the ruins, and to build up the city; that if new street lines were run the lawyers would quarrel over them for the next quarter of a century. These proposed changes, the Chronicle said, would retard the building of not only a beautiful San Francisco, but any San Francisco at all. This attitude of the Chronicle met with such a roar of approval from land owners generally that it was evident that the Burnham plan was doomed. It was a beautiful, an iridescent dream, but San Francisco would not pay for it. In short, what the Argonaut dared to say a few days after the catastrophe, everybody began to say a few weeks afterward.

We agree with Mr. Hutchinson in his views on the question of boulevards and widening of streets. We think with him that many property owners would advocate such improvements, some of them from altruistic motives, some from a devotion to the pure, the beautiful and the good, and others because it would increase the price of their property per front foot. But concerning his proposed improvement, Mr. Hutchinson says that he has heard from "A GREAT MANY of these owners."

But he has not heard from ALL.

Aye, there's the rub.

In a country like ours about the only way to take away land from a stubborn owner and convert it to public uses is under the statute of eminent domain. But it is not always an easy process. The public need must be urgent, vital, indisputable, patent to all, to make condemnation seem just in the eyes of the community. Such a need is about as frequently seen as a white blackbird.

We know of no city in a country governed by constitutional methods, such as is ours, where sweeping improvements have been made in city streets and squares. It was impossible to remodel London after the Great Fire. Two or three revolutionary improvements have been made in that vast metropolis in the past twenty or thirty years, and only two or three. One of them was the cutting through of Queen Victoria street from the Embankment to the Bank of England. Another and more recent one involves the demolition of a number of buildings on the Strand and running the new streets, Aldwyck and Kings Way, northward from that ancient thoroughfare. But if any man believes that this was accomplished with ease, he need only delve into the proceedings of that overworked body, the London County Council. It is our belief that if any London land owner parted with his leasehold or his freehold to the London Aldermen for conveyance to the public, he got all that it was worth, and probably more.

On the other hand, cities situated in countries where the government at the time was semi-oligarchic—such as was Paris under the Third Napoleon, Berlin under Bismarck, Vienna and Petersburg under the Hapsburgs and Romanoffs—found it possible to make great improvements and municipal changes; such as cutting wide boulevards through the congested quarters of ancient Paris under Baron Haussmann; running that wide, straight street, the Rue de Rivoli, with its prim and handsome arched facades, along the Seine; tearing down the ancient ramparts of Vienna, and replacing them with the magnificent Ringstrasse; constructing the splendid esplanades and quays with cut-stone masonry embankments along the marshy shores of the Neva at St. Petersburg. All of these things are possible only in countries whose inhabitants are docile, easily governed, and unused to the independence of the American citizen. California is one of the youngest commonwealths in the American Union, which is one of the youngest nations. Among the great powers of the world America is the most independent, and among the American commonwealths California is the most independent. We very much doubt whether such a stiff-necked generation will be inclined to yield to changing their street lines, changing their boundaries and parting with strips of their land, even if it should lead to the greater beautification of San Francisco.

The State as a Fire and Life Insurer.

Many men who have been placidly paying their life insurance premiums for years have recently awakened to the fact that they are leaning on a rotten reed. They have thought—good easy men—that when for years they paid large premiums into the coffers of the life insurance companies, they were certain when death came to leave behind them an adequate provision for their families. While it is not proved that the great life insurance companies have endangered their solvency, they certainly have endangered their standing in the public mind. Some of the men who stood at the head of them have turned out to be so very much like rascals that an honest man finds it difficult to differentiate.

Now the citizens of San Francisco are suddenly awakening to another disagreeable discovery—that their reliance on the fire insurance companies is not to be depended on. It is true that not all of these companies contemplate "welching." As we write it would seem as if about one-fourth of the one hundred and sixteen companies licensed to do business in California intend to settle their liabilities dollar for dollar. The remainder are seeking to avoid their liabilities in various ways. A large number are forming a combine by which they hope to impose a horizontal cut on all policies, thus establishing an artificial and arbitrary scale of 75 per cent as the maximum to be paid. These crooked concerns the people with grim humor have dubbed the "Six Bit Companies." Starting from the 75 cent or "Six Bit" maximum these dishonest companies intend to scale down this as far as they dare to go, or as the policy-holders' fears or necessities will permit them to go.

The British companies seem inclined to pay their losses on a basis of "strict legal liability;" that is to say, where they have an earthquake clause they will refuse to pay earthquake damages; where they have a "fallen wall" clause they will construe it strictly enough to protect themselves; where their policy-holders' buildings have been destroyed by dynamite they will adjust the matter according to the counsel of their attorneys or the decisions of the courts, on the whole inclining toward paying for dynamite destruction as if it were destruction by fire. In short, they will pay what they are legally obligated to pay. This may not be a very generous construction of their liabilities, but it must be admitted that fire and life insurance do not go hand in hand with generosity.

Apropos of the "welching" concerns, we have received a communication from F. A. Binney, dated San Diego, entitled "How to Settle the Insurance Companies." Mr. Binney says: "On moral grounds everything insured that was burned in San Francisco ought to be paid for by the insurance companies, no matter what happened to it before it was burned." We differ here with Mr. Binney. While the earthquake damage in San Francisco was small, still some buildings fell by reason of the earthquake shock, and to claim that fire damages should be paid to the owners of such buildings is unreasonable. Mr. Binney goes on: "As to the property that was dynamited, that would all have been burned and thousands of insured houses in addition." This statement is unquestionably true. Dynamite was used for the purpose of checking the spread of the fire. Therefore it was one of the ordinary risks of a conflagration, and damage from dynamite should be paid for by the insurance companies just as damage by water would have been paid for. Mr. Binney continues: "The action of the insurance companies in quibbling over just claims is contemptible. I suggest that the State of California do a Fire and Life Insurance business under State ownership."

Mr. Binney's idea is by no means a new one. The life insurance phase of it is already in operation in several foreign countries. Theoretically, government life insurance is an ideal system. Every great government like ours will endure in perpetuity. Long after the New York Life, the Equitable and the Mutual Life have passed away, the United States Government will endure. Long after the very names of today's great insurance grafters shall have been forgotten, our present Republic will be among the great nations of the earth. The American Government will not die, but every American citizen must. No American citizen would hesitate in staking his fortune on the continuance of the Government, however many there might be who would question the wisdom of entrusting to it life insurance functions. Therefore it is that we say that from an actuarial point of view the governmental system of life insurance would be an ideal one. The Government could give low rates and high security. No matter how long a man's life might last, the Government's life would be longer. It would be bound to win. Yet at the same time a citizen insuring his life with the Government could sleep nights with the absolute certainty that if he did not wake up his family would be well cared for.

The annuity system would thrive under a government system of life insurance. This system is little followed in the United States, although it prevails largely in Europe. It is probable that distrust of the stability of our large insurance corporations checks the growth of the annuity system here. Suppose a man at the age of forty had paid his entire fortune of $200,000 into the treasury of one of our great insurance companies, expecting to receive therefrom a large annuity for the rest of his life; he would feel seriously disturbed, to put it mildly, at the corruption that has been brought to light within the past year. In a European country the same man would have paid his fortune into the Treasury of his Government, receiving therefrom bonds carrying instead of dividend coupons an annuity for life, the principal (or bond) becoming extinct upon his death. In several European countries this system of life insurance prevails. Needless to state, it brings in enormous profits. It is much favored by the people abroad. For Europe is a more leisurely country than ours, and many a man retires from a profession or a business in middle life; then, with a competence invested in an annuity fund of his government, he spends the evening of his days in ease and affluence. In our country he would spend his time and his riches in trying to get richer, and would perhaps die poorer.

We are not aware that any European government has added fire insurance to its system of life insurance. We know of no reason why it should not prove practicable. Looked at superficially, it would seem not only practicable but highly desirable. Take our own country, for example. The United States has a population of eighty millions; San Francisco had a population of four hundred thousand; San Francisco's claims for fire damages from the insurance companies are, let us say, about two hundred million dollars. Thus the comparatively small sum of two and a half dollars per capita on the population of the entire country would reimburse San Francisco for her losses. The small fire insurance premiums paid by the eighty millions to the general government would more than recoup the Federal Treasury for San Francisco's losses. In the domain of pure theory we are inclined to agree with Mr. Binney. Of the many things which have been suggested as suited for government control, that of life insurance seems to us the most fitting. Next to that, perhaps, may come fire insurance. But the subject is a more complex one, and of its feasibility as a governmental institution we are not so sure. But of this we are quite sure: that with our government run as it is at present it would be impossible to conduct economically and successfully a Federal system of insurance, either life or fire. Everything that the Federal Government does is more costly than the same line of business as conducted by private individuals. The United States Postoffice costs more money and gives less value for the money than any similar enterprise with which we are familiar. And so with most of the other businesses conducted by the government.

If this be true of the Federal Government—and no person with knowledge of the facts can deny it—it would be infinitely more difficult for a State government to conduct such a business enterprise than the Federal government. Even waiving the dangers resulting from the concentration of risk within a single commonwealth, the political and administrative corruption almost inseparable from governmental business operations would render State insurance impossible. The State of California has two millions of people. If paying the two hundred millions of fire losses to San Francisco were thrown upon the people of the State of California, the burden would be a crushing one. Possibly the Federal Government might meet it, but the State of California never could.

The Abolition of Chinatown.

A few days after the great fire had roared through San Francisco and left nothing west of the sky-scraper district save bare and blackened hills, there rose a chorus of congratulation over the fact that Chinatown was destroyed. "This is the end of Chinatown," chortled every one in glee. "That was the plague spot, the ulcer of San Francisco. Now it is wiped out. We will have no more Chinatown." The Argonaut ventured to remark in a still small voice that whatever might be its personal preferences in the matter, even the ordinances of the San Francisco Supervisors could not override constitutional provisions and treaty rights; that if the Chinese owned the land in fee simple in Chinatown, no law or ordinance, State, county or city, could deprive them of their holdings. In the midst of the enthusiasm engendered by the disappearance of the plague spot, this remark met with general disapproval. It was one among the many unpleasant truths told by the Argonaut at that terrible time, which truths so many amiable people deprecated.

Yet we can not see, after many weeks of contention in committees, that the result departs in the slightest degree from the dictum we laid down. The Mayor, the Supervisors, the Citizens' Committee, and the Citizens' Sub-committees have labored with this question and have sat up nights with it. But after many weary rounds of doubt it resolved itself merely to this: that the Chinese did not want to leave Chinatown; that the property owners did not wish them to leave Chinatown; that Oakland, Seattle, Tacoma, and Los Angeles all did want them to leave Chinatown; that all of these cities wished them to move Chinatown away from San Francisco; that if the other cities wanted Chinatown, San Francisco did not want them to have it; that the Chinese Minister had laid the matter before the Department of State; that the Department of State had hinted to the Governor that they thought "it really wouldn't do."

The clamor of many voices regarding the abolition of Chinatown seems of late to have died away, and the project threw its last throes at the meeting of the Citizens' Committee last week. The Chairman of the Chinatown Sub-Committee, A. Ruef, reported briefly that the Chinese objected to being removed; that no other neighborhood wanted them; that the Chinese had the Constitution on their side; that in his opinion they could not be legally removed; and that the Committee wished to be discharged.

After the volumes of talk on this subject, a month ago, it seems incredible that no debate should have taken place. Yet with only these few remarks from the Chairman the Committee's report was accepted and it was discharged from further duties.

The trouble with the Argonaut's point of view—to which so many worthy people take exception—is that we persist in looking at things as they are, and not as they ought to be.

General Greely On Rehabilitation.

It has finally been decided by the War Department that the Federal troops will leave San Francisco for their posts on July 1st. Oddly enough, the municipal officials of San Francisco are much averse to General Greely and his troops turning over their work to the Civil authority. It speaks volumes for the excellent manner in which the work was begun by General Funston and completed by General Greely that all concerned should regret their departure.

It may be well here to interject, as an historical parallel, that at the time of the great Baltimore fire that city refused to permit Federal troops to camp on the sacred ground of the Monumental city, although the need of them was strongly urged by the Federal Government. San Francisco, on the other hand, warmly welcomed the Federal troops, and looks with regret on their departure.

General Greely has prepared a document containing a number of recommendations to the Relief Committee and the Municipal authorities based on his experiences in handling the camps of the refugees. In this document he states that there are "considerable numbers of worthy citizens who are now deprived of their ordinary means of gaining a livelihood, including firemen, policemen, school teachers and physicians." He further remarks: "The officers and men of the army are now performing duties and rendering services which should be performed and rendered by the destitute men in San Francisco." To this he adds the sound corollary that "there is no better way to rehabilitate a man than by allowing him to earn a living salary." He therefore suggests that each camp shall be placed under a carefully selected officer of the fire or police department, now on furlough by reason of insufficient public funds." The familiarity of these men with their own people and their habits of authority should enable them to properly supervise the refugee camps," says General Greely. He further recommends that the present army surgeons should be replaced by doctors of ability and standing, "of whom it is understood there are many without practice." This is unfortunately true. There is much suffering among the professional classes in San Francisco. General Greely recommends that there should be about one doctor to seven hundred persons, and that their pay should be from $3.50 to $5.00 per day. Where guards are necessary he advises that civilian watchmen—drawn from the ranks of furloughed policemen and firemen and male school-teachers now on leave—should be placed in charge. He is quite convinced that civilian officials can cope adequately with the problems of governing the camps.

General Greely speaks most highly of the people of San Francisco. He says: "They are self-respecting and desirous of conforming to proper methods of life as regards order, decency, and cleanliness. There are now forty-three thousand people under canvas in San Francisco. Eighteen thousand are under military supervision, while twenty-five thousand are scattered throughout the city. Yet there have been no centres of contagious diseases or centres of disorder and violence. Any contagious diseases have been sporadic and the conditions of order such that no murder has been committed and only one or two assaults been made."

With the training the refugees have received in camp life under the supervision of the Federal troops, and with the advice of a certain number of army officers whom General Greely hopes to leave here for a time, it is probable that the civilian officials may continue the admirable reign of good order, decency and cleanliness in the camps so happily inaugurated by the United States Army.

Policy Holders Incorporating.

For a number of weeks the Argonaut has been steadily advocating the incorporation of policy holders having claims against fire insurance companies, in order that they may protect their interests. It rather surprised us that our suggestions was not received more appreciatively at first. But as weeks wore on and the companies showed little inclination to settle, the futility of individual effort against allied corporate effort became apparent. The first body of policy holders to organize was made up of those having claims against the insolvent Traders Insurance Company of Chicago. Now another incorporation has begun, called "The Fire and Earthquake Policy Enforcement Association." Its object is to "prosecute the collection of claims against fire insurance companies, to undertake legal action on the behalf of the insured against the insurers, and to receive transfers for the purpose of collection and delegation of authority." This incorporation has retained able attorneys and has employed competent adjusters to advise its members, to prepare diagrams of buildings, and to file proofs of loss.

Those policy holders who incorporate are wise. They will see that the scant modicum of respect paid by certain fire insurance companies to individuals may be changed to extreme deference when they find these individuals banded together in a compact corporation.

Other policy holders are now thinking of following the plan first outlined in these columns. The Merchants Association, the Chamber of Commerce, and other commercial bodies are advising their members to form incorporations based upon lines of similarity of risks, kinship of interests, etc. In fact, so pronounced is the movement toward incorporation that a danger now threatens the non-incorporators. As the Argonaut was the first to point out the desirability of incorporation, it will now be the first to point out the danger of non-incorporation. If there should be formed in San Francisco incorporations aggregating three-fourths, let us say, of the policy holders having fire damages, the insurance companies will be forced to choose in their settlements between the incorporated and the non-incorporated policy holders. Can there be any question as to which set will suffer? Even if it be merely a question of time, the incorporated policy holders will be the first to be paid. The non-incorporated policy holders will be paid after their more prudent brethren. In some cases the non-incorporated policy holders will not only be paid last, but they will be paid with the leavings of the others. And in some cases there may be no leavings.

Strange Earthquake Stories.

A curious appetite is shown by our Eastern cousins for startling narratives of the little shock which is said to have taken place in California on the 18th of April. Most of these tales were told by Eastern refugees, that is persons from the East who were visiting here, and who fled incontinently, immediately after the shock, with the daylight's scared out of them. These imported or exotic liars put completely in the shade the efforts of our domestic or indigenous prevaricators. When the refugees from Oshkosh, Wis., or Moosatackmaguntic, Maine, got back home they told the folks all about it, and were at once interviewed by the editor of the local paper. When these various narratives were copied here in San Francisco with indignant comments by the editors of our daily journals, it is asserted that the reporters of our yellow journals, on reading them, wept bitterly, and refused to be comforted. New England's scenery is lacking in some respects; her climate leaves much to be desired; she is somewhat over-theologized and her fauna and flora are meager, but we never heard any one speak slightly of the New England liar.

The earthquake in the East is now not even a nine days' wonder. They have troubles of their own, and they have ceased to heed us mourners by the Western seas. But if they like earthquake stories we call their attention to the narrative of the Chief Engineer of the Ocean Shore Road. The officers of that institution are now engaged in attempting to dispose of the company's bonds. Hence it is probably that the loyal Chief Engineer says that while the Ocean Shore Road was damaged to some slight extent in places, in reality it actually benefited by the earthquake. It seems that there is a difficult strip of country overhanging the ocean, known as the Mussel Rock Bluffs, where the Ocean Shore Road was busily engaged in grading out its road bed. It was a hard task, for the line ran just half way up the face of the bluff. The engineers were engaged in boring from above, putting in heavy charges of blasting powder, and thereby forming a trough for the road bed and rails. But the earthquake of April 18th came along and shook down millions of cubic feet of rock and earth. Where before a precipitous bluff had stood, there is now a sloping hill with a gentle grade. Over this gentle grade the workmen of the Ocean Shore are engaged in constructing the road bed at a minimum expense and labor. The Chief Engineer assures an astonished world that the Ocean Shore Road in this particular spot was benefited by the earthquake to the extent of fifteen thousand dollars.

The philosophers, in and out of the pulpit, have recently been trying to prove to us all how unwise it would be for us to repine over earthquakes; that they are "cosmic manifestations of nature's laws;" that when we come to understand these laws of nature we shall be very much wiser than we are now. This, of course, is comforting, but if we knew not only when earthquakes were coming, but more particularly where they were going, it would be more useful. These earthquake philosophers leave in our minds an unsatisfactory feeling, and a vague yearning, despite our knowledge of the cosmic laws, to be somewhere else when an earthquake comes.

But from the narrative of the Chief Engineer of the Ocean Shore Road it seems that earthquakes have their uses. In the days when the cosmic earthquake laws shall have been mastered, any gentleman desiring to construct a railroad, will merely find it necessary to order an earthquake. When he has secured a good well-trained earthquake, he must put it under the care of an earthquake engineer who does not drink and who is not liable to accidentally knock the adjacent county out of the universe through a miscalculation. Then the railroad builder would simply secure his right of way, run his lines, drive in his stakes, and turn his earthquake loose. Think what millions might have been saved if the cosmic earthquake laws had been known in the early days of the Pacific railroads. Think even what millions might have been saved if Mr. Harriman could have used a tame earthquake in constructing the Lucin cut off at Salt Lake, or boring an earthquake tunnel through the Sierra Nevada Range.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Dispensing With Earthquakes.

San Francisco.

Editor Argonaut: I wish to thank you for the back numbers of the Argonaut which we missed during the recent calamity. I have been a subscriber to your valuable paper for many years, and while we can get along without earthquakes we cannot do without the Argonaut.

Wishing you continued success, I am,
Yours truly, OTTO FLEISSNER.

Good Wishes from Ohio.

CLEVELAND, June 4, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Please accept the profound sympathy of a transplanted Californian to whom the Argonaut has been a strong link binding her to her former home. I cannot sufficiently praise your pluck for continuing to publish your paper uninterrupted in the face of your cruel losses and the adverse—I might say almost impossible conditions of our stricken city. Nothing since the dreadful date of the double disaster at home has helped me to understand the conditions of our stricken city as have the Argonaut accounts—not only because they are clear and faithful descriptions, well told, but because of my faith in its statements born of long and intimate knowledge of it. I enclose a check for a subscription for two years, and only wish it were in my power to really help the paper through these trying times.

With every good wish to the Argonaut and its editor, most sincerely yours,
ALICE CHRYSTAL HICKOX.

The Shorn Lamb.

PLUMBAGO MINES, ALLEGHANY, Cal., June 7, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed find my check for $4 on San Francisco (which now is current funds) to continue my subscription to the Argonaut for another year. The Lord did a little shorn-lamb tempering when he left enough brains and grit to keep the Argonaut going. As the whale said to Jonah, "It is hard work to keep a good man down." Yours truly,

MASON W. MATHER.

"Argonaut Stories" Is Out of Print.

1484 McALLISTER ST., SAN FRANCISCO, June 10, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Is it possible to obtain any copies of "Argonaut Stories?" I regret exceedingly that I did not purchase them before April 17. Yours very truly,

E. E. SAWYER.

We have no more copies of "Argonaut Stories." Some 1500 copies had gone out to Payot, Upham & Co., the News Company, and other dealers, and presumably were sold. The rest of the edition, plates and sheets were destroyed in the great fire of April 18.

A Greeting From Colorado.

DURANGO, Colo., June 1, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have been buying the Argonaut for three years or more from one of the newspaper sellers here, and got the last number previous to the earthquake and fire. Since then I have enquired for the Argonaut, but they have not received a number yet. Hearing now and then of the reestablishment of different newspapers published in San Francisco before the fire of April 18th, I thought I would write and ask if you are alive. Also if you will mail me a copy direct of each number published by you since April 18th, 1906.

Yours truly,
RICHARD McCLOUD.

From a Washington Subscriber.

FERNDAL, Wash., June 6, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Will you please send me a copy of the Argonaut date of April 21st which failed to reach me? For twenty years the Argonaut has been a source of vast interest to me and mine, and we unite in wishing you a long-continued prosperity.

Yours truly,
A. W. THORNTON, M. D.

An Appreciation From Wyoming.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., June 6, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed please find money order for $4.00 to renew my subscription to your valued paper. Allow me to express my appreciation of your enterprise and energy in regularly continuing your issue under the greatest difficulties.

Wishing you all success.

Very truly,
T. W. ROEDING,
U. S. Dept. Agriculture.

From British Columbia.

VANCOUVER, B. C., June 10, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have been taking the Argonaut for the past twenty-five years—since coming to Vancouver—through Clark & Stewart, the booksellers here. The last copy I had was that which reached here May 7th. It was only today that I learned that you had arranged to publish regularly through all your troubles from earthquake and fire. Will you please send me the copies issued since the date indicated, and enter my name as a subscriber for as long a period as the enclosed $5.00 will pay for.

Very truly,
W. C. NICHOL.

Quality, Not Appearance.

CAMULOS, Cal., June 5, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: By express I am sending you some back numbers of the Argonaut. I am sorry that they are somewhat dilapidated, but I will send them nevertheless, as they may serve until you can replace them with better copies.

Do not do too much apologizing for the appearance of the paper today. A good many of us like the large type, and it is for the quality and not the appearance that we all value the Argonaut. I enclose check for renewal of subscription.

Yours very truly,
HERBERT FRYER.

An Ohio Reader's Comment.

CLEVELAND, O., June 6, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Enclosed find etc. I have been very much interested in watching the evolution of your newspaper and its interesting rise from its ashes.

Yours very truly,
JAMES PARMELEE.

The Habit of Reading the Argonaut.

LOYALTON, Cal., June 4, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: The "Argonautic habit," once acquired, is never broken. May its shadow never grow less. I beg to enclose a P. O. for its further continuance.

Yours very truly,
E. R. TROWBRIDGE.

A New York Reader Becomes a Subscriber.

NEW YORK, June 1st, 1906.

Jerome A. Hart, Esq.—My Dear Sir: A longtime reader desires to become a full-fledged subscriber, and encloses a form of exchange on San Jose for the amount of the first year's subscription. Accept it with congratulations on the pluck and courage which have brought you through the disaster, if somewhat battered, still in the ring.

Please register my address for the present as 25 Broad street, New York.

Yours faithfully,
WM. C. COX.

A Much Appreciated Gift.

VALLEJO, Cal., May 28, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: In compliance with your request in a recent issue, I am forwarding you several hundred copies of the Argonaut, some numbers running back to 1891; the volumes are incomplete, however, many numbers of them having been given away to friends who admired your paper. I hope they may be of some service to you in making an attempt to complete your files. With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,
GEORGE W. MORTON.

Missing a Number is a Distinct Loss.

1532 Grove St., San Francisco, Cal.,
June 5, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have had but three copies of the Argonaut since the great fire; those of April 28th, May 5th, and June 2d. The Argonaut is to me one of the very few papers the missing of a number of which is a distinct loss. Could you favor me with the missing numbers and greatly oblige,

Very cordially yours,
J. P. PRUTZMAN.

Better Now Than Later.

LA JOLLA, Cal., May 29, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Some time ago I wrote giving my new address, and asking for five copies of each back number since April 21st. I enclose check for $5.00—one dollar for the ten copies, and four to renew my subscription. My present subscription has some time yet to run, but a few dollars now may be better than more later.

Sincerely yours,
HENRY E. NOYES.

Lost Without the Argonaut.

SAN JOSE, Cal., June 10, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: We have taken the Argonaut for many years in San Francisco, but since the fire have not known where it was published, but now learn 'tis in San Jose. We would like it sent to the address below at once, as we are lost without it. And if you can, we would like all the numbers you have published since the fire, and date our subscription back to them. Will send a year's subscription when notified.

Yours truly,
DR. C. E. POST.

Argonauts for Our Files.

In response to the Argonaut's request for loose and unconnected copies of the Argonaut which we would be glad to have in order to build up complete files, we have received packages of papers from a number of our readers. Among the many who have very kindly sent us papers and to whom we extend our thanks are the following:

Mr. J. W. Cheney, Librarian, War Dept., Washington, D. C.
Mr. W. D. Littleton, San Francisco.
Mrs. Alphonso A. Wigmore, Los Angeles.
Mrs. A. T. Clark, San Bernardino.
Mr. D. A. Moulton, San Bernardino.
Mr. J. V. Clark, San Carlos, Cal.
Mrs. W. H. Hooper, 2241 Alameda ave., Alameda.
Mr. E. Roemer, Alameda, Cal.
Mr. J. H. Irvine, Seattle, Wash.
Mr. Knox Maddox, 2005 Sutter st., S. F.

TEMBLOR AND FIRE.

A Personal Narrative by Mary Austin, Author of "The Land of Little Rain," "Indio," Etc., in June Out West.

There are some fortunes harder to bear once they are done with than while they are doing, and there are three things that I shall never be able to abide in quietness again—the smell of burning, the creaking of housebeams in the night and the roar of a great city going past me in the street.

Ours was a quiet neighborhood in the best times; undisturbed except by the hawker's cry or the seldom whistling hum of the wire, and in the two days following April 18 it became a little lane out of Destruction. But nobody having suffered much in our immediate vicinity, we were left free to perceive that the very instant after the quake was tempered by the half-humorous, wholly American appreciation of a thoroughly good job. Half an hour after the temblor people sitting on their doorsteps, in bathrobes and kimonos, were admitting to each other with a half twist of laughter between tremblings that it was a really creditable shake.

The appreciation of calamity widened slowly as water rays on a mantling pond. Mercifully the temblor came at an hour when families had not divided for the day, but live wires sagging across housetops were to outdo the damage of falling walls. Almost before the dust of ruined walls had ceased rising, smoke began to go up against the sun, which, by 9 of the clock, showed bloodshot through it as the eye of Disaster.

It is perfectly safe to believe anything any one tells you of personal adventure; the inventive faculty does not exist which could outdo the actuality; little things prick themselves on the attention as the index of the greater horror.

I remember very clearly that in the first considered interval after the temblor I went about and took all the flowers out of the vases to save the water that was left; and that I went longer without washing my face than I ever expect to again.

I recall the red flare of a potted geranium undisturbed on a window ledge in a wall of which the brickwork dropped outward, while the roof had gone through the flooring; and the cross-section of a lodging house parted cleanly with all the little rooms unaltered, and the halls like burrows, as if it were the home of some superior sort of insect laid open to the microscope.

South of Market, in the district known as the Mission, there were cheap man-traps folded in like pasteboard, and from these, before the rip of the flames blotted out the sound, arose the thin, long scream of mortal agony.

Down on Market street Wednesday morning, when the smoke from the burning blocks behind began to pour through the windows, we saw an Italian woman kneeling on the street corner praying quietly. Her cheap belongings were scattered beside her on the ground and the crowd trampled them; a child lay on a heap of clothes and bedding beside her, covered and very quiet. The woman opened her eyes now and then looked at the reddening smoke and addressed herself to prayer as one sure of the stroke of fate. It was not until several days later that it occurred to me why the baby lay so quiet, and why the woman prayed instead of flying.

Not far from there, a day-old bride waited while her husband went back to the ruined hotel for some papers he had left, and the cornice fell on him; then a man who had known him, but not that he was married, came by and carried away the body and shipped it out of the city, so that for four days the bride knew not what had become of him.

There was a young man who, seeing a broken and dismantled grocery, meant no more than to save some food, for already the certainty of famine was upon the city—and was shot for looting. Then his women came and carried the body away, mother and betrothed, and laid it on the grass until space could be found for burial. They drew a handkerchief over its face and sat quietly beside it without bitterness or weeping.

The largeness of the event had the effect of reducing private sorrow to a mere pin prick and a point of time. Everybody tells you tales like this with more or less detail. Two blocks from us a man lay all day with a placard on his breast that he was shot for looting, and no one denied the aptness of the warning. The will of the people was toward authority, and everywhere the tread of soldiery brought a relieved sense of things orderly and secure. It was not as if the city had waited for Martial Law to be declared, but as if it precipitated itself into that state by instinct as its best refuge.

In the parks were the refugees huddled on the damp sod with insufficient bedding and less food and no water. They laughed. They had come out of their homes with scant possessions, often the least serviceable. They had lost business and clientele and tools, and they did not know if their friends had fared worse. Hot, stifling smoke billowed down upon them, cinders pattered like hail—and they laughed—not hysteria, but the laughter of unbroken courage.

That exodus to the park did not begin in our neighborhood until the second day; all the first day was spent in seeing such things as I relate, while confidently expecting the wind to blow the fire another way.

Safe to say one-half the loss of household goods might have been averted, had not the residents been too sure of such exemption. It happened not infrequently that when a man had seen his women safe he went out to relief work and returning found smoking ashes—and the family had left no address.

We were told of those who had dead in their households who took them up and fled with them to the likeliest place in the hope of burial, but before it had been accomplished were pushed forward by the flames. Yet to have taken part in that agonized race for the open was worth all it cost in goods.

Before the red night paled into murky dawn thousands of people were vomited out of the angry throat of the street far down toward Market. Even the smallest child carried something, or pushed it before him on a rocking chair, or dragged it behind him in a trunk, and the thing he carried was the index of the refugee's strongest bent. All the women saved their best hats and their babies, and, if there were no babies, some of them pushed pianos up the cement pavements.

All the faces were smutched and pallid, all the figures sloped steadily forward toward the cleared places. Behind them the expelling fire bent out over the lines of flight, the writhing smoke stooped and waved, a fine rain of cinders pattered and rustled over all the folks, and charred bits of the burning fled in the heated air and dropped among the goods. There was a strange, hot, sickish smell in the street as if it had become the hollow slot of some fiery breathing snake. I came out and stood, in the pale pinkish glow and saw a man I knew hurrying down toward the gutted district, the badge of a relief committee fluttering at his coat. "Bob," I said, "it looks like the day of judgment!" He cast back at me over his shoulder unveiled disgust at the inadequacy of my terms. "Aw!" he said, "it looks like hell!"

It was a well-bred community that poured itself out into Jefferson square, where I lay with my friend's goods, and we were packed too close for most of the minor decencies, but nobody forgot his manners. "Beg pardon!" said a man hovering over me with a 200-pound trunk. "Not at all!" I answered, making myself thin for him to step over, with an "Excuse me, Madam!" Another, fleeing from the too-heated border of the park to its packed center, deftly up-ended a roll of bedding, turned it across the woman who lay next to me—and the woman smiled.

Right here, if you had time for it, you gripped the large, essential spirit of the West, the ability to dramatize its own activity, and, while continuing in it, to stand off and be vastly entertained by it. In spite of individual heartsinkings, the San Franciscans during the week never lost the spirited sense of being audience to their own performance. Large figures of adventure moved through the murk of those days—Denman going out with his gun and holding up express wagons with expensively saved goods, which were dumped out on sidewalks that food might be carried to unfed hundreds; Father Ramon cutting away the timbers of St. Mary's tower, while the red glow crept across the charred cross out of reach of the hose; and the humbler sacrifices—the woman who shared her full breast with the child of another whose tountain had failed from weariness and fright—would that I had her name to hold in remembrance!

Everybody tells you tales like this, more, and better. All along the fire line of Van Ness avenue, heroic episodes transpired like groups in a frieze against the writhing background of furnace-heated flame; and, for a pediment to the frieze, rows of houseless, possessionless people wrapped in a large, impersonal appreciation of the spectacle.

From Gough street, looking down, we saw the great tide of fire roaring in the hollow toward Russian Hill; burning so steadily for all it burned so fast that it had the effect of immense deliberation, roaring on toward miles of uninhabited dwellings so lately emptied of life that they appeared consciously to await their immolation; beyond the line of roofs, the hill, standing up darkly against the glow of other incalculable fires, the uplift of flames from viewless intricacies of destruction, sparks beehiving furiously intermittent like the spray of bursting seas. Low down in front ran besmirched Lilliputians training inadequate hose and creating tiny explosions of a block or so of expensive dwellings by which the rest of us were ultimately saved; and high against the tip of flame where it ran out in broken sparks, the figure of the priest chopping steadily at the tower with the constrained small movement of a mechanical toy.

Observe that a moment since I said houseless people, not homeless; for it comes to this with the bulk of San Franciscans, that they discovered the place and the spirit to be home rather than the walls and the furnishings. No matter how the insurance totals foot up, what landmarks, what treasures of art are evanished, San Francisco, our San Francisco, is all there yet. Fast as the tall banners of smoke rose up and the flames reddened them, rose up with it something impalpable, like an exhalation. We saw it breaking up in the movement of the refugee, heard it in the tones of their voices, felt it as they wrestled in the teeth of destruction. The sharp sentences by which men called to each other to note the behavior of brick and stone dwellings contained a hint of a warning already accepted for the new building before the old had crumbled. When the heat of conflagration outran the flames and reaching over wide avenues caught high gables and crosses of church steeples, men watching them smoke and blister and crackle into flame said shortly, "No more wooden towers for San Francisco!" and saved their breath to run with the hose.

What distinguishes the personal experience of the destruction of the gray city from all like disasters of record is the keen appreciation of the deathlessness of the spirit of living.

For the greater part of this disaster—the irreclaimable loss of goods and houses, the violent deaths—was due chiefly to man contrivances, to the sinking of made ground, to huddled buildings cheapened by greed, to insensate clinging to the outer shells of life; the strong tug of nature was always toward the renewal of it. Births near their time came on hurriedly; children were delivered in the streets or the midst of burnings, and none the worse for the absence of conventional circumstance; marriages were made amazingly, as the disorder of the social world threw all men back severely upon its primal institutions.

After a great lapse of time, when earthquake stories had become matter for humorous reminiscence, burning blocks topics of daily news, and standing in the bread line a fixed habit—by the morning of the third day, to be exact—there arose a threat of peril greater than the thirst or famine, which all the world rose up swiftly to relieve.

Thousands of families had camped in parks not meant to be lived in, but to be looked at; lacking the most elementary means of sanitation. With the rising of the sun, a stench arose from these places and increased perceptibly; spreading with it like an exhalation went the fear of pestilence. But this at least was a dread that every man could fight at his own camp, and the fight was the modern conviction of the relativity of sanitation to health. By mid-morning the condition of Jefferson Square was such that I should not have trusted myself to it for three hours more, but in three hours it was made safe by no more organized effort than came of the intelligent recognition of the peril. They cleaned the camp first, and organized committees of sanitation afterward.

There have been some unconsidered references of the earthquake disaster to the judgment of God; happily not much of it, but enough to make pertinent some conclusions that shaped themselves swiftly as the city fought and ran. Not to quarrel with the intelligence that reads God behind seismic disturbance, one must still note that the actual damage done by God to the city was small beside the possibilities for damage that reside in man-contrivances; for most man-made things do inherently carry the elements of their own destruction.

How much of all that happened of distress and incalculable loss could have been averted if men would live along the line of the Original Intention, with wide, clean breathing spaces and room for green growing things to push up between?

I have an indistinct impression that the calendar time spent in the city after the temblor was about ten days. I remember the night of rain, and seeing a grown man sitting on a curbstone the morning after, sobbing in the final break-down of bodily endurance. I remember, too, the sigh of the wind through windows of desolate walls, and the screech and clack of ruined cornices in the red, noisy night, and the cheerful banging of pianos in the camps; the burials in trenches and the little, bluish, grave-long heaps of burning among the ruins of Chinatown, and the laughter that shook us as in the midst of the ashy desert we poured in dogged stream to the ferry, at a placard that in a half-burned building where activity had begun again, swung about in the wind and displayed this legend: DONT TALK EARTHQUAKE, TALK BUSINESS.

All these things seem to have occurred within a short space of days, but when I came out at last at Berkeley—too blossomy, too full-leaved, too radiant—by this token I knew that a great hiatus had taken place. It had been long enough to forget that the smell of sun-steeped roses could be sweet.

LONDON'S UNDER WORLD.

The Human Wild Beasts That Prowl and Prey in the Jungle of London.

The London policeman is justly famous all over the world; he is regarded by foreigners as one of the finest and most imposing institutions of the British empire's metropolis, says the St. James Gazette. But what is it that has given our constables their celebrity? The picture that rises in the average man's mind, if he is asked for an explanation of the universal respect and appreciation accorded the London policeman, is Henley's aptly indicated scene in which one describes the rather sombre, burly figure of the police officer, mud-splashed but imperturbable, in the noisy center of a maze of traffic, "With uplifted hand conducting the orchestral Strand."

Yes, it is largely upon his magnificent and never-questioned control of cabs and omnibuses, and also, of course, upon his grave judicial courtesy to flurried questioners, that the fame of the London policeman is founded. If the London constable has earned a just fame upon the strength of his courtesy to pedestrians and his fine control of street traffic, how much more credit would be his if the public did but realize that these two characteristics of the force are no more than single facets of a many-sided usefulness, of an efficiency and thoroughness in vital matters, in view of which such details pale into complete insignificance!

The police control of London's enormous street traffic is fine and thorough; but the police control of those forces in the world of London which make for anarchy and dissolution is not less than marvelous; the police guardianship of London's colossal wealth; its maintenance of London's peace—these things, if you like, are worthy of the world's admiration and esteem. And these are matters with regard to the actualities of which the average man knows nothing. The ordinary citizen admits the general upshot of it all—not any too gratefully when he is a taxpayer—but appreciate the true wonder of it he cannot; because the process and the forces it contends with are almost entirely beyond his ken.

Consider for a moment a little simple comparison. The continent of Australia, with its half-dozen States, governors, legislatures, railway systems, and the like, has an area of about three million square miles. The metropolitan area is well under seven hundred square miles. Australia's population is somewhat under four millions, and that of the metropolitan district nearly seven millions. In other words, Australia carries about one person to the square mile, and London carries about one hundred thousand to the same space. Thus it will be seen that there are a good many people to be looked after in London.

As for the wealth of London, that is not so easy of computation; it is fabulously great—greater than the wealth of many large countries. Its mere rateable value for police purposes, and without including its golden heart—the City—is about fifty millions sterling; but that is no more than a drop in the basin of London's prodigious wealth. Its administrative expenses are far greater than those of the whole of Denmark. There are fully one hundred thousand criminals in London, and a police force of some sixteen thousand men of all ranks stands between the hundred thousand predatory creatures and the six and a half million of unarmed working bees and gaudy drones, the misers, spendthrifts, idlers, women, children, invalids, crossing-sweepers, millionaires, and the rest of the large preoccupied army of makers, dispensers, and accumulators of unreckonable wealth.

There are some sixteen thousand guardians of the peace in the metropolitan area. Sick leave, ordinary leave, special duty, and other matters account for a couple of thousand for actual duty. These are employed in eight-hour shifts, since even the London policeman must sleep and eat. Thus the maximum number of police on duty at any given moment is about four thousand seven hundred.

There are fully a hundred thousand of the recognizably predatory humans to engage the attention of the four and a half thousand of metropolitan police. There are, unfortunately, many hundreds of the permanently idle and generally hungry. The relation between hunger and nature's first and most undeniable law is terribly intimate.

The handful of men in blue patrol the huge and densely peopled jungle we call London, unarmed and unafraid. The hundred thousand human animals of prey prowl in and out beside the guardians, like wolves about a sheepfold, outnumbering the shepherds by twenty-five to one. The monstrous, pitiful battalion of the unemployed and unemployable stand about in a circle, wan, dull, and motionless, yet forced always to consciousness by the war waged within them between the narcotic of despair and the irritant of hunger.

That is London. It is one of the most terrible, the most awe-inspiring, the most splendid, and the most tragic pictures that the world has to show. Literature and art have nothing to compare with it for poignancy of tragedy and romance, dignity and misery, splendor and pitifulness. It is London—the most amazing mass of contrasts in all Christendom, the most wonderful example in the world of the powers and the weaknesses, the blessings and the curses of modern civilization. It is London, and baffles him who would describe it as surely as it defeats the ambition of the man who seeks completely to master its manifold intricacies. But it is as well that those who live within its far-flung lines should learn to understand as much as they are able of its mysteries.

No other subject of study could be more fascinating, more rich in variety, and in the lore of men and women than London. The men who have studied the whole of its surface, its most obvious characteristics, are very, very few. In the nature of things, the vastness of the metropolis makes this inevitable. The strange thing is that the great bulk of London's respectable millions should know practically nothing whatever about the under structure of the living world they inhabit. They know a certain set of streets, a certain set of men and women of their own particular order, and a certain class of surface customs, rules, and characteristics of London life. It is as though they were content to believe that the soil of that part of England consisted of wood-pavement and asphalt, and never realized that primeval clay lay beneath the well-ordered smoothness of the streets.

Just so primeval human nature—simple, savage, cunning, crude, and unmoral—lies beneath the surface of London society—beneath all the well-ordered smoothness of demeanor which characterizes the vast majority of respectable and preoccupied Londoners. A certain set of watchful authorities are keenly alive to this fact; the business of their lives is never to lose sight of it. They keep the countless wheels of the huge machine working freely and smoothly. London's vast wealth of law-abiding citizens and of treasure lies on the surface. The forces which make for dissolution are beneath the surface. The business of the authorities is to prevent those forces ever breaking through to the surface of densely populated London.

Plymouth Harbour.

Oh, what know they of harbours
Who toss not on the sea!
They tell of fairer havens,
But none so fair there be

As Plymouth town outstretching
Her quiet arms to me;
Her breast's broad welcome spreading
From Mewstone to Penlee.

Ah, with this home-thought, darling,
Come crowding thoughts of thee.
Oh, what know they of harbours
Who toss not on the sea!

De Coelo.

"Sleep on, I lie at heaven's high oriel,"
Over the stars that murmur as they go,
Lighting your lattice-window far below
And every star some of the glory spells,
Whereof I know.

I have forgotten you long, long ago,
Like the sweet, silver-singing of thin bells
Vanished, or music, faint and low.
"Sleep on, I lie at heaven's high oriel,"
Who loved you so.

—John H. Wheelock.

The Pure in Heart.

In the vale of the Cornwallis
Lettice lies asleep.
And the tides forever moving
All about her creep.
And the five sea-rivers flowing
Day and night, keep coming, going,
But they rouse not little Lettice
From her sleep.

Through the marshes of Cornwallis,
Through the rusty red,
Slips the sea his shining fingers
All about her bed.
And the zigzag birds are stringing
Up above the bleak Cornwallis,
And the sad brown grasses singing
Round her head.

Little Lettice was my sister,
And we used to play
On the hills and by the beaches,
In the salt sea-spray.
Lettice loved the squirrel's chirring
And the crumpled leaves a-stirring
In the vale of the Cornwallis
All the day.

The Doll.

A man said to a woman,
"Lovely indeed thou art!
Give me thy charm, thy witchery,
But—not thy woman-heart.

"Give me thy sunny hours,
But not thy secret tears;
Give me thy hope, thy happiness,
But not thy woman's fears."

The woman's pride was mighty
Like to the pride of men,
But now her soul went weeping,
Nor ever smiled again.

—Louise Morgan Sill, in Harper's Weekly.

Nancy's Eyes.

In Nancy's eyes two spirits dwell;
I fear them, yet I love them well—
Alas, I am not wise!
They beckon, and I come with glee,
Although it is not best for me
To look in Nancy's eyes.

In Nancy's eyes I often find
A tendency to be unkind;
They greet me with surprise,
As if they did not know my days
Are dark as night unless I gaze
Just once in Nancy's eyes.

Yet in these eyes I sometimes see
A welcome all reserved for me,
Which deep within them lies;
And something tells me, secretly,
It's Nancy's heart that looks at me—
Sometimes through Nancy's eyes.

THE EARTHQUAKE ZONE.

A Remarkable Article on the Faults and Fissures Along the California Coast Range.

A remarkable article on the faults and fissures along the California coast range is to be found in World's Work. It is written by Arthur C. Spencer and Ralph Arnold and is the clearest and least technical of any earthquake article that we have seen. It is well worth reading.

A calamity like that attending the recent earthquake in California opens many questions concerning the causes of such paroxysms of the earth. There are many gaps in our knowledge, and differences of opinion among authorities, but the general theory is made more complete through new data gleaned from study, after each great shock. Many expert observers have already begun collecting evidence bearing on the San Francisco earthquake. Several features of it, however, harmonize so closely with records of past times, to be read from the topography and earth architecture of California, that certain of the main conclusions of the investigations may be forecast.

The Pacific Coast region of the United States lies within a great zone of closely related mountains extending from Cape Horn 10,000 miles northwestward to Alaska. Practically all of the present conformation of California has been produced in comparatively recent geologic time, mainly since the beginning of the so-called Tertiary age immediately preceding the Quaternary age in which we live. The mountains have been formed by the uplifting of great blocks of the earth's crust. The intervening valleys follow either the down-tilted sides of the mountain blocks, or down-thrown areas between them. The displacements that result in the throwing up of mountain blocks and the dropping of valleys between are called by geologists "faults," and the cracks where the uplifted and dropped blocks touch are called fault fissures. In California the fault blocks are always long and narrow and they run mainly northwest and southeast, except in the belt of east and west coast ranges, about fifty miles wide, which reaches the Pacific ocean at Point Concepcion. The master block of the Sierra Nevada range has been raised by complex faulting in a narrow zone along its eastern edge, and toward the western side there seems to be a general tilting which continues not only to the base of the mountains, but also beneath the great valley of California occupied by the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. From the western edge of this valley rises the great block carrying the Coast Ranges. This second master block includes not only the Coast Ranges, but a belt of submarine mountains extending to the border of the continental shelf overlooking the Pacific deeps. The bank where the continent rises out of the ocean depths, revealed by soundings, may be assumed to have been produced by fault displacements like those that created the Sierra and the Coast ranges and possibly even more profound.

The Coast Ranges form a belt from fifty to eighty miles wide between the Great Valley and the ocean, and almost all the destructive earthquakes occurring since American occupation have been confined to this belt. As studies of these mountains and of the intervening valleys are extended, it becomes more and more apparent that almost all the prominent features have been produced primarily by fault displacements, and only modified by erosion. There are evidences of faults everywhere throughout the Coast Range belt; but there is a narrow zone of dominating disturbance traceable from the Gulf of California to the Pacific Ocean near Point Arena.

From the gulf this zone runs north and about sixty degrees west, past San Bernardino, and northeast of the San Gabriel Range to the headwaters of the San Joaquin river. Here it takes a new direction, about north forty degrees west, and with almost no deviation, follows the eastern border of the Carisa Plain to Polonio Pass, hence the western side of San Benito Valley to the flank of the Santa Cruz mountains opposite San Jose, passing six miles west of Stanford University and reaching the coast near Mussel Rock toward the northern end of the San Francisco peninsula. Still farther to the north on the same course it strikes along the coast to Point Arena.

Records of recurring movements along this line are preserved here and there throughout its course. Not only are the mountain masses and deep valleys aligned with or parallel to it, but minor ridges, local depressions and even rivulets give mute testimony to the forces which have been and still are intermittently active along it.

The San Francisco peninsula has been particularly affected by ancient movements, and here displacements have been distributed along several fissures, the positions of which are marked by narrow fault valleys, one of which contains the Lakes San Andreas and Crystal Springs belonging to San Francisco's water system. To the northwest of these lakes a series of sinks reveals the existence of a cleft, the opening of which occurred many years ago, in all probability before the Spanish occupation. Similar depressions in the Cholame Valley near Parkfield mark the "volcanic crack" opened during the quake of 1868. It is said that vaqueros from Rancho Cholame, attempting to sound this chasm, were unable to find its bottom with the combined lengths of several sixty-foot lariats. Judging from the present appearance of the sinks the width of the fissure at the surface must have been eight or ten feet. Forty miles to the southeast a steep bank, in places from six to ten feet high, rises from the Carisa Plain along a corresponding break.

A belt of extensive faulting not yet fully studied enters the Russian River valley from the northwest and extends to past Santa Rosa into San Pablo Bay. This long depression has been shown to be a down-thrown block, and there is every reason for ascribing a like origin to Napa Valley on the east, the continuous depression occupied by San Francisco Bay and the Santa Clara-San Benito Valley, and to Salinas Valley south of the principal fault zone which has been described. Along these valleys the greatest destructive effect of the recent earthquake was exhibited. To the north, Napa and the towns along the Russian river were greatly shaken, though Sacramento in the Great Valley was relatively uninjured. To the south of the metropolis, Stanford University, San Jose, Hollister, Santa Cruz and Salinas suffered severely. Early dispatches reported that north of Salinas and a few miles inland from the Bay of Monterey, a line of mud geysers appeared and a crack in the ground was repeatedly opened and closed. Santa Cruz, which lies on the north side of Monterey Bay in line with the axis of Salinas Valley, is situated near a zone of complicated faulting which follows the easterly flank of Ben Lomond Mountain toward the northwest.

All the points which have been made about the geologic structure of the Coast Ranges indicate slipping of the earth's rock-strata along the faults as the origin for California's long list of earthquakes. The facts eliminate almost conclusively the possibility of any connection with volcanic activity, since the very latest volcanism in the California Coast Ranges was manifested in later Miocene time, certainly not less than a million years ago.

In the earthquake of April 18 the region of greatest destruction was a belt nowhere exceeding fifty, and for the most part only twenty-five miles wide, but more than 250 miles long. This strip of territory, lying entirely within and running parallel with the Coast Ranges, is paralleled by the zones of fault displacement which have been described. The reported opening of a chasm near the Dolores Mission in San Francisco leads to the expectation that this phenomenon will be found to have occurred along a known geologic fault which crosses Valencia Street near Eighteenth, and extends to the northwest toward the Presidio.

The facts, then, support the conclusions that the recent earthquake originated in a sudden adjustment, caused by accumulated stresses within the great Coast Range block of the earth's outer crust; that the initial concussion will be found to have been distributed lineally, rather than to have been situated at a definite point; and, finally, that the lines of greatest disturbance will be proved coincident with some of the main fault fissures which traverse the Coast Range belt. The rapidly decreasing intensity of shocks toward the east is what might be expected from the known existence of many northwest and southeast fault zones within the Coast Ranges, for vibratory waves of all sorts are propagated in the same manner through all kinds of media, and earth waves caused by subterranean concussions conform to the same laws of reflection and refraction as waves of sound and light, and are equally likely to be dissipated in traversing non-homogeneous or discontinuous materials. Discontinuity is certainly a feature of the earth's crust in California, and to this fact must be attributed the limited east and west intensity of the recent earthquake.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Those who are making arrangements for the proposed monster reception in honor of W. J. Bryan when he arrives in New York from his tour around the world announce that W. R. Hearst and his friends will not take part in the affair. They had invited Mr. Hearst and his editor, Arthur Brisbane, to serve on the committee on plan and scope. Hearst, who has come to California, has ignored the invitation and Brisbane has declined to serve.

Wu Ting-fang has left Peking. He goes into retirement, and after visiting the tombs of his ancestors will reside at Shanghai, that haven for wealthy Chinese seeking freedom from official interference. Wu retires discouraged by the outlook, seeing no reasonable prospect of reform in the judicial system or the monetary system.

John Sharp Williams, the minority leader of the House, is seriously quitting politics for a professorship in the University of Virginia. The professorship would pay $4000 a year with quarters at the university. Mr. Williams, who is one of the wealthiest cotton planters of the South, is a profound student and was largely educated at Heidelberg in Germany. He attended that university while the present German Emperor was a student there. Mr. Williams is in direct line for election to the United States Senate.

The Delaware Legislature on June 13 elected Henry A. Dupont United States Senator for the term beginning March 3, 1905. His election was practically unanimous, as the Democratic members voted blanks. Colonel Dupont is 68 years old, a native of Delaware, the head of the great powder works bearing his name, and is very wealthy. He served throughout the War of the Rebellion.

At the graduation exercises at West Point General Horace Porter, president of the board of visitors, delivered the address to the graduates, and Secretary Taft presented the diplomas. When the name of Cadet Adna R. Chaffee Jr. was called, Secretary Taft said: "My young friend, I am going to ask your father to deliver your diploma, and hope you will follow in his footsteps." General Chaffee advanced, saluted and handed his son the diploma amid silence.

Miss Anna Strunsky of San Francisco, who at 25 is known to fame as a writer, speaker and collaborator with Jack London, recently went to St. Petersburg on an errand connected with the revolutionary propaganda. There she met William English Walling, a young millionaire from Chicago, whom she married. Miss Strunsky, while a student at Leland Stanford Jr. University, helped Jack London write the "Kemp-ton-Wace Letters." The book was published anonymously in 1903. Walling is the son of Dr. Willoughby Walling, a Chicago physician. His grandfather, William C. English, ran for Vice President on the Democratic ticket in 1880, and when he died left him a fortune of several millions.

Captain Robert F. Wynne, United States Marine Corps, attached to the battleship Alabama, has behind him very powerful political influence. He is being tried on the charge of refusing to obey an order of a superior officer. Captain Wynne is a son of Robert J. Wynne, Consul General in London, former Postmaster General and a close personal friend of President Roosevelt. Mr. Wynne is in this country now and has already been in consultation with the President and Navy officials concerning the case of his son. He refused to obey the orders (to report for duty) of Lieutenant Commander Henry F. Bryan, acting commander of the battleship Alabama, who sent Lieutenant John Newton Jr. with two privates to bring Captain Wynne to the deck, by force if necessary.

VANITY FAIR.

President Roosevelt called in a number of correspondents of Republican papers last week and told them how anxious he is to get $25,000 a year from Congress for traveling expenses. He was much displeased when he found that the appropriation had been eliminated from the Sundry Civil bill on a point of order raised by Representative Williams.

He feels that $25,000 a year would barely pay for his official visits to different sections of the country. He is compelled to take with him two Secret Service men, three representatives of press associations, a secretary and a stenographer. In addition he must take on his car local newspaper men and officials. This brings his expenses up to a large aggregate sum. The President feels that it is his duty as Chief Executive to travel. He dislikes to accept favors from railroad companies, and he is unable to afford the expense from his own pocket.

His idea is to have authority given him to use $100,000 during a four-year term. Otherwise the appropriation of $25,000 a year would not be adequate. His trip to the Pacific coast three years ago cost $50,000.

In his opinion the railroads lose nothing by furnishing the President with free cars and transportation. He feels that they sell excursion tickets and secure enough benefits in advertising to more than compensate them.

The President is also displeased because Congress has not provided him with suitable stable accommodations. He says the stable is unsanitary, and he will not keep his own riding horses in it. Wyoming, his favorite saddle horse, presented to him by the ranchmen of Wyoming, died in this stable. It is the intention of the President, if Congress does not make proper provision for his horses, to ask that the executive stable be closed and that he be given authority to board the horses elsewhere.

These things he recited with much earnestness to the correspondents.

King Edward paid a surprise visit on Sunday of last week to Mrs. George Cornwallis West (who was Lady Randolph Churchill, and who was before that Miss Jerome of New York), at her charming little country place sixteen miles from London. Not till Saturday afternoon did he send word to Mrs. West that he would lunch with her next day, "bringing a couple of friends." They proved to be Mrs. Keppel and Consuelo, Duchess of Manchester, who arrived with him in the King's motor car. Mrs. West invited her son, Winston Churchill. It is easy now to cater for the King, as he is strictly dieting. He eats only a little fish or fowl for luncheon, while tea, which in other days was a substantial meal, now consists of one weak cup of tea and two small, thin pieces of toast, which he butters lightly. His Majesty was highly pleased with Mrs. West's house, where he passed a very quiet day. He asked Winston Churchill what his new house was like. "Oh, sir, it's only a bandbox," replied Churchill, with unaccustomed modesty. "Then I must go and see your bandbox shortly," rejoined the King. The King sat in the garden and smoked cigars, while Mrs. West played on the piano.

The tide of European travel is setting across the Atlantic with unprecedented strength, according to that faithful index, the number of passports issued by the State Department. Last January there were issued passports aggregating 1528; in February, 1049; March, 1688; April, 2299, and May, 3028. These figures show that the applications for passports have been running about 200 per month more than the average issues of past years.

Nothing can convince London, at the moment, that the women in America are not going about clad in the fashion of Mother Eve, less modestly arrayed than was Lady Godiva, says the London correspondent of the New York World. The newspapers assert that a crusade is being waged in America against the peek-a-boo shirt waist, and long descriptions of the shoving garments worn by women there are being published. One journal has canvassed twenty of the greatest dry good stores in London to discover whether there is likely to be a peek-a-boo shirt waist craze in that truly prim country. Nor can anybody make London believe that every American man there is not a millionaire. The newspapers teem with descriptions of Americans and accounts of what they are doing. The great hotels—Claridge's, the Savoy, the Carlton, the New Ritz—are the centers of this feverish interest in Americans. Claridge's is the only hotel where an American who really is a millionaire can hope to obtain privacy. When the Vanderbilts, the William Rockefeller and the Marshall Fields were staying at Claridge's last year they summoned the manager and told him that they would leave immediately if anything more about their doings in the hotel appeared in the newspapers. Every American at these hotels is regarded as legitimate prey by the tradesmen and dealers in London. They lay siege to his hotel and try to ambuscade him in the halls or in the street. Art dealers rush over from Paris bearing priceless works of art to the American millionaires; jewelers tote jewels worth a king's ransom to them all day long, and younger sons of the aristocracy tout to them, for dealers, alleged antiques. Needy dowagers roll up to the hotels in hired carriages, gush their way into private sitting rooms and propose audacious schemes to chaperon the millionaire's wives in the most exclusive society. Young Vanderbilt received four hundred begging letters a day last year on an average. The old oak furniture factories in Yorkshire and Belgium are now working overtime turning out treasures for American millionaires. Of these, the most popular this season is the chair in which King Charles I sat during his trial by Parliament. Three thousand of these chairs have been made and sold already.

The growth of enormous fortunes in the United States is bringing back the old English fashion of high-class domestic service. In that time the domestic chaplain was an upper servant who received less consideration than the modern butler, and the family lawyer was a functionary of hardly more worth and dignity. The family doctor, having the power of life and death, may have been treated with more civility, but the trials of tutors and governesses in wealthy families always have been a fruitful topic of pathetic fiction. The fashion is coming back to the excessive rich. The bread and butter of the clergymen still depends on the favor of the rich men.

The retirement of the pastor of what is called the Rockefeller church in New York calls attention to the fact that the richest man in America is the patron of two churches and a great university. The cause of Dr. Johnston's retirement is a mystery. It is said that some of his timid animadversions upon the arrogance of wealth and the evils of Wall street gambling have given offense in powerful quarters.

The high class domestic service of the excessive rich is not confined to the cure of souls. Cases are not uncommon where a lawyer or physician practices his profession for the sole benefit of a wealthy man.

When Chauncey Depew was general counsel of the New York Central he served and touted for the rich Vanderbilt family everywhere, from the dinner table to the Legislature at Albany. The humiliations of ancient domestic chaplains are recalled by the refusal of one of the Vanderbilt women to receive him at her table on the ground that her own butler had no seat there.

It is a disputed point among well-dressed men whether the Tuxedo coat should be of gray or black. Here is the view of a prominent tailor: The Tuxedo coat is a garment that should never be worn in the presence of a woman unless she happens to be the wife or near relative of the man. It should be made of dark gray material. Oxford is the proper shade. The coat should be cut with peaked lapels, because the shawl collar has seen its day. The collar also should be of the material the remainder of the coat is made of instead of silk facing. The waistcoat and trousers should be of the same material. The shoes should be black and the tie of a dark gray. The gold studs and cuff buttons should be of dull gold and the hat what we used to call a crusher. The opera hat of silk should never be worn with the Tuxedo coat. It is necessary to change from the jet black because the waiter's jacket is made of that shade and it is difficult to distinguish between the man who eats and the man who serves the food.

A FLAG-DAY POEM.

"Old Glory," Chant Royal, by Emma Frances Dawson.

Editor of the Argonaut: Thirty of the members of the George H. Thomas Circle No. 32, of the Grand Army of the Republic celebrated Flag day June 14th by giving a house-warming at the home of Mrs. Belinda S. Bailey, who had been burned out in the fire and had moved to 519 Clayton street. At this meeting a resolution was passed that the Chant Royal "Old Glory," be printed and that a copy be furnished the Argonaut in the interest of patriotism, with a request that it be printed in the Argonaut in the near future. Mrs. Nellie Holbrook Blinn recited the poem with dramatic effect and explained that the chant received the prize among several others competing at the time it was written. Miss Dawson is still living, I understand, and though unable to earn her living by her literary work, is persistent through pride—in refusing aid from her friends.

The next meeting of our society will be held July 14th, at the home of Mrs. Richard A. Sarle, 3809 Clay street. The secretary is Mrs. Chas. H. Smitten, No. 145 Beula street.

We are a martial organization of the wives, sisters and daughters, also granddaughters over 16 years of age, of honorable discharged soldiers and sailors of the war for the Union, numbering now over 26,000 members, with departments in most of the northern and western States.

I am, respectfully,
BELINDA S. BAILEY,
Chairman Committee.

"Old Glory!"

(Chant Royal.)

Enchanted web! A picture in the air,
Drifted to us from out the distant blue
From shadowy ancestors through whose brave
We live in magic of a dream come true—
With Covenanters' blue, as if were glassed,
In dewy flower-heart, the stars that passed,
O blood-veined blossom that can never blight!
The Declaration, like a sacred rite,
Is in each star and stripe declamatory,
The Constitution thou shalt long recite,
Our hallowed, eloquent, beloved "Old Glory!"

O symphony in red, white, blue!—fanfare
Of trumpet, roll of drum, forever new Reverberations of the Bell, that bears
Its tones of liberty the wide world through!
In battle dreaded like a cyclone blast!
Symbol of land and people unsurpassed
Thy brilliant day shall never have a night,
On foreign shore no pomp so grand a sight,
No face so friendly, naught consolatory
Like glimpse of lofty spar with thee bedight,
Our hallowed, eloquent, beloved "Old Glory!"

Thou art the one flag, an embodied prayer,
One, highest and most perfect to review;
Without one, nothing; it is lineal, square,
Has properties of all the numbers, too—
Cube, solid, square root, root of root; best class
It for His essence the Creator, cast.
For purity are the six stripes of white,
This number circular and endless quite—
Six times, well knows the scholar wan and hoar
His compass, spanning circle, can alight—
Our hallowed, eloquent, beloved "Old Glory!"

Boldly thy seven lines of scarlet flare;
As when o'er old centurion it blew.
(Red is the trumpet's tone, it means to dare!)
God favored seven when creation grew.
The seven planets, seven hues contrast,
The seven metals, seven days; not last
The seven tones of marvelous delight
That lend the listening soul their wings for flight
But why complete the bappy category
That gives thy thirteen stripes their charm might?
Our hallowed, eloquent, beloved "Old Glory!"

In thy dear colors honored everywhere,
The great and mystic ternion we view;
Faith, Hope and Charity are numbered there,
And the three nails the crucifixion knew.
Three are offended when one has trespassed,
God, and one's neighbor and one's self aghast.
Christ deity, and soul, and manhood's height
The Father, Son, and Ghost may here unite;
With texts like these, divinely monitory,
What wonder that thou conquest in fight,
Our hallowed, eloquent, beloved "Old Glory!"

ENVOI.

O blessed Flag! sign of our precious Past,
Triumphant Present, and our Future vast,
Beyond starred blue and bars of sunset bright
Lead us to higher realm of Equal Right!
Float on, in ever lovely allegory,
Kin to the eagle, and the wind and light,
Our hallowed, eloquent, beloved "Old Glory!"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A Parsee visiting London for the first time dined one night with the Bishop, who tried to convert him.

Now, the Parsees are sun worshipers, and it did not occur to the Bishop when he took up his line of argument that the London winter season is one long, cold, wet fog, and that the sun never shows himself. Said the Bishop:

"Here you are, my friend, a man of culture, widely traveled, generous, brave, wise, and yet you worship the sun. How can you do it? I can't understand how any sensible person should worship a created object such as the sun."

"Ah, but you should see it once," cried the Parsee warmly. "You have no idea what a splendid thing it is."

"Children," said the teacher, instructing the class in composition, "you should not attempt any flights of fancy. Do not imitate any other person's writings or draw inspiration from outside sources; simply be yourselves and write what is in you."

As a result of this advice Tommy Wise turned out the following composition: "We should not attempt any flights of fancy, but write what is in us. In me there is my tumnick, lungs, hart, liver, two apples, one piece of pie, one stick of lemon candy and my dinner."

"About the best advice that I ever had was given me once by an old fellow who took care of the furnace in my house," said a wine lover. "There was a cask of cheap wine in the cellar, the contents of which had mysteriously grown less."

"How can I stop them from stealing that wine?" I asked the furnace man.

"That's easy enough, sor," said he, "just put a cask of good wine alongside of it."

A traveling salesman in the employ of a large bicycle manufacturer in Philadelphia was obliged to go on a business trip into the West about the time an interesting domestic event was expected. The salesman desired his sister to wire him results, according to a formula something like this: If a boy, "Man's safety arrived"; if a girl, "Lady's safety arrived."

To the astonishment of the father-elect, when he had been gone but a few days he received a telegram containing but one word: "Tandem."

Frank Smith has a number of mail-carrying contracts in San Francisco. His wagons take the mails to and from the postoffice and trains. He was not able to operate his wagons on the day of the earthquake, but got them going the second day. The postoffice Department complimented him for getting the wagons out the second day, it fined him for not having them at work the first day.

That reminds one of a mail carrier in Maine who took the mails part of the way in a canoe. One day the canoe upset and the carrier was drowned. The Postoffice Department sent an inspector up to the site, found how much of his route the carrier had covered up to the time he was drowned and pro-rated his pay to that point.

In a recent murder trial in San Francisco Assistant District Attorney Louis Ward was for the prosecution and ex-Governor Budd and Abraham Ruef for the defense. Attorney Ward kept dwelling on an alleged resemblance between the course of the defense and that of the men who are charged with having killed Heber C. Tilden. Attorney Budd became noticeably more impatient every time this simile was dwelt upon, and finally exclaimed:

"Your Honor, I am not counsel for the man who shot Heber Tilden, and I object to being made to try a case which I know nothing about."

The Assistant District Attorney promptly turned to the former Governor and remarked:

"I don't see what difference it makes to you, Governor, whether you know anything about a case or not, when you are arguing restaurant of Paris, set afloat many stories about him. Among his patrons was Aurelian Scholl. It was he who told of a little mistake in addition to which he once called Bignon's attention. On two successive days Scholl had ordered precisely the same dejeuner. For the first the charge was 23 francs; the next day the bill was 28. Bignon was summoned. "How is this? A discrepancy of 5 francs, and for the same items!" "Strange, indeed," said Bignon; "I will inquire." Soon he returned radiant. "Just as I thought! The cashier made a mistake against herself of 5 francs yesterday. But I will not make you pay it!" Another day, Prince Demidoff glanced at his bill and saw a fish put down at 6 francs. "The devil!" he exclaimed; "fish must be scarce this year." "Oh, no," affably replied Bignon, "it is not fish that are scarce, but Prince Demidoffs!"

When opera glasses first came commonly into use a young man escorted his aged maiden aunt from the country to a "playhouse." During one of the acts she complained that the light was too dim. He borrowed an opera glass from the friend sitting near, and, handing it to her, said: "Here, auntie, try this glass." Covering the suspicious-looking object with her handkerchief, she placed it to her lips and took a long pull, and then handed it back to her nephew in great disgust, saying disappointedly: "Why, there isn't a drop in it."

Among the wild escapades remembered of Lord Waterford's youth is one of the time when he was living in Dublin with his uncle, the primate. Coming home late at night, he had a great quarrel with his cabman about the fare and left the man swearing outside the door. Dashing into the hall, he found his uncle's gown and trencher lying on the side table, and, putting them hastily on, he turned and, going out with a stick and a gruff voice, said: "What do you mean by coming here and trying to cheat my nephew? I'll teach you not to do such things for the future," and he thrashed him soundly. The man went away, saying that he had been thrashed by the Archbishop of Armagh in person.

Klopstock, the German poet whom his admirers rashly compared to Milton, was once questioned at Gettengen as to the exact meaning of one of his stanzas. He read it over once or twice, and then delivered this judgment: "I cannot remember what I meant when I wrote it, but I do remember that it was one of the finest things I ever wrote, and you cannot do better than devote your lives to the discovery of its meaning."

The late Rufus E. Shapley, the brilliant Philadelphia lawyer, wrote "Solid for Mulhooly," which had an immense success. Once at a dinner an editor congratulated Mr. Shapley warmly on "Solid for Mulhooly." The editor said it was powerfully written. Mr. Shapley replied: "Yes, I suppose I am a powerful writer. The other day I wrote a letter of condolence to the widow of an old friend, and I understand that the lady no sooner read my letter than, changing her black gown to a pink one, she went to a matinee."

This is from the Champagne Standard, by Mrs. John Lane: "The well authenticated story goes that at a dinner party the other night, after the ladies returned to the drawing room, the hostess, her broad expanse tinkling with diamonds, leaned back in a great tufted chair and shivered slightly. A footman went in search of the lady's maid. "Francoise," said the magnate's lady with languid magnificence, "I feel chilly; bring me another diamond necklace."

Kubelik, the violinist, was once playing by request before the inmates of an insane asylum. He played a brilliant Slav composition, thinking that was surely of the cheerful character wanted. As he finished a very pretty young woman arose and beckoned to him. He thought, artist-like, that she wanted an encore, and so said to the doctor: "Ask her what she desires." He rose to his feet and was about to question her when she exclaimed: "To think of the likes of me being in here and of him being at large in the world."

SOME FAMOUS RIDDLES.

The following were the result of a competition for prize puzzles, and represent a survival of the fittest:

Enigma.

'Twas whispered in heaven, 'twas muttered in hell,
And echo caught faintly the sound as it fell.
On the confines of earth 'twas permitted to rest,
And the depths of the ocean its presence confessed.
'Twill be found in the sphere when 'tis riven asunder,
Be seen in the lightning and heard in the thunder;
'Twas allotted to man with his earliest breath,
Attends at his birth and awaits him in death;
Presides o'er his happiness, honor and health,
Is the prop of his house and the end of his wealth.
In the heaps of the miser 'tis hoarded with care,
But is sure to be lost on his prodigal heir.
It begins every hope, every wish it must bound,
With the husbandman's toils, with the monarch is crowned,
Without it the soldier and seaman may roam,
But woe to the wretch who expels it from home!
In the whispers of conscience its voice will be found,
Nor e'en in the whirlpool of passion be drowned.
'Twill not soften the heart, but though deaf be the ear,
'Twill make it acutely and instantly hear.
Yet in shade let it rest like a delicate flower;
Ah! breathe on it softly, it dies in an hour.
—Catherine Fanshawe.

Answer: The letter "H."

(Often ascribed to Byron, and included in early editions of his poems. Described by Bryant, in his Library of Poetry and Song, as the finest riddle in existence.)

Enigma.

THE FIRST.

Immutable forever, I; the earth
Was still in swaddling clothes when I had birth;
My sisters both took precedence of me,
Yet I am surely oldest of the three.

THE SECOND.

Before my dark-veiled sister was, was I,
But still you see me in my infancy;
Men hame, neglect and desecrate and flout me,
And yet the wisest could not live without me.

THE THIRD.

Youngest and fairest of our sisterhood,
Now in dim dread and now in hopeful mood,
Man waits my coming here, but sees me never—
Alas, I come not till I'm gone forever!

—Mabel P.

Answer: Yesterday; today; tomorrow.
(Universally admired throughout puzzle-dom.)

ENIGMA.

Cut off my head, and singular I am;
Cut off my tail and plural I appear;
Cut off my head and tail, and wondrous feat!
Although my middle's left, there's nothing there.
What is my head cut off? A sounding sea.
What is my tail cut off? A rushing river,
And in their mighty depth I fearless play,
Parent of sweetest sounds, yet mute forever.
—Thomas Babington Macaulay.

Answer: C-O-D.

("The well-known logograph by Lord Macaulay is one of the best enigmas that the Britons can boast of, for it contains the requisite points."—Rob Roy.)

Riddle.

Formed long ago, yet made today,
I'm most employed while others sleep.
What few would wish to give away,
And none would ever wish to keep.
—Charles James Fox.

Answer: Bed.

("The 'Bed' I have long regarded as the ideal riddle."—M. C. S.)

Anagram.

Quid est veritas? (What is truth?) Answer: Est Vir qui adest. (It is He that is present.)

("One of the finest anagrams ever made is one on Pilate's despairing words when our Lord was before him, "Quid est veritas?" "What is truth?" The true answer rises with absolute accuracy in the transposition. EST VIR QUI ADEST, It is He that is present!")

Anagram.

THEY SEE.—Anonymic. Answer: The eyes.

("Anonymic's anagram is the most perfect specimen we have ever seen."—Dorothy Doolittle.)

Palindrome.

The oldest of these riddles (which read the same backward as forward) is: "Madam, I'm Adam," which was addressed to our first mother. The best is a California palindrome. It was accidentally discovered by seeing the verso of a canvas bakery sign in Yreka, Cal. It read: YREKA BAKERY.

LITERARY NOTES.

Luther Burbank's Career.

A book which has aroused no little interest of late is an authoritative account of the life and work of Luther Burbank, contained in a volume by W. S. Harwood, entitled "New Creations in Plant Life." It deals almost exclusively with Luther Burbank's investigations and discoveries in this domain. In fact, as a life of Burbank it is rather too appreciative. But the reader can well afford to overlook the enthusiasm of the biographer for his friend, because in relating the attainments of that friend he tells a great many facts of absorbing interest.

Probably every one now knows the story of Burbank's early life and struggles to earn a livelihood; how he started for California with practically no money and carrying ten of his own potatoes, and how he finally established himself as a nurseryman here. But few have followed Burbank's work closely enough to realize the enormous possibilities of the Burbank potato. To quote from Mr. Harwood's chapter on this subject:

"The seventy-five per cent of the potato which consists of water may, from the manufacturing point of view, be considered as largely waste, or, if not waste, at least of no commercial value. Very much of this waste may be restored, negatively speaking, by driving out the water and putting starch in its place. Mr. Burbank's investigations have shown that it is as easy to breed potatoes for a larger amount of starch as it is to breed for any other characteristics—flavor, resistance to disease, withstanding drought, adaptability to a given climate, early or late maturing, and so on. In Europe the potato is practically the main source of starch supply. Potato starch is of much importance to the manufacturer of cottons, woollens, silk and linens, as sizing for the warp before it is woven; for finishing the goods after they have been woven, bleached and dyed, and, in the form of dextrine, as a thickener or vehicle for applying the color to a fabric. The dextrine is used a great deal also in the manufacture of mucilage.

"Important as is the work of Mr. Burbank in potato culture, both in its production and in the tests now under way for its transformation, it appears probable that it will be rivaled by the new fruit which grows upon the potato which Mr. Burbank has named the 'pomato.'

"Among all his many interesting and novel creations this certainly takes high rank, not only for its novelty but for its practical value. Looking to the common origin of the tomato and the potato, and considering the general appearance of the new fruit, he has happily combined the two names in designating this new creation.

"The pomato is a fruit, not a vegetable, though growing upon a vegetable. It is what might be termed the evolution of a potato seed-ball. It first appears as a tiny green ball upon the potato top, and develops as the season progresses into fruit the size and general shape of a small tomato. The flesh is white, bearing, usually, a few small seeds. It is delightful to the taste, having the suggestion of quite a number of different fruits and yet not easily identified as any particular one. It may be eaten either raw or cooked. It is fine eaten raw out of hand, delicious when cooked and excellent as preserve."

Mr. Burbank's marvelous discoveries appeal not only to sense of taste; he has developed some plants for beauty and some for fragrance. Prior to his investigations perfumes were manufactured wholly from flowers—from roses, orange blossoms and similar fragrant blooms. This is still the case in the old world, where labor is comparatively cheap, and where little has been done along the line of plant-breeding. In this country, however, there are now quantities of perfumes of great commercial value manufactured wholly from the leaves of plants.

Luther Burbank has been particularly successful in his experiments along these lines. He has produced a fast-growing walnut which, in addition to the value of its wood for furniture manufacture, puts forth an abnormal abundance of delightfully fragrant leaves that are used for the production of rare perfume.

The full commercial value of Mr. Burbank's new tree has not yet been ascertained, but his work so far gives promise that the manufacture of perfume from this walnut tree may prove a source of national wealth.

In a chapter called "The Thornless Edible Cactus," Mr. Harwood tells of one of Burbank's most striking and most useful experiments; that with the cactus:

"When he turned to the cactus on which he was to spend more than ten years of study, it was, in the main, a stubborn, irreconcilable foe to the race; in order to make it a friend of man its whole nature must be changed; it must be re-created. To the average man it would seem a waste of time and energy to seek to improve a plant which for millions of years had been hostile to the race, which seemed to have absolutely nothing in common with civilization, which by its pariah-like nature seemed peculiarly fitted for a home upon the desert, its closest comrades the rattlesnake and the scorpion, its highest aim apparently, to cause the death of some thirst-maddened animal driven to eat its juicy but deadly leaves.

"But, the more difficult the problem, the keener his desire to solve it. He knew that the cactus, even in its wild and defiant shape, had certain unquestioned excellences. It was undeniably hardy;

it would grow and thrive where nothing else would welcome the blistering heat of the desert and growing powerful where rain seldom falls. It had much that was nutritious, both in its thick thall, or leaves, and in its golden or crimson fruit. Whenever it had been given a chance away from its desert home and under more favorable conditions, it had shown phenomenal thrift. It was not one of those plants which will not bear transplanting from a wild to a civilized state.

"Two main obstacles had first to be removed—the countless thorns upon the cactus, covering branch and leaves and fruit, and the spicules of the leaves, the woody fibrous skeletons of the thall which made them more or less indigestible. These overcome, there remained the development of the fruit and the fitting of the leaves to be a food, food even for man as well as beast.

"All this he has accomplished—nothing more marvelous has ever been done in plant life. Verily Mr. Burbank will make the desert to bloom like a rose."

One of the most amusing of Mr. Burbank's creations is his everlasting flower, which is truly "ever lasting." It will not wilt or fade. In short it is a commercial product designed solely for use in millinery. It is unfortunate for the pockets of the nurserymen that this season feathers have "come in" and that flowers have "gone out," otherwise there would have been a large business carried on by the nurserymen in raising "natural" flowers for the milliners.

Recent Fiction.

"The Wire Tappers," by Arthur Stringer, illustrated. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston. Price $1.50.

As a writer of fiction Arthur Stringer may be classed as a sentimentalist with aspirations toward being a stylist. He loves the unknown polysyllable, and the laboriously evolved phrase, and one can imagine him carefully conning over his Thesaurus before he brought forth "dementating narrowness," "eviscerating pity" and "subdolorous green eyes," in a strenuous evasion of the stereotyped phrase.

In "The Wire Tappers" sentimentality and the mechanics of electricity are blended in a curious mixture. The book retails the adventures of an unscrupulous pair who in the pauses of their love-making earn a discreditable living by tapping the New York wires of their financial secrets. The pair are too faint-hearted in their rascality to inspire any admiration for either nerve or audacity, and the heroine awakens contempt by her persistent weak cry that she is "not wholly bad," her attitude being a concession on the author's part to the stern moralist whose sympathies he hopes to win while reading these records of petty criminality.

"The Invisible Bond," by Eleanor Talbot Kinkead, illustrated in color. Published by Moffat, Yard & Co.

This novel is evidently the work of a loyal Kentuckian who is steeped to the lips in a profound respect for all the social traditions of the Kentucky aristocracy. Of the two beautiful heroines, who stand in marked contrast, the Lily of purity is a representative of a proud old Lexington family, while the lovely, soulless pagan who waves "the rose-mesh of the flesh" comes from a much lower social stratum. Miss Kinkead's style and ideals suggest that she is a warm admirer and disciple of James Lane Allen. Her book, like his novels, reflects the atmosphere of a social life which to a Kentuckian is the corollary and most elegant in America. For this quality and for its superior ethical tone, as well as for its literary quality, the novel is entitled to respect, and furthermore, has the ability to hold the interest of the reader in search of idle recreation.

"Where Speech Ends," by Robert Haven Schauf-fer, Published by Moffat, Yard & Co. Price $1.50

The Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, so long established in the favor of the musical public and now no more, has probably been one of the sources of inspiration for "Where Speech Ends," a novel of purely musical atmosphere with a sympathetic introduction by Henry Van Dyke.

Mr. Schauf-fer has evidently been fitted for his task by a sympathetic and congenial association with the members of some actual orchestra, who, altered and perhaps idealized, figure as the characters in his novel with an effect of reality. As for the interest of the story and plot, that is another matter. One is not carried along, and the hypnotic episodes, particularly that in which a popular and famous orchestra leader is put to shame before a great audience, have a cooked-up sound.

But in other respects the book has the quality of sincerity and is happily exempt from those rhetorical ravings-to-order with which so many would-be melodramas afflict their readers.

"Breakers Ahead," By A. Maynard Barbour, J. B. Lippincott Co. publishers.

Another story this of the typical man of affairs that is now the predominant figure in the American horizon. It is a type that interests men and women alike, and one the exploiting of which in fiction tends steadily to increase the number of male readers of novels.

Mr. Barbour, already well known as the author of the popular "Mainwaring Affair," has a vigorous masculine style suited to the type of human character and the phase of life he describes. Like his hero, he lacks sentiment, and the matrimonial proposals in his novel are as dry as chips. But he is a first rate story writer, and one utterly unencumbered by hampering conventions. His story reads true, and yet has the charm of fiction. It tells of the rise to financial and political power in a Western town of the son of an English banker, who followed up the sowing of his wild oats by a keen and steady pursuit of the prestige he ultimately won. Interwoven with this is the recital of the tangle into which the king of finance plunged his domestic affairs partly through an innate hardness of heart and partly through malevolent chance.

"Augustine the Man." By Amelie Rives (Princess Troubetzkoy). Published by John Lane, the Bodley Head.

O sapient publisher thus to set off the title of the book with the title of the author! Although it is but fair to say that the Princess' poetry is informed with the real poetic spirit, Amelie Rives has shown much constancy to her muse, and "Augustine the Man" is written with a smoothness and in a number of passages, a felicity of phrase, that will not fail to make its appeal to the lover of poetry. She has a preference for casting her poetical works in the dramatic form, which results in the enhancement of their interest to the most superficial reader of poetry.

Her theme, however, is a somber one; the poem being a depiction of the birth throes of St. Augustine's change of heart, when religious ecstasies supplanted the more human though sinful love that had hitherto ruled his life.

The author's sympathy, and by a natural consequence, the reader's, is more with the man than with the saint, but the revelation made of the tortured soul of a religious fanatic seems curiously real, and one looks with surprise at the portrait of the handsome poetess on the title page, reflecting that it is a woman that makes it.

A charming little love lyric that strikes a note of contrast to the prevailing austerity of theme in Book III offers a pleasing example of the Princess Troubetzkoy's graceful ease in toying with the muse:

The sea is in love with the inland, and yearns for her flowers.
Oh sea thou hast pearls to thy kiss, but the wind is the winds!
Thou hast death to thy call, but King Love, King of Death, is our King!
O be in mine arms as the dark in the curve of the moon,
As the moon in the heart of the lake, as the lake in the hills!
As the stars in the flame of the morning, oh, me thou in me!

CURRENT HUMOR.

Atavism.

Deep in the jungle vast and dim,
That knew not a white man's feet,
I smell the odor of sun-warmed fur,
Musky, savage and sweet.

Scent of fur and color of blood:—
And the long dead instincts rose,
I followed the lure of my season's mate,—
And flew, bare-fanged, at my foe.

Ballad of Little Grand Duchy.

[The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg added a bomb to its cavalry and obtained a cannon on approval from Krupp-Essen. Unfortunately, objections were raised by the neighboring powers, which complained that shots had fallen in their territories.]

The Grand Duke sent a summons forth,
And at his ducal call
From east and west and south and north
Hasted his barons all.
"Lordlings," quoth he, "'Tis plaint to see
The armies of the powers
Each day grow more prepared for war—
But what, my lords, of ours?"

"While France and Germany increase
Their fighting forces so,
Can we be sure of lasting peace?
My lords, I answer 'No!'
We, too, must spend, would we defend
Our own beloved Spa.
Do you agree?" Some answered, "Oui,"
While others cried, "Ja, Ja."

The Duke has held a grand review,
And all the folk in force
Have gathered round to see the new
Krupp cannon and the horse.
The drum was banged, the cymbals clanged,
And both the trumpets brayed;
The people cheered, the new horse reared,
The old one also neighed.

Napoleonic frenzy filled
The Grand Duke. Prudence fled.
The vision of his army thrilled
His marrow. "Fire!" he said.
A blinding flash, a thunder crash,
And then a startled glance—
The people saw with sudden awe
The shot had dropped in France.

The Grand Duke frowned, but even then
His zeal was scarce decreased.
"Come! turn the gun about, my men,
And let her face the east."
Again the flame and thunder came,
Again at his command
The shot sped true—this time, ehue!
To hit the Fatherland.

Then frantic French and Germans came,
And protocols poured in Supporting every victim's claim
From Paris to Berlin.
The Grand Duke sighed, his martial pride
All crushed and crumpled up—
The extra horse was sold perforce,
The gun went back to Krupp.

ST. GE GOSSIP.

Bernhardt's Tour.

When Bernhardt started out in Chicago with her great week she had no idea of what was before her. Altogether she has played in some of the most remarkable places ever heard of in the amusement business. For instance: The Bernhardt tent — At Dallas, El Paso and Duluth.

Skating rinks—At Savannah, Tampa, Jacksonville, Augusta, Atlanta, Fort Wayne, Winnipeg, Spokane—with many more to come.

Auditoriums—Kansas City, Omaha, Nashville, Chattanooga, Peoria, and many a few.

Summer theaters—Little Rock, five miles from the city in a driving rain; St. Moines, Ingersoll Park theater, 2 1/2 miles out; Seattle, Leschi Park, three miles out.

Every stable—In Montgomery, Alabama, was canceled however, on account of other booking.

Dining-rooms—Royal Ponclana hotel, Palm Beach. This date was also canceled because of other booking.

Dallas, Texas, was the first tent in twelve thousand crowded into canvas inclosure. It stormed thunder and lightning the next night at El Paso, but Bernhardt played on. It occurred to her that anything of the ordinary had happened. She of the audience kept apprehensive eyes on the entrance. In case she should take a notion to topple the piece of dry goods over on their heads.

Then came the incident at Austin. The tent had been pitched. Thousands of tickets had been sold for the appearance. The state Legislature was in special session. Mme Bernhardt called on Gov. Lanham. He invited her in to see the solons work. Mme. Bernhardt entered Gov. Lanham, and stood smiling, bowing to the storm of greetings. Above an adjournment of 10 minutes, "led!" shouted the presiding official with a whack of his gavel; and for minutes Mme. Bernhardt held a session. Just then the rain came. It rained. "You are not going to play in the tent tonight, madame?" said the humor. "Ah," replied Mme. Bernhardt, "let fall rain ze cat, eet fall ze dog, I sail play." This part of the story may or may not be true. It is that Gov. Lanham, gritting his teeth together, said: "I'll be — if she id then it is said he went to the home and called up Manager Walker, whom he recited the fact that Mme. Bernhardt was playing in Austin under the auspices of the business men's league, and that the league would not let its guest to be forced into the tent on a rainy night, under any circumstances. Mme. Bernhardt played in theater that night, and a total of 1000 went back to buyers of tickets were unable to get into the buildernhardt must play $4000 to profit $4000 is a lot of money and there is plenty of seating capacity. She got into the regular theaters, the number of independent houses in the United States is comparatively small. Going into a new town, the ad man must find the house, whether an abandoned theater, music hall, skating rink or what. If it is not seated, lighted, heated, and arranged for that. He must hire hands, ushers, orchestra, "supper," he must arrange for property, tickets, printing, billing, newspaper advertising, baggage and car hire, hotels; he must get ticket takers, and put the advertisement into responsible hands; he covers the country newspapers such advertising and press matter they should receive.

must do all this and some more the day, coming in early in the morning and leaving on a night train. Building and pitching of the tent was made necessary took 50 men weeks to sew the canvas together, three cars to take it to Dallas from San Francisco and the other tent towns. Spokane, Wash., they found no place to play. Out in Natatorium park had a floor in course of being laid for the big rink, which was to be finished in a week. The advance man put us on, the contractor sent 30 men to hustle, and they got the walls up and a canvas top over all in time for Bernhardt. In Little Rock, the only available building five miles out of the city—a summer house, at that. And to play it was necessary to inclose the building with canvas, put stoves in, seat it, rent things for the production and hauling 5300 people out in a driving rain. All through the South difficulties of equipping improvising theaters was encountered—building, providing curtains, side and back borders and other essentials tending to the thousand details of organization. And with all this Bernhardt played a tour of engagements which will never be duplicated. She played to $12,000 in Dallas, $10,000 in Kansas City, $75,000 in two weeks in Boston, $8000 a performance in such cities as Omaha, Nashville and Memphis. She played the greatest return engagement to Chicago ever known—one that was declared to be impossible by old theatrical managers.

It was announced at a dinner given to Bernhardt in New York June 14, in the Cafe des Beaux Arts, that when the actress sailed on the steamer La Touraine the next morning she would take with her more than $200,000 that she has made on her tour of the country. According to the manager there has been taken in at all of the performances $1,088,000. Of this the actress received $305,000. Her personal expenses were about $50,000. She has played in barns, vacant lots, dance halls, and in one instance in a private dining-room. The dinner was tendered her by Lee Shubert and W. S. Connor. The actress received a handsome loving cup, bearing the arms of France and the United States and an inscription stating the occasion of the gift, her two hundred and twenty-sixth performance in America. All the members of the company, including the property men and electricians, were at the dinner.

A dinner was given at the Hotel Cecil, London, June 17, in honor of Ellen Terry. The two hundred guests included persons prominent in the theatrical world. Winston Churchill delivered a brilliant eulogy of Miss Terry's genius. A message from Joseph H. Choate was read, which expressed best wishes on behalf of America. It was announced that the total sum realized for the Terry jubilee fund, including the receipts from the benefit performance at Drury Lane Theatre and subscriptions raised in America, amounted to $43,920.

NOTES AND GOSSIP.

The engagement is announced of Miss Florence Cole, daughter of Mrs. Edward Pleasant Cole, to Mr. Charles R. McCormick. No date has been arranged for the wedding, but it will probably be in the near future.

The engagement is announced of Miss Gladys Postley, sister of Mr. Sterling Postley, to Mr. Erskens Richardson of Chicago.

The wedding of Miss Elizabeth Allen, daughter of Judge and Mrs. James M. Allen, to Mr. John Otis Burrage, took place on Tuesday afternoon, at the home of the bride's parents on Washington street. The ceremony was performed by Father Plus Murphy at half-past three o'clock. Mrs. Lucius Allen, the bride's sister, was the matron of honor, and Francis Allen, the bride's brother, was the best man. A number of relatives and chosen friends of the two families were present. Mr. Burrage and his bride will, after their honeymoon trip, make their home in this city with Judge and Mrs. Allen.

The wedding of Miss Georgina Leone Mackay, daughter of Civil Engineer George Mackay, U. S. A. retired, and Mrs. Mackay, to Surgeon James Chambers Pryor, Medical Corps, U. S. N., took place at St. John's Church, Washington, D. C., on Saturday afternoon, June 16th.

The wedding of Miss Harriette Lee Tallaferrro to Mr. Jeffrey Montague of California, took place on June 16th at the home of the bride's cousin, Mrs. William J. Boothe Jr., in Alexandria, Virginia. They will reside in Richmond and in California.

The officers and ladies of the Presidio entertained at an informal hop on Friday evening of last week, the first since the beginning of Lent.

Mrs. Edward Polhemus and Mrs. Alfred Baker Spalding entertained at an informal tea at their cottage in Sausalito on Thursday of last week, in honor of Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton.

Mrs. Augustus Taylor and Mrs. Will Taylor were the hostesses at a luncheon last week, at their home at Menlo, at which they entertained a half a dozen guests.

Mrs. Emory Winship was the hostess at a luncheon at Pastor's in Marin county, on Wednesday of last week.

Mr. and Mrs. George T. Boyd, who are again in San Rafael after spending the winter with Mrs. Boyd's mother, Mrs. N. G. Kittle in this city, are rejoicing in the recent arrival of a small daughter in their home.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Johnson (formerly Miss Carmen Selby) are rejoicing in the advent of a small daughter in their home last week.

Mr. and Mrs. James Bishop, who are in Santa Barbara for the summer and fall, are rejoicing in the advent of a little son in their home.

MOVEMENTS AND WHEREABOUTS

Mrs. C. B. Brigham and Miss Kate Brigham, who returned last month from a lengthy stay in the Orient, and who have been at their home on Broadway, left on Tuesday for their country place at Tahoe.

Mrs. William Mayo Newhall, Miss Margaret Newhall, Miss Marion Newhall and Miss Elizabeth Newhall were in Florence when last heard from and will go a little later to France.

Mrs. William S. Tevis has been staying at her country place near Bakersfield.

Mrs. Richardson Claver, who is spending the summer at her ranch in Napa, has recently been the guest of her cousins, Mrs. Clarence Nicholson and Miss Ruth Miller in Sausalito.

Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor will leave shortly for Portland, Oregon, where she will be the guest of her sister, Mrs. Allen Lewis.

Mrs. Harold Sewall (formerly Miss Millie Ashe) and her family have recently returned to their home in Bath, Maine, after a stay abroad of two years.

Mrs. L. L. Baker, Miss Kate Stone and Miss Dorothy Baker have recently left Venice, after a fortnight's stay in that city and are now in Switzerland for the summer.

Mrs. Nokes, who has been spending several months with her daughter, Mrs. John Burke Murphy at Vancouver Barracks, arrived in the city last week and will be here for some time with her parents, Captain and Mrs. A. F. Rodgers.

Miss Maizie Langhorne and Miss Julia Langhorne have been the guests of Lieutenant and Mrs. Clarence Carrigan at Fort Baker during the past week.

Captain William L. Merry, United States Minister to Costa Rica and Nicaragua, who has been here for several weeks and who intended remaining a month longer, received orders from Washington to proceed at once to Nicaragua, as matters had arisen there demanding his presence, and left on Sunday last. Miss Blanche Merry leaves today (Saturday) for San Jose, Costa Rica, going by way of New Orleans, and will spend the summer with her sister, Mrs. Harry Meiggs.

Mrs. Russell J. Wilson, Miss Emily Wilson and Miss Charlotte Wilson have closed their California street home and have taken a cottage at Burlingame for the summer. They have given up entirely their intention of going abroad this year.

Mr. and Mrs. Christian Reis, whose old home on California street was burned, and who were for a time at the Stent home on Broadway, are now at their country place at Menlo Park.

Major Charles Krauthoff, U. S. A., and Mrs. Krauthoff are staying at Blithedale at present.

Mrs. Frederick Spencer Palmer will leave shortly for Paris for a visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Smith, who have been abroad for the past year.

Dr. Benjamin F. Lyford, at one time a resident of San Francisco, but who has for the past fifteen years made his home in Marin County, died on June 13 at his residence near Reed's Station. He had formerly a large practice here, but becoming blind, went to his estate and has since remained there. He leaves much property on the line of the railroad. He is survived by his wife, formerly Miss Hilarita Reed.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Parker Whitney and their son Vincent from Rocklin, Cal., have arrived at Hotel Del Monte, where they expect to spend the season.

Judge and Mrs. John F. Finn, who have been abroad for some months, are returning to New York.

Mr. Drummond MacGavin, who is employed as a mining engineer in a South African mine, is in San Francisco on a brief visit to his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Walter McGavin.

Mr. and Mrs. Colin M. Boyd have returned from a trip around the world.

Mrs. Mary Huntington and Miss Marian Huntington, who have been at their San Francisco home on Jackson street since returning from Japan, expect to leave soon for Europe.

Mr. Richard M. Hotelling and Mr. Dudley Sales have been in New York and will shortly return by way of the St. Lawrence and the Thousand Isles.

Mr. Joseph D. Redding expects to come to California early in July. Mrs. Redding, who spent some months in San Francisco last year has been quite ill at her home in New York, but is now convalescing.

Mr. and Mrs. Jack London have been spending some weeks at Highland Springs.

Mr. Wilson Mizner arrived from Chicago on Tuesday and will spend several weeks in San Francisco and visiting relatives in Benicia.

Ned L. Chapin of Pasadena, who was recently expelled from Annapolis Naval Academy for hazing, has declined to go back under reappointment. The offer of reappointment came, it is stated, through United States Senator Perkins to Chapin's father. Young Chapin states that he does not care to enter the United States Navy now.

Mrs. William H. Smith and Miss Belle Smith, who left here last November for a trip around the world, have been to Japan and are now at Camp Garaga, in the Philippine Islands, where Mrs. Smith's son, Lieutenant Emory Smith, is with his command.

Miss Elsie Sperry has gone to Sag Harbor, Mass., as the guest of Mrs. Frank Havens.

Dr. and Mrs. G. C. Simmons are leaving Sacramento this week to visit friends in Massachusetts.

Mrs. George Metcalf has returned from Sonora, Mexico, and is now at Santa Barbara.

Mrs. Victor Metcalf has gone to Chico, where her son, Victor is recovering after his recent illness.

Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, who has been in Sicily for some time with her niece, Mrs. Joseph Marshall Flint, has taken an apartment in Paris, where she is planning to remain for two years.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stetson Wheeler have returned from their country place on the McCloud river.

Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Gunn are spending the summer at Blithedale.

NOTES ABOUT THE CLUBS.

The Bohemian Club has sent out notices to its members requesting them to forward their addresses to the Secretary at the new quarters, 1925 Octavia street.

The Concordia Club has secured new quarters at the northeast corner of Pacific avenue and Fillmore street. The midday luncheon proves a great boon to most members, since the clubhouse is conveniently reached by the car lines. The house is admirably adapted for a clubhouse; it has sixteen spacious apartments, including a dining-room, lounging, smoking, card and billiard rooms, and a few sleeping apartments for out-of-town members. The management is about to inaugurate an innovation which will be greatly appreciated. It is a separate dining-room for ladies, for the special accommodation of the families of members who slide out of town. The club has made an advantageous lease of its property at Van Ness avenue and Post street.

The University of California Club has secured comfortable quarters at 35 Washington street. The house is large and many of the rooms will be used by the members as sleeping apartments.

The Loring Club is planning to give a fourth concert of the season in Calvary Church, Fillmore and Jackson streets, during July, the day yet to be fixed. The club lost all of its property in the fire.

The Franciscan Club has secured rooms on Ellis street near Van Ness avenue, which will be open to members on June 20. Luncheon will be served from 12 to 2, and tea from 5 to 6 P. M. As most of the club's records were destroyed, members are asked to send their addresses to Mrs. Frank Johnson, San Rafael.

Considering how difficult it is for a stranger from out of town to find any place in San Francisco now where they may lunch comfortably, it would seem desirable for other clubs to follow the example inaugurated by the Concordia Club, to serve luncheon for the families of its members in a special dining-room for ladies.

ACROSS THE BAY.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Bartlett have taken a cottage on Valley street, Oakland, for the summer. Mrs. Bartlett is Miss Mary Olney, daughter of Warren Olney, of Prospect avenue, Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Houghton have taken a house in Berkeley for the summer.

Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding has planned to spend the summer in Berkeley. Mr. and Mrs. Alpheus Bull are contemplating the purchase of a house in Berkeley, where they will make their home.

George K. Fitch, formerly editor of the San Francisco Bulletin, died suddenly on June 17, at the Hotel Rafael, heart failure. George Knowlton was one of the best known of pioneer editors of California. He was born in New York and came to California in early days, first settling in Sacramento, where he was connected with the Union, and then coming to San Francisco. He secured an interest in the Bulletin and was the responsible editor of that paper for twenty-five years. Pickering and Simonton were other proprietors of the paper. When the Pickering estate was settled, Mr. Fitch failed to secure the Bulletin, which was sold at auction, and he then retired from the newspaper business. He owned much real estate in San Francisco, and for over twenty years he lived at the southwest corner of Bush and Powell streets. This he sold a few months ago.

ARMY AND NAVY.

Brigadier General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., commanding officer of the Department of California, accompanied by Major John L. Clem, U. S. A., Chief Quartermaster of the Department, Captain William G. Haan, U. S. A., Assistant and Acting Chief of Staff, and Lieutenant Burton J. Mitchell, U. S. A., left on Tuesday evening for American Lake, Washington, to inspect the maneuver grounds there, and are absent about eight days.

General Funston will command the maneuvers to be held there this summer, returning October 15. Other assistants of command of maneuvers are as follows: Brigadier General Constant Williams, commanding Department of Columbia at Fort Russell, Wyoming; Brigadier General John W. Bubb, at Chickamauga, Georgia; General Frederick D. Smith, at Mount Gretna, Pa.; Brigadier General William S. McCaskey, at Austin, Texas; Brigadier General Theodore J. Wint, at Fort Riley, Kansas, and Brigadier General William H. Carter, at camp near Indianapolis, Ind.

Colonel Sedgwick Pratt, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who has recently gone East, has applied for retirement with the rank of brigadier general, to take effect June 22. He is entitled to this advancement in rank on retirement by the provisions of the veteran retirement act approved April 24, 1904.

Captain Arthur W. Chase, pay department, U. S. A., arrived on the Sheridan on Sunday last from Manila, where he has for some time been stationed.

Medical Director R. C. Persons, U. S. N., Mrs. Persons and the Misses Persons have arrived at Mare Island, Dr. Persons relieving Medical Director Manly H. Simons, U. S. N., as officer in charge of the Naval Hospital.

Captains Irving W. Rand, Leigh A. Fuller and George A. Skinner, assistant surgeons, U. S. A., have been ordered to report at the general hospital at the Presidio on June 25 for examination for promotion.

Captain Tyree R. Rivers, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., who was one of the several officers wounded in the engagement at Mount Dajo, in the Philippines, arrived last Sunday to join Mrs. Rivers, who was here during the disaster and was burned out. Captain Rivers has not yet recovered from his wound.

Captain John D. Yost, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at Honolulu and ordered to proceed to Manila.

First Lieutenant Charles C. Pulis, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who was so seriously wounded while dynamiting a house during the fire, but is now convalescent, will be promoted shortly to the rank of captain.

Lieutenant John B. S. Human, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., arrived on the transport Sheridan on Sunday last, en route to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. He was accompanied by Mrs. Shuman, who is ill.

Lieutenant Gordon Johnston, Signal Corps, U. S. A., who was wounded in the recent engagement at Mount Dajo, arrived on the transport Thomas from the Philippines a few weeks since and has been a patient at the general hospital at the Presidio, undergoing an operation there from which he is now convalescing.

Dr. Francis Munson, U. S. N., who has been stationed in Washington, D. C., for some months, has been ordered to Indian Head, Maryland, for duty. Dr. Munson was married here last fall to Miss Katherine Glass.

The Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., commanded by Colonel Charles H. Noble, U. S. A., is ordered relieved from its present stations to proceed to Seattle, Washington, in time to sail for Alaska, on the Transport Buford, as soon as practicable after July 6th, to relieve the Third Infantry, U. S. A., taking stations as follows: headquarters, band and companies E and F, at Fort William H. Seward; Lieutenant Colonel Edwin B. Bolton, U. S. A., battalion staff, and companies C and D, at Fort Gibbon; company H, at Fort Davis; company A, at Fort Liscum; Major Moore, battalion staff and company B, at Fort Egbert; and company G, at Fort St. Michael. One battalion of this regiment is still stationed at Honolulu. Upon being relieved the Third Infantry, commanded by Colonel Thomas C. Woodbury, U. S. A., will return on the transport Buford and proceed to take station as follows: headquarters, band and Second Battalion and Major Stamper, at Fort Lawton, Washington; Lieutenant Colonel James E. Macklin, Majors Buck and Plummer, and the First and Third battalions at Fort Wright, Washington.

Troops C and D, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., were ordered relieved from further duty in San Francisco and returned to their station at Fort Walla Walla, Washington on Monday last.

Wilfred Clarke will head the new bill at the Orpheum this coming week with his leading lady, Theo Carew. Nita Allen and her company will present a one-act comedy, "Car Two, Stateroom One." It is laid on the "Owl" train. Among the company is Dr. Frank Rodolph, who has taken the stage name of Frank Erwin. Cliff Gordon, "the German politician," will give a monologue. The brothers Damm, European acrobats, are muscular marvels. The Kaufmann troupe of bicyclists will continue their act, and Bert and Bertha Grant will change their songs and dances. Karno's London Comedy Company of sixteen people has been retained for a third week. Orpheum Motion Pictures will complete a great comedy program.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Grafter has made enough money to end his days with." "Tall or Senate?"—Life.

"Mrs. Brown says her baby can say all sorts of things." "But I trust she teaches it not to do so."—Puck.

"When did you first become acquainted with your husband?" "The first time I asked him for money after we were married."—Life.

First Burglar—Did Bill get much out of that last burglary? Second Burglar—No. He got so little that his lawyer advised him to plead guilty.—Judge.

Choice of Environment.—Lary (at railway refreshment counter)—Will you please give me a Bath bun? Waitress—Will you eat it here or in a bag?—Punch.

Saloonkeeper—Little girl, what is it? I don't sell liquor to children. Little Girl—Have you got any of this good-natured alcohol? I want some of it for papa.—Chicago Daily News.

Mrs. Muggins—Since Mrs. Newrich's husband made all his money she has the doctor continually. Mrs. Buggins—Yes, I hear she is suffering from nervous prosperity.—Philadelphia Record.

"Do you think that municipal ownership would eliminate graft?" "I am not quite sure," answered Senator Sorghum, "whether it would eliminate it or simply originate a new kind."—Washington Star.

Stubb—What kind of shoes are those you are wearing? Cogger—Walking shoes. Stubb—Walking shoes for automobile riding? Cogger—Yes, I know my machine.—Chicago Daily News.

Teacher—Now, Robert, do you know what an isosceles triangle is? Boy—Yes'm. Teacher—Well, what is it? Boy—It's one of dem t'ings I gets licked fer not knowin' wot it is.—Judge.

"Why don't you come out boldly for reform?" "What's the use?" asked Senator Sorghum, "if your constituency won't back you up? I'm willing to be a reformer, but I'm no martyr."—Washington Star.

"Of course, said the architect, "you will want a porte cochere." "Sure," replied Mrs. Nurich; "we'll want a big one with glass dingle-dangles on it hangin' from the parlor ceilin."—Philadelphia Press.

"I don't object to hearing a man brag about his ancestors," observed Uncle Allen Sparks, "if that's all he has to brag about. It comforts him and doesn't hurt the ancestors any. They're dead."—Chicago Tribune.

"I hear your master is a perfect lady killer, James, especially since he got his new automobile. Is that so?" "Well, partly, ma'am, so to speak. He's run over quite a lot, but none of 'em's dead yet."—Baltimore American.

Suburban Patient—Doctor, I am sorry you have had to come so far from your regular practice. Doctor—Oh, it's all right. I have another patient in the neighborhood, so I can kill two birds with one stone.—Judge.

Peter—Did you ever borrow any money in case of emergency? Pan—Not a cent! Peter—You don't mean it? Pan—Fact; I've often tried to, but I can never get anybody to lend me any.—Detroit Free Press.

"Why don't you tell your views?" "I'm afraid to," answered Senator Sorghum. "Whenever I tell my views on any subject I run the risk of stirring up an unanswerable argument on the other side."—Washington Star.

"Correspondent wants to know who are the greatest stamp collectors in the country," said the assistant briefly. "Does he inclose stamp for reply?" answered the editor. "Yes." "Then tell him we are."—Chicago Daily News.

"Most actors," remarked the talkative boarder, "seem to think they can't get too far front on the billboard." "Yes," interrupted Mrs. Starven. "Quite unlike some other people who believe they can't get too far back on the board bill."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"I sent you plans for the porte-cochere and grand entrance," began the architect who was building Nuritch's palatial mansion. "Yes," interrupted Nuritch, hotly, "and what do you mean by puttin' 'Salve' over the door? Don't you try to run in no patent medicine ads on me!"—Philadelphia Press.

Policy Holders Organize at Last.

We are glad to be able to state that at last the leading merchants of San Francisco have effected an organization of policy holders. On Monday of the past week a meeting was held under the auspices of the Merchants' Association, the Chamber of Commerce, the Board of Trade, the Merchants' Exchange, and the Manufacturers' and Producers' Association. The hall was crowded, every seat was occupied, and large numbers of men stood up around the walls and in the rear of the hall; altogether there were over a thousand in attendance. An informal canvass showed that over a hundred millions of insurance were represented in this gathering. The meeting was called to order by H. Reinstock, who was elected permanent chairman. In his opening address he said:

"No one of us singly can hope to battle successfully with a large group of insurance companies. Collectively, however, we are a power that no group of insurance companies can hope to ignore or to defy. Still we have no desire to do the least injustice to any insurance company, or to make unreasonable demands upon them, or needlessly to hurt the interests of any underwriter. Where the insured find it is the intention of the companies to act fairly and honestly, the policy holders will patiently bear the inevitable delays in the settlement of claims. The conservative spirit of our commercial bodies will not permit any rash or hasty action."

Committees had been appointed in advance by the various mercantile bodies to prepare facts for the meeting to work upon. The Chamber of Commerce, for example, had secured the services of George E. Butler, an insurance man of forty years' experience, for the purpose of securing trustworthy data and information bearing on the condition of the insurance companies, which information is to be given to the public.

F. J. Symmes, chairman of a committee to prepare facts for discussion at the meeting, made a report, and laid before the gathering a set of resolutions for consideration. This report recommended that the organization be known as the Policy Holders' Protective League; that it be under the auspices of the five commercial organizations above mentioned; that as numerous insurance companies who claim to be solvent express their intention to settle for less than one hundred cents on the dollar, their attempt to escape their just debts be effectually dealt with; that while the insurance companies have the right to refuse to pay out money except upon losses actually sustained and insured, still solvent companies have no right to pay less than one hundred cents on the dollar of adjusted losses; that there is no justice in the claim of some insurance companies that because some buildings were damaged by earthquake every policy holder must accept less than his just dues; that companies seeking to effect compromises through petty tactics or unnecessary delays should be advertised to the world; that the Policy Holders' League intends to let the people of Europe and America know how the insurance companies settle their losses in San Francisco; that as the fire insurance companies have found it advisable to co-operate, it likewise appears advisable that the policy holders should co-operate; that all the members pledge themselves to contribute for the purposes of the league a sum not to exceed one per cent of the face value of their policies, to be paid in such installments as may hereafter be determined; that the league should print prominently, in influential dailies in every large city in America and Europe, lists giving the names of such companies as are prompt and diligent in adjusting and paying in full their actual losses, and also such companies as may fail to do so; that the league should attempt to have passed by the California Legislature a standard form of policy to be adopted by all the fire insurance companies doing business in California; that the league shall employ paid officials, experts and attorneys to secure policy holders' interests; that the membership in said league shall be open to all fire insurance policy holders.

On the reading of the report, preamble, and resolutions some opposition was manifested. F. W. Dohrmann (as reported) said that "an organization carrying the threat implied in the resolutions was likely to array the companies against the policy holders." It seems to us that the companies are already arrayed against the policy holders. Mr. Dohrmann (as reported) went on to say: "It may be that we will have to go to the home offices of the companies and to send our representatives to Europe for settlement. We would be met in a better spirit if we had not taken this action." He strongly advocated a permanent organization. This is an excellent suggestion, and we agree with Mr. Dohrmann on this point. A. Sbarboro sided with Mr. Dohrmann in regard to the inexpediency of vigorous action. He said: "This is no time to array such a powerful and wealthy organization as we propose against a more powerful and wealthy organization—all the combined insurance companies—in a fight against which the policy holder may wait indefinitely for his money." Both of these gentlemen offered substitutes for the original resolution, much milder in tone; these substitutes generally advocated merely to examine into and report on the "financial condition, attitude, and liability of directors and share holders of all insuring companies." E. S. Rothchild also (as reported), said: "If the meeting would take proper action, calm and determined, more was to be gained than by informing the insurance companies that the organization was seeking a fight."

There followed some discussion concerning the amount of the one per cent contribution, many thinking it too large. This, however, was passed over, as the general belief was that the trustees would collect only such portion of the one per cent contribution as was needed. Finally the Dohrmann and Sbarboro resolutions were withdrawn, and several of the original resolutions were passed, among them these: the resolution organizing, the resolution making a call of one per cent, and the resolutions concerning the officers, reports and membership. The others were not voted upon, but left to the action of the committee on organization.

We are very glad, indeed, to see that the merchants of San Francisco have at last organized. Their delay is not strange when it is considered that every man has for many weeks been busily occupied for probably eighteen hours out of the twenty-four. Looking out for their families, for their employees, for their private business, for the adjustment of their insurance claims, for public and private charities—these and a thousand and one things have engrossed their attention and their time, and have prevented them from attending to this vital matter of organization. But we are certain that they will find that they never did a better thing. The first enthusiastic determination to rebuild San Francisco was followed by a long and gloomy pause. This was caused by the uncertain attitude of the insurance companies and their annoying and perplexing delays. The uncertainty of their attitude and their harassing delays still continue. The best way—in fact the only way—to begin to rebuild San Francisco is to require the insurance companies to pay to the insurers their legitimate claims. More than two months have elapsed, and few among them have even begun to pay. It is high time that they should begin. If they choose to do so without being forced, well and good. But if they will not pay their losses without compulsion, then they must be forced.

We hope and believe that the gentlemen who favor the mild and temporizing attitude outlined above represent only a small minority of the Policy Holders' Protective League. However, if anything like a majority feel as they do, the merchants will remain at the mercy of the insurance companies. Those corporations have shown plainly that toward the small policy holders, the poor policy holders, the timid and the weak, they are merciless—individuals generally have met with scant consideration from many of the companies. Why then do we all owe so much punctilious consideration to them? The apologetic attitude of some of these gentlemen at the policy holders' meeting we do not understand. Claiming one's just debts is not necessarily "threatening."

If the insurance companies have the right to organize, why have not the policy holders the right to organize? If the insurance companies may combine to take away some of the policy holders' money, why may not the policy holders combine to keep them from taking it?

Faith and Credit, Rothschilds and Pawnbrokers.

A history of the foundation of the Rothschild family, as read in boyhood, made a profound impression on the writer. About all that remains of this school-book lore is this: The original Rothschild, the ancestor of the family, entrusted with large funds by his sovereign when fleeing before Napoleon, buried the money in his cellar. He resisted with great pluck the threats of the little Corsican's lieutenants. Remaining faithful and silent, he gave back to his returning sovereign the treasures entrusted to him. He received a better reward than did the servant in the parable. The original Rothschild returned only the treasure entrusted to him, for which in the Good Book the poor servant got a wiggling. The original Rothschild won fame and fortune.

Refreshing our memory of the school-book story by dipping into Larousse, the nearest reference book to hand, we find this: "Mayer Anselm Rothschild; ancestor of the family; born and died at Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1743-1812. First a petty shopkeeper, then a money changer, finally a banker. His scrupulous honesty brought to him a rich clientele. He became the agent of the Prince Elector, William I of Hesse-Cassel, a great speculator. In 1806 William was forced to flee before the French armies, and he confided to Rothschild the care and administration of his fortune. On his return he heaped honors and rewards on Rothschild. In 1815 the Emperor of Austria conferred nobility on the family, and gave to its head the title of Baron. By his wife, Gutta Schapper, he had ten children. The eldest remained at the head of the Bank of Frankfort and the others swarmed [essamierent—Larousse] at Vienna, Paris, London and Naples."

This was not so romantic as the school-book story of the original Rothschild burying the Elector's jewel-studded crown, his wife's diamonds, and the Electoral spoons and forks in the cellar. However, it closely resembled the original story. It also seemed to confirm the copy-book legend, "Honesty is the best policy." For Rothschild might have sequestered the Elector's jewels, spoons and forks, and moved into a far country. But then he would not have made nearly so much money out of his dishonesty as he did out of his honesty. And as for the children of the Rothschild loins, where would they be? Not giving their daughters in marriage to belted English earls, or to the descendants of long lines of Frankish Crusaders.

It has been the writer's lot, whenever he has crossed the pond, to carry with him a letter of credit drawn on Rothschild & Sons' Bank, London. Yet, although he had cashed drafts drawn on this bank many times, it so happened that he never had cashed them at the bank itself. When traveling in the British Isles he naturally cashed them at provincial banks. When in London he generally went to one of the many offices of Cook & Sons in the West End, which are much more convenient in point of location, and infinitely more so in point of urbanity and speed, as will be developed later on.

But matters so shaped themselves that he made a visit at last to the headquarters of the Rothschild bank itself. Or rather he was forced to go. While traveling in the west of England he found that the Bank of California (through which he had secured his letter of credit drawn on the London Rothschilds) had but a few correspondents in the smaller towns of the west of England and Wales. In the larger cities, such as Liverpool, Manchester and Birmingham, they had correspondents, but not in the watering places and summer resorts, such as Llandudno, Rhyl, Conway, Llanberis, or Caernarvon. Therefore, he soon found himself running short of cash. As it did not seem desirable to leave the Devonshire seashore or the Welsh mountains merely to go to Manchester or Birmingham to get money, and as the little banks in the watering places would cash no drafts other than those of their banking correspondents, we wrote to the firm of Rothschild & Sons, London, saying briefly:

"We have a credit with you for — pounds. There are no Bank of California correspondents here in this vicinity. Will you, therefore, kindly forward us fifty pounds through the Bank of Llandudno, and charge the same to the account of the Bank of California, whose letter of credit No. — you hold?"

Requests like this are made every day on the Continent, and invariably heeded, so far as our experience goes. Nor do we know of continental bankers being defrauded through such requests; nor do we see very well how they could be thus defrauded, if they have the signature of the person possessing the credit, and if they send the signature to the bank cashing the draft. At all events, since the Continental bankers follow this very accommodating system and have for many years, it is quite evident that they do not lose by it or they would abandon it.

The firm of Rothschild & Sons, London, did not prove so accommodating. After the lapse of three days we received a note running thus:

Dear Sir: Your favor of — received. In reply would state that we make it a rule not to make any advances on credits in the manner you indicate. If you will forward to us by mail (entirely at your own risk) your letter of credit, we will forward you a receipt for the sum desired. On the return of this receipt we will forward you the money, and return to you your letter of credit by mail (both entirely at your risk).

Very respectfully yours,

Rothschild & Sons.

This over-cautious epistle inspired us with a strong desire to see what manner of men presided over the great financial institution of Rothschild & Sons. Therefore, we made a trip up to London for the express purpose of viewing this famous bank and incidentally of getting money enough to pay current bills. The trip took us clear across England, but as we never before had entered the Bank of Rothschild, on which we had drawn drafts from banks all over the world, perhaps it was worth while.

This was before the days of the "tuppenny tube," the new electric. It is a long trip by cab from the West End to the bank. So we took the steam railway from Charing Cross, which carries you there in a few minutes, and you alight from the train only a few paces from the "the Bank." Generally speaking, the heart of the financial district in London is known as "the Bank," which means the Bank of England or "the old lady of Threadneedle Street," which thoroughfare is one of the streets which bound the Bank of England. Not far away, in St. Swithin's Lane, we found the famous institution of the Rothschilds. St. Swithin's Lane is a blind alley leading into a blind court. Around this grim court we wandered looking for a sign board or some indication of ownership. There was none. At last, after stumbling into three or four wrong places, we found the Rothschild Bank. We went from desk to desk, none of them marked, looking for the one where foreign exchange was cashed. At each desk we were sent to another. Finally we found the foreign exchange desk. The person in charge took the letter, glanced at it, threw it down and remarked semi-petulantly, "Why, that is not to be presented here." "Where, then?" we asked, politely. The petulant person had already turned away and was busying himself with a newspaper. He looked us long enough to remark snappily, "At the Head Office" (He called it "ed office.") To a query as to where the Head Office might be found he vouchsafed no reply. So we started off to hunt up the 'Ed Office. After some difficulty we found it—it was in another building some distance away. Here again we wandered from desk to desk, none of them marked, until we found the right man to whom we presented the letter. "Is this the proper place for presentation of foreign letters?" He replied that it was. The letter was presented and he withdrew into an inner office, returning after some ten minutes with a draft to be signed. As the writer signed the draft he said, "Would you be kind enough to give me this in five-pound notes?"

The gentleman of the Head Office looked at us with what seemed like indignation. "What, money?" he said in a shrill tone. "You want money? There is no money here; we handle nothing but checks." With much humility the writer asked; "On what bank are the checks drawn?" To this came the reply, "Why, our own bank of course don't you know where our bank is?" On inquiry we found that the place to get the check cashed was the office we had just quitted, some distance away. "Will the bank give a portion of this in small change sovereigns and silver?" "No, indeed," said the haughty office gentleman warmly. "Change? Why, that's out of the question they might have some fi-pun notes, but they mostly have twenty-pun notes."

We felt crushed as we reflected that probably only multi-millionaires cash their draft at the Bank of Rothschild, where the smallest denomination is a twenty-pound note. However, we bowed to the 'Ed Office gentleman and sadly took up our line of march to the other building of the Rothschild Bank. He was partially right. They did refuse to give us any gold or silver, but let us have some five-pound notes.

Now it is absolutely necessary when traveling to have small change. A wise man loads up in the morning with small gold, small silver and copper. No cabman ever has any change at all. Then if you have small change you can determine the size of your own tips. Waiters have a fondness for bringing back nothing smaller than half a crown if they can.

So we timidly asked the haughty person at the banking end of the Rothschild Bank where we could get some change. He looked at us severely, "Why, at the Bank of England of course," he said. Shrinking visibly, we made our exit from the Rothschild Bank, and went some little distance away to the Bank of England. Of course we got into the wrong part—we got into the paper part. We were pushed and shoved out of there until we got into the coin part of the Bank of England. When we laid down some five-pound notes and requested change, the coin clerk could scarcely restrain his indignation; he told us we were at the gold end of the room, and ordered us to the other end if we wanted to get silver. We meandered in an apologetic way to the silver end of the coin department of the Bank of England. This coin clerk refused to give part gold and part silver, informing us truculently that he had nothin' to do with gold. He also refused to give us anything but a set sum done up in sealed bags and stamped with the amount; he also refused to let us open it on the counter. By this time our spirits were broken and we accepted a sealed bag. It was only on returning to our hotel when we broke open the bag and found that it contained no sixpences—the coin we wanted most—that we broke forth into vigorous American profanity concerning British banking and banks. After that we cashed drafts—as before—at the offices of the Cook agency. There we were treated civilly and our time was not wasted.

The foregoing anecdote and the indelible impression made on our minds by the Rothschild Bank has been recalled recently by a number of rumors concerning the relations of that bank with California and Californians. The Bank of California, of which the London Rothschilds have been correspondents for many years, has suddenly broken off its relations with them. No explanation is given out by the Bank of California, and the Rothschilds show no desire to make any. The causes ascribed for this sudden rupture vary. But the most persistent rumor is this: When the news of our great disaster was abled all over the world there were scores of San Franciscans abroad. Many of those in London bore letters of credit from the Bank of California drawn on the Bank of Rothschild & Sons. It might not be surprising if a poor, weak, second-rate Continental banks should repudiate the letters of its correspondent banks in a city stricken with a great calamity. But it would scarcely seem credible that the institution of Rothschild & Sons, one of the financial pillars of the world, should so act. Yet, according to rumor, that is what they did at first. They may have become ashamed, and may later have concluded to honor these drafts, but such was not their initial action. To add to the grief and terror of those traveling San Franciscans, crushed with the news of the disaster to their city, they were confronted with the heart-breaking fact that they could not return to their stricken families, their burned places of business, and their ruined homes, because the Bank of Rothschild & Sons dishonored the drafts of the Bank of California. And by dishonoring those drafts, the Rothschilds showed plainly their belief—because there was a fire in San Francisco—that the Bank of California would repudiate its obligations, that its directors were rogues, and that its clients were knaves.

All over the world and in every age of the world business has reposed on faith, credit and honor. The foundations of the fortune of the House of Rothschild were based on the business honor and credit of Mayer Anselm Rothschild. If the Elector of Hesse-Cassel had believed that all men were knaves, he would not have entrusted his fortune to Mayer Anselm Rothschild. If he had not trusted the first Rothschild, some of the banking princes who preside over the great institution in St. Swithin's Lane would instead be making advances on second-hand trousers in the dark back-rooms of pawnbroker shops in Houndsditch or Whitechapel.

And in our opinion there is where they belong.

Sauce for the Goose.

It is scarcely credible, but most of the insurance companies that have announced their intention to scale all policies down 25 per cent still seem to expect to get new business in California.

These 75-cent institutions—or, as they are coming to be called, the "six-bit companies"—want to confiscate the people's fire-loss money with the left hand while receiving the people's premiums for new business with the right. But they are not going to succeed in their little game. Already throughout California the people are refusing to give new business to the "six-bit" companies and cancelling old business. One of the first insurers in the State to take this step is the Convent of St. Joseph in San Diego which carried an insurance of $76,000 on its hospital and other buildings. Last week they cancelled the policies they held with the "six-bit" companies. We congratulate the good Sisters, not only on their independence but on their prudence. Companies which try to crawl out of their just obligations in one city may be expected to act similarly in others. The lesser cities of California are just as apt to suffer by fire as did San Francisco.

The trustees of the San Diego Public Library next came into prominence by ordering the agents of companies not settling their losses at 100 cents on the dollar to cancel their policies on the library. The trustees ordered new policies to be written instead in companies honestly meeting their losses.

Disposing of the Relief Fund.

We often hear the phrase "the embarrassment of riches," but it is a kind of embarrassment that is very rare. The present writer never met a man who thought he had too much money. He has often met millionaires who speculated what they would do if they "had as much money as Rockefeller," but the man who will admit that he has too much money is a rare bird.

The Relief Committee of San Francisco, however, is speedily going to find its relief fund is an embarrassing richness. Not that the committee has too much—for the needs of the destitute of San Francisco could not be met with five or even fifteen millions—but that the problems presented to the Finance Committee will prove almost impossible of solution.

A prominent attorney, W. J. Barnett, recently sent to the Finance Committee a scheme for the distribution of the funds in their control. It so astonished that body that for several days they kept it to themselves. At last they took heart of grace and sent it to the papers. It was some two columns in length. Those who read it were as much amazed as were the Finance Committee. It advocated in the most forthright manner giving the money now in the custody of the Relief Committee to the people who needed it; one thousand dollars say to a family; five hundred dollars to a single woman; two or three thousand to the head of a large family who wanted to build a house, etc.; loans to be made to assist men desiring to engage in business, "individual endorsements to be the only security for these loans;" donations to be made to ten thousand families of about two hundred and fifty dollars per family; this would aggregate about $2,500,000 and would assist some fifty thousand people; gifts to be made to families who have lost their wage earners through the calamity, these gifts averaging five hundred dollars per family; donations of something like five hundred dollars apiece to be made to widows with children dependent on them; donations of money to be made to artists, professional men, lawyers, journalists, dentists and physicians; working law libraries to be purchased for the benefit of lawyers who have lost their libraries; tools to be purchased for artisans who have lost their tools; an appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars to be made to assist exiled sufferers from the calamity to return to California; one million dollars to be expended in leasing land in the burned district and erecting wooden structures to house the men engaged in rebuilding San Francisco.

It is not too much to say that the first reading of the first part of this letter produced a sentiment in the mind of the average reader closely akin to stupefaction. It is only fair to add that when he had read the document half through he would find his sentiments changing; when he had concluded, he would have a confused feeling of half agreement with the writer. For Mr. Barnett says: "The committee should set these millions to work in the shortest possible time. If the fund be held indefinitely and our people compelled to accept relief from day to day for a long period, this will accustom them to accepting charity instead of using their own exertions to gain a livelihood. Do not be afraid of using the fund for the purpose for which it was created. It was donated to be given away and to render assistance to those that need it."

When one recovers from the first shock of considering the giving of several millions of money to people who have nothing at all, the project does not seem so chimerical. The fund was donated to assist people temporarily destitute. It was freely donated—why, then, should it not be freely given? It was not intended to be doled out over a period of years; it was intended to be given now. All of these things are indisputable.

In the abstract none of these propositions can be successfully gainsaid. But how about the concrete? If the Finance Committee should attempt to carry out these ideas, benevolent and philanthropic as they may seem, we fear that the San Francisco Relief Fund of 1906 will prove a Pandora's box out of which unnumbered ills will come for generations.

The only safe way to give large sums of money to needy people is to let them work for it. Of course we exclude from this the aged, the sick, and the incompetent. Even then there is an assisted flavor about the work. It differs from normal work. The man who works for a dollar under normal conditions, and who works for another man who wants a dollar's worth of work, will probably give his employer the next thing to it, say ninety-eight cents' worth. But the man who is working for a Nation, a State, or a City, and who is ostensibly working for a dollar, never gives as much as ninety cents' worth of work, and frequently not more than fifty cents' worth. This is the case with all governmental and municipal work-shops.

In 1848, after the French had driven out Louis Philippe, the Constitutional Monarch with the pear-shaped face, a number of lawyers came suddenly to the front as the saviors of their country. In France, after the first saviors have stopped shooting and stabbing, and after the gore has been wiped up, the lawyers always step briskly forward and take the salaried jobs. In this particular case, the lawyers speedily made up a constitutional government. But this government soon found itself confronted with a grave commercial and industrial crisis. Scores of thousands of idle patriots patrolled the streets of Paris, demanding bread or blood. The lawyers were quite willing to see any number of Kings, Orleans or Bourbon, lay down their royal lives, but they had not the slightest desire to lay down their own. So they felt themselves constrained to furnish the idle patriots with other people's bread rather than their own blood. Therefore, they instituted what were known as the "National work-shops." In these institutions large sums of money were disbursed. But large amounts of work were not done. The patriots drew down their wages regularly, but they accomplished little work. There was no reason why they should not work as hard for their own constitutional government as they had done for their previous employers, but they certainly did not. It was not long before the "National work-shops" emitted such a stench of financial scandal that the entire nation held its nose and the work-shops were abolished.

The same weakness permeates all national work-shops. The writer knows nothing of important industries like oyster opening, making jewelry, or trimming hats, but he is tolerably conversant with the printing and publishing business. He will lay a wager that the Government Printing Office in Washington turns out the smallest output per type-setting machine per man to be found in the United States. It is probable that every linotype and monotype machine in that vast concern has its "secret maximum," and that every operator who exceeds that maximum output per day gets himself disliked, and that mysterious things are continually happening to his machine. In short, if one wants to know how slowly the governmental mills may grind, all he has to do is to visit Uncle Sam's printing shop at Washington. And if he wants to know the two extremes of the printing business he had better go into any daily newspaper office about 2 A. M. and see how fast printers can work, and then go into the National printing office at any old time and see how slow they can move around.

The best method of disposing of the Relief Fund is by giving work to the destitute. This method is at its best only a poor way, but it is infinitely better than giving money outright. If assisted work-shops, or assisted industries, or assisted enterprise of any kind are put on foot by the Financial Committee and with the Relief Funds, it will speedily be found that the work of an assisted workman or assisted work-woman is far inferior in finish, capacity, and volume to that of a non-assisted workman or work-woman. But even if a dollar's worth of work should cost two dollars when done by these assisted workmen, it is better for them and better for the city than that they should receive it as alms.

Fair and Unfair Insurance Companies.

We intend to print in these columns, to keep standing, and to circulate as widely as we may, the names of the insurance companies now acting unfairly and dishonorably by their policy-holders. We shall do this as soon as the situation is clear. At present it is rather complicated. Some thirty-six companies have refused to adhere to what is called the "New York plan," which means a horizontal cut of twenty-five per cent: they are proceeding to adjust their fire losses with their individual policy-holders, regardless of the Underwriters' Bureau or the New York plan. But some of these companies which protest so loudly do protest too much. In many cases their apparent fairness is nothing but a pretense. The claims which some of them are adjusting are gradually being brought to light, with results so unfair and dishonest that they will soon be put into the class where they belong. As for those companies which announced their adherence to the "New York plan" several became alarmed at the result on their policy-holders, and have advertised their intention to abandon the crooked system of compromise which they at first decided to stand by. Then there is a third group of companies—some of them old, wealthy and honorable—which have not announced their course of action. They are, however, open to the suspicion of adhesion to the New York plan, for the simple reason that they are silent. These also cannot as yet be classified. A fourth group consists of English companies, whose home offices have refused to allow the local agents to acknowledge liability, to disavow liability, or to express any opinion whatever on disputed points, such as earthquake damage and dynamite. The agents of these foreign companies are still awaiting instructions from their home offices, and in most cases managers and directors are hastening hither to take active personal charge themselves.

As soon as these open questions are settled we shall print lists of these various companies, and put them exactly where they belong. The San Francisco Policy Holders' Protective League is engaged in accumulating facts and figures which will be accurate, and which may be depended on.

Where there is so much to condemn in the insurance situation it is only fair to say that some companies have been receiving proofs of loss courteously, have been adjusting policy-holders' claims promptly, and have been paying their adjusted fire losses in full. We are sorry that the list of such companies is so short, but where we must mention those who are derelict, it is only fair that we should also mention those who are acting squarely toward their policy-holders. This we shall do as rapidly as we hear of them. One of these is the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, one of the thirty-six "dollar for dollar" companies. This company has already paid to its policy-holders $825,511. As a result of its fair treatment we are glad to learn that the Connecticut has written a large amount of new insurance. Another company is the Continental Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford. This company has also been rapidly settling claims and has paid a large amount in cash to its policy-holders. It, too, is reaping its reward in the shape of new business.

Bad Earthquakes on the Other Island.

A dispatch comes from Manila under the date of June 20th stating that on the Island of Luzon a series of earthquakes began at eight o'clock in the evening of the 19th of June, and lasted until after seven o'clock on the next day. Naturally the Filipinos were perturbed by this tumultuous night, but they had presence of mind enough to cable back to their fellow citizens on the mainland, through the Manila Observatory, that "the earthquakes were much more severe in the other islands of the archipelago."

Quite right. They always are. They are invariably more severe in the other islands and in the other archipelagoes. Here in California we have but few islands and no archipelagoes, but although we have some right smart earthquakes, we are quite certain that they are more severe in Manila than they are here.

The present writer spends part of his time in San Jose and part of his time in San Francisco. When he is in San Jose he assures his neighbors—and believes—that the San Francisco shocks are something awful. When in San Francisco he learns of a shock in San Jose, he—sincerely—assures his friends in San Francisco that he is glad he is not in San Jose. San Mateo is midway between San Jose and San Francisco; when in San Mateo he hears of shocks in San Jose and San Francisco, he—earnestly—believes that these shocks are worse than those in San Mateo. Thus he ingenuously plays the middle against both ends.

It is human nature. Hope springs eternal. We all of us believe we are not going to have any more big shocks. And on the 17th of April many of us were wondering why the deluded peasants should go back and build on Mount Vesuvius. Yet on the 19th of April the man who said he did not intend to rebuild in San Francisco would have been cut by his friends, jilted by his sweetheart, and blackballed at any club.

Cash Value, Sound Value, and Risk.

The managers of the "six-bit" insurance companies are filling the newspapers at so much a line with elaborate defenses of their peculiar procedure. One of the leading exponents in this line during the week is Mr. John B. Morton, General Agent of the Fire Association and Philadelphia Underwriters, who writes to the local agents, Gutte & Frank, saying: "These companies are adjusting and paying their claims on this basis—in cases where the question of liability on account of earthquake damage was doubtful, where the properties had been damaged by the use of explosives before the fire had reached them, or where books of record had been destroyed, such claims should be settled by a reasonable compromise. A proposition to pay seventy-five per cent would be not only reasonable, but a fair compromise."

This apparently "reasonable and fair" classification would take in nearly every fire loss in San Francisco. While not three per cent of the buildings there suffered structural damage by the earthquake, there is probably not one that did not suffer some trifling damage. The number of properties damaged by explosives it would be difficult to estimate. Two of the Federal buildings, the Mint and the Postoffice, were seriously damaged by explosives; as for those persons whose books of record were destroyed, nearly every business man in the city was burned out, and nearly all of them lost their books of record. Therefore the apparently "fair and reasonable" classification of Mr. John B. Morton strikes us as being both unfair and unreasonable.

There is another phase of this matter which we commend to the insurers and the insured. Those horizontal-cut companies, which make so much to-do over their fairness, utterly ignore the fact that their attempted sweeping reduction is based on unjust and unreasonable grounds. They claim that the earthquake, the dynamiting, and the lack of water suddenly reduced in value all the property in San Francisco to the extent of about twenty-five per cent; that therefore they are justified in scaling down all policies twenty-five per cent; that beginning with this scaled-down valuation they will then proceed to adjust—downwards—and thereby arrive at a "fair and reasonable compromise." They ignore utterly the fact that most of the risks in San Francisco were not insured for anything like their full value. Let any policy-holder who reads this reflect on the difference in his proofs of loss between the "cost price" and the amount insured. Even if policy-holders were disposed to insure closely up to the cost of their property, the high insurance rate would deter them. Therefore the fact remains indisputable that a large majority were insured for from 60 per cent to 30 per cent of cost or value. How then can any insurance company claim the right to cut 25 per cent from the "amount insured" when that sum represents only 50 per cent of the value? Such a cut would leave the unfortunate policy-holder with a claim for only 25 per cent of the value of his property; and even this small percentage is subject to a discount by the companies when adjusted by a "fair and reasonable compromise." To put it more simply: Suppose a man had a house worth $10,000; suppose he had it insured for $4,000; suppose it was damaged to the extent of $2,000 by earthquake. That would leave it with a sound value of $8,000, on which he would have a fire risk of $4,000. Yet these companies would impose on him a dishonest cut of 25 per cent as a starter, bringing down his fire risk to $3,000 on a value of $8,000, and would then proceed to adjust from that "downwards." If this discounting of the crooked insurance companies were made on the face value of the property and not on the face of the policy, there might be some ground for their contention that it is a "fair and reasonable compromise," but there is absolutely no ground for contending that such a compromise is either fair or reasonable. It is as we said both unfair and unreasonable, and to it we will add that it is unjust and dishonest.

Strange Natural Phenomenon.

For a number of years the California "valley quail" have been preserved in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco. The birds grew so tame that they paid little heed to man. Only at the mating season were they shy. It was a very pretty sight, while walking or driving through the park, to see the numerous coveys of California quail with their handsome black pompons.

This is a very different bird from the quail of the country east of the Rocky Mountains. In California are found the valley quail (Lophortyx x californicus) and the mountain quail (Oreortyx x pictus), both of which are fine game birds and good eating. The mountain quail is a hard bird to find and a harder one to shoot. Hence it is rare, not being often found in the city markets, as it does not pay the pot-hunter to shoot and ship the birds such a distance. For it is not found in the Coast Range mountains, which rise but little above 5000 feet; it is confined to the lofty Sierra Nevada, which averages from 5000 to 15,000 feet in height.

For a number of weeks Golden Gate Park has been inhabited by many thousands of San Francisco refugees dwelling in tents. For some strange reason, after their advent the quails began slowly to disappear. This was not the case with owls, gulls, hawks, and crows, strange as it may seem—it was only the quails which disappeared. It could scarcely be terror of man, for they previously were semi-domesticated and went unharmed, as there was a heavy fine for molesting them.

It is as yet unknown what mysterious causes led to their disappearance. Leading members of the Academy of Sciences are studying profoundly this interesting question, but up to date they have not solved it, as their natural histories are all burned.

Professor Honk, the distinguished ornithological scientist, when interviewed by an Argonaut representative on this subject, stated that as soon as the Academy of Sciences re-erected its building and got their lecture hall again in working order the subject would be taken up, and without doubt the strange disappearance of the quail would be accounted for.

Professor Piffles, the leading geological expert of the Academy, is of the opinion that the tectonic action of the fault-fissures in the earthquake zone—the line of which passes through Golden Gate Park—must have caused the quail to run and fly in curves instead of triangles when flushed; ordinarily the triangular apices of their flights, like boomerangs, would bring them back home again, no matter how far they flew. Their curvilinear flight, however, had evidently taken them far afield. "But I got onto their curves," said Professor Piffles, simply, but with evident pride.

Both Professor Piffles and Professor Honk remarked with pain that they had received no encouragement in their scientific search from the tent-dwellers. These people, when interrogated by the two professors, invariably indulged in unseemly and meaningless merriment.

Overhaul Your Live Policies.

Many a business man suffers keen mortification on reflecting how little he knew three months ago either of the wording of his policies or of the companies in which they were written. Many policy-holders not only knew nothing about the companies, but could not even remember their names. Hence those who were unfortunate enough, under these circumstances, to lose their policies, were placed in a most unpleasant position. To crown it all when a business man knew little of his policies, had no record of their number or conditions, and was unwise enough to leave the policies themselves in the premises insured—very generally the case—it is easy to imagine his self-accusation.

When we say now "overhaul your policies" we do not mean the old ones; we mean the policies, old or new, running on property yet unburned. Many losers by the recent fire are placing new business. We strongly advise these insurers to overhaul their policies on any property in San Francisco or elsewhere. Let them take careful note of the names of the companies. Let them at once cancel every policy that bears the name of any company now repudiating its just obligations. Let them urge their friends to do the same. Let them urge their business correspondents in other States and cities to blacklist these companies' names. Let them prove to these correspondents that on the ground of self-interest alone it would be wise for them to do so. Let them point out the crooked and dishonest course pursued by these companies. Let them use every pull they may have with churches, charitable institutions, and corporate institutions in which they are directors or stockholders, urging them to cancel the names of these defaulting companies. Let them refuse themselves to write any new business with these companies, and let them urge on all their friends and such institutions as we have just enumerated, to follow the same course.

In this way those who are so unfortunate as to hold policies with crooked or dishonest companies may at least cancel them before such companies default again, and they may prevent their friends and correspondents from being treated as dishonestly as many unfortunate San Franciscans are being treated now.

Building Regulations and Building Materials.

There is much discussion going on in San Francisco over the respective merits, as structural material, of steel, concrete and brick. The new building laws have not yet been passed—the Supervisors are still engaged in formulating them. There is also a marked difference of opinion between the advocates of high and low buildings. The Mayor and some of the Supervisors are in favor of restricting the height of buildings to one and one-half times the width of the street. Others believe in a "wide open" ordinance by which a man may run his skyscraper up as high as he chooses. The Argonaut, long before the present exigency arose, has often expressed itself on this question. We do not believe in sky-scrapers. We do not believe that because a man owns a plot of ground he owns it from Zenith to Nadir. We believe he owns it only as high and as deep as the law will let him. We believe that in future ages people will look back with wonder on the time when a man was allowed to erect a building twenty stories high because he had more money than his four-story neighbor; because a man had more money he should be entitled to more of the common light, more of the common air, and more of the common sunshine, than a man who had less, posterity will consider as barbaric. In years past the Argonaut has pointed out to the lesser land owners of San Francisco that every twelve-story sky-scraper raised in the downtown district throws out of commission three four-story buildings of similar floor space; it told them that if the law permitted the unrestricted erection of such tall buildings, there would soon come a time when all of San Francisco would be housed in a hundred blocks. Now that the city has practically been destroyed, this point becomes more marked than ever. A tier of blocks the height of the Call building, extending from Market to Washington and from Powell to Battery, could house nearly every retail and wholesale business in San Francisco. To what use would then be devoted the vacant ground around this tier of lofty blocks? It might perhaps be turned into vegetable gardens.

Hear the other side. It is only fair to give the arguments of those who favor sky-scrapers. They say that the buildings which stood most stoutly against both earthquake and fire were the sky-scrapers. This is true, but that is not because they were lofty.

but because they were strong. They are of steel-frame construction, and the brick, stone or terra cotta employed in their construction carries no weight, but is carried by the steel frame. To this the advocates of the sky-scraper reply that it is impossible to erect class A steel-frame buildings without making them ten, twelve, or more stories high because otherwise they cannot pay; that under the present building limitations as to height it is more profitable to erect class B or class C brick buildings; that the inferior building will bring in practically as much rental, and yet the initial cost is much less; that, therefore, the owner of a class A steel-frame building six stories high could not compete with the owner of a class C brick building six stories high. This also is beyond question true. The final argument of the advocates of the sky-scraper is even more convincing. They say that if such limitations be imposed upon them in regard to height which will prevent them from competing with inferior buildings they will be forced to construct class B and class C buildings themselves; that as the steel-frame building is the only type which stood earthquake and fire, laws preventing the erection of steel-frame buildings will penalize those who desire to improve the city; that such laws will thus put a premium upon a kind of construction which will lead to another conflagration.

There can be no doubt that these arguments of the sky-scraper advocates are apparently irrefutable, and there is also no doubt that the arguments of those who oppose sky-scrappers are apparently invincible.

There is a still more marked difference of opinion in San Francisco concerning building materials. Brick is in marked disfavor. Much brick work fell during the recent earthquake, but it was poor brick work. The writer has carefully examined a number of buildings for various reasons, and he has found that in several cases the walls of brick buildings erected thirty or forty years ago stood both the fire and the earthquake better than buildings erected ten years ago. The only solution of this puzzle is bad workmanship in the more modern buildings. In at least two cases he found the walls of old buildings standing intact, practically undamaged by earthquake and only slightly damaged by fire; although the wooden floor-girders and the roof were burned the walls were solid. In some modern buildings he found walls which had gone safely through the earthquake, but were completely wrecked by the fire, in some cases by the expansion of steel girders where provision had not been made for such expansion. Where the architect had allowed for expansion, the brick-layers had often thwarted him by filling in the expansion space.

In short, the brick-layers of today are highly organized; they are made up into compact unions; they have more leisure than their predecessors; they have shorter hours; they have better pay; but they do not know as much about good honest brick laying as the old boys did, and that's the truth. We have already spoken of the way in which the Palace Hotel stood both earthquake and fire. The statement is now made that the walls of that structure are so solid that it will cost to tear them down over a hundred and sixty thousand dollars. But these were good sound walls, built by good honest brick-layers, and they were bonded together with steel rods.

The modern brick-layers—who are daisies when it comes to resoluting and organizing, even if they do not know much about brick-laying—are now engaged in fighting the use of reinforced concrete. They fear it will decrease the gains of their trade. We sincerely hope it will. They are now earning only seven to eight dollars a day in San Francisco. Brick structures do very well in some countries and in some climates, but not here, with our kind of brick-layers, and in the glorious seismic climate of California. The advocates of concrete say that it has great tensile strength, but is lacking in torsional strength; that this latter element is supplied by the weaving of wires or rods or meshes of steel into the composition of the concrete. This process gives it elasticity, and renders it more able to stand the effect of twisting earthquake shocks.

It is our opinion that good concrete construction is better than good brick construction; and that poor brick construction is the worst known to man. Concrete, which is practically an artificial stone, is more durable than natural stone. This is shown by the many concrete structures to be found in the Old World. In fact, many of the structures constructed two thousand years ago by the Romans—with what is still called "Roman cement"—still stand. Some of the ancient Roman aqueducts, both above and below ground, are in use by the moderns today.

Red Tape and Trade-Marks.

Among the many other documents destroyed by the fire, the Argonaut lost its certificate of incorporation and its title trade-mark. The Argonaut has always been a tolerably decent corporation—not grinding the faces of the poor, never cutting coupons, not putting up the price of oil like John D. Rockefeller, not putting ptomaines in tinned meats and sausages like the slaughter house millionaires of Chicago. Thus, while we hope to read our title clear—to mansions in the skies or elsewhere as the case may be—we were not so sure about our earthly title. So we determined to have these valuable documents resurrected and their physical parts made to rise again out of their ashes, as all of us hope to do when Gabriel sounds his trump. We had practical reasons for resurrecting the certificate of incorporation, as we hoped to gain from the insurance companies certain simoleons which they had wagered against us that our property would not burn. They have lost; but so—alas! have we, for it looks much as though they were not going to pay.

However, early in the fire excitement, when we really hoped to get some of our insurance money, we thought it might be necessary to prove that the Argonaut was really an incorporation. So we requested the Secretary of State of California to make us out a new attested copy of our certificate. We sent our request to Sacramento and in two days we received from the Capital city by express an attested copy of the document, with a beautiful red ribbon and a large and elegantly formed seal.

Encouraged by the rapidity of this transaction, we determined to resuscitate our trade-mark certificate also, for be it known that many years ago we trade-marked the title of the Argonaut. It is a unique title, a well-sounding one, and one of which, even many years ago, we were proud, and of which in the subsequent lapse of years we have grown prouder. The trade-mark had also served to preserve to us the use of this title, which in a way is an advantage, for while there are many Heràlds, Suns, and Times, there is but one Argonaut.

So thinking, we addressed to the Department of the Interior the following polite note:

To the Patent Bureau,
Dept. of Trade-marks,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sirs:

I would like to have issued to me a new certificate of trade-mark of the words, "The Argonaut," as the heading of the weekly newspaper of that name published in San Francisco. The certificate was destroyed by the great fire in San Francisco together with the specifications of said trade-mark.

Will you kindly issue me said certificate or inform me what I must do to insure the issuance? Very truly yours,

Jerome A. Hart.

After the lapse of a number of days we received the following epistle:

Letter No. 94,047.

All communications should be addressed to The Commissioner of Patents, Washington, D. C.

N. C. Department of the Interior,
United States Patent Office,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1906.

Sir:

In reply to your letter received the 3d instant, I am directed by the Commissioner to say that the office is unable to identify any trade-mark which may have been registered by you without the number of the certificate, or the date of issue. If the data called for cannot be given and you desire a search made for the same it will be necessary for you to employ the services of an attorney, as such searches are not made officially except in connection with the examination of applications.

A certified copy of a trade-mark, when properly identified, will be furnished for eighty cents in currency.

Very respectfully,

C. M. Ireland,
Chief Clerk.

(Enclosure)

The adventures of a gentleman in search of a horse or the mishaps of him who buys a pig in a poke are as nothing compared to the hazards of him who retains an attorney at a distance of three thousand miles. An old soldier in search of his pension may indulge in the luxury of a Washington attorney, but none for us. We, therefore, waived the kindly suggestion of the department in regard to employing an attorney, and wondered vaguely why Uncle Sam should have so many thousands of clerks in his departmental bureaus at Washington if they cannot, like other people's clerks, look up records for their customers. However, knowing how curious are the ways of the Great White Father we stifled our surprise and sent to the department the following letter.

San Francisco, May 12.
Department of the Interior,
United States Patent Office,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sirs:

Your favor of May 7th is fully to hand.

The number of the certificate for which you ask is 16,662. The date of issue is June 4, 1889. In accordance with your statement that a certified copy of the trade-mark will be furnished for eighty cents in currency, when number of certificate and date of issue are given, I enclose herewith eighty cent stamps, as I have no way of making up that amount in currency.

Very truly yours,

Jerome A. Hart,
Pres. Argonaut Pub. Co.

In the course of time the following reply came from the department:

M. C. V.

Letter No. 104865.

All communications should be addressed to The Commissioner of Patents, Washington, D. C.

Department of the Interior,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1906.
United States Patent Office,

Mr. Jerome A. Hart, President,
The Argonaut Publishing Co.,

Sir:

The Commissioner directs me to return herewith postage stamps, to the amount of eighty cents, which accompanied your letter of the 12th instant, ordering

CERTIFIED COPY OF TRADE-MARK
for the reason that stamps are not receivable.

by this office in payment of fees. Your order has been placed on file, and will be filled upon receipt of eighty cents in currency.

Respectfully,

W. W. Mortimer,
Acting Chief Clerk.

This was a corker. We were aware that Uncle Sam frequently refuses to receive stamps, but he generally makes it possible for the person concerned to send the amount required in some form of United States money. Inasmuch as the fractional currency or "shin plasters" were abolished years ago, we knew of no way in which the sum of eighty cents could be forwarded in currency. The only thing to do, therefore, was to send a dollar bill, for the sum must be sent in currency, and "80 cts" is an impossible currency multiple.

This we did with the following letter:

The Commissioner of Patents,
U. S. Patent Office,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

Your favor of May 22d returning eighty cents in stamps has been received.

We send you herewith $1.00 in currency for the certified copy of trade-mark of "The Argonaut." Will you kindly send the same at an early date and oblige.

Yours very truly,

Jerome A. Hart,
President Argonaut Publishing Co.

After a decent interval the department at Washington replied by sending us an attested copy of our trade-mark certificate. Like the document returned to us from the capital city of California, it, too, was decorated with a beautiful ribbon, blue this time, and with a seal about the size of a buckwheat cake. But no word came about the dollar. Concerning the overplus of twenty cents, Uncle Sam's minions preserved a dark, deep and mysterious silence. For a time we felt that we had been done. It would seem as if Uncle Sam had tried to work us for twenty cents by refusing to honor his own currency. But after the lapse of a number of days there came one day the following document:

Division E., Manuscript.

Contained in the same envelope were two dimes. It was quite evident that we had done Uncle Sam's bureaus an injustice when we suspected them of knocking down our twenty cents.

But what an infinitude of red tape! What an excess of sealing wax! Why are not United States stamps good in United States offices? Why must a sum be sent in currency when it is an impossible currency multiple? Why should so trifling a transaction be forced to go through such a vast amount of flummery in the circumlocution offices of Uncle Sam? If so simple a matter as this requires so large an amount of correspondence, such an expenditure of labor, of ink and paper, of pen wear, and of mental strain on the part of the department clerks, how is the Federal Government ever going to build the Panama Canal? We fear that before it accomplishes that gigantic task, the Canal Commission will have become strangled in its own red tape and choked with its own sealing wax.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

California, With All Thy Faults.

New York, June 8th, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—I have had more sense of comfort in reading the Argonaut each week since the terrible disaster than from any other source. It has made me feel that the "en famille" relation of San Francisco and San Franciscans has been preserved. Possibly there are in this country, or have been elsewhere, other cities in which an equally familiar relation among all the inhabitants has prevailed, but I doubt it. Certainly no other community ever grew up just like our San Francisco where the most cosmopolitan blend of people lived in comparative isolation owing to the geographical position. This undoubtedly has been the cause of the "knocking" which each one has been privileged to give the other from time immemorial, but which has had nothing whatever to do with the real affection that San Franciscans have for one another.

This was remarkably instanced at a gathering of Californians at the Casino Theatre here in New York a couple of days after the disaster and at a time when hardly any news in detail had reached us. Mark Twain presided and two or three speeches were made. I said that somewhere in history I had read that Caesar, when he reached Alexandria, after the conquest of Pompey, asked: "Where are the Egyptians?" and each one replied, "I am an Athenian,"—although they had all been living there some three hundred years. And so I said it was with Californians: "Once a Californian always a Californian." The audience responded in a way that was almost pathetic and it was with difficulty that any of us could proceed.

All I can say, and in common with all other native sons, is, "California, with all thy faults—with all thy geological faults—I love thee still."

Always your sincere friend,

Joseph D. Redding.

Government Agent's Office,
Clinton, B. C., June 14, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—I have been yours truly for the past twenty-five years and hasten to add my congratulations on your entering your 30th year with the sincere wish that you may be doing business at the old stand thirty years from now, free from fires and quakes and all other ills and evils. With the enclosed move me on a couple of notches in my subscription. "Every little makes a muckle" especially at the present trying time.

Yours sincerely,

F. Soues.

From a Reader in Mexico.

Apartado 27, Parral, Mexico, June 13, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—I recently wrote to ask you to change the number of my post office box. The Everybody's Magazine is now coming to me, and all the other publications come regularly; so that matter is entirely straightened out. I am very happy to see the dear Argonaut every week, almost as big and as good as of yore. Thanking you for all the trouble you have taken in the above matter, with wishes for the Argonaut and all connected with it, I remain, Yours very truly,

J. W. Pender.

The Argonaut for Twenty-Nine Years.

San Francisco, June 15th, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Seven back numbers of your paper were received this morning, for which accept thanks. I have seldom missed a number for the past twenty-nine years, so now I cannot do without it. My dealer went out of business about April 20th without notifying me of his intention to do so. I am unable to get Post Office order, having failed in two sub stations, therefore I inclose you currency, for which please send me the paper. Keep right on sending until you are relocated in San Francisco, notifying me when the subscription expires.

Please send the missing number, April 21st.

Yours truly,

Chas. S. True.

The California Theatre Opening.

San Francisco, June 13, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—In your paper Saturday, June 16, a correspondent referred to the opening of the California Theatre as being January 19, 1870. According to a programme in my possession the event took place January 13, 1869. "Money" was the play. Also stated that the late Bret Harte read his poem which is a mistake. It was delivered by Lawrence Barrett.

Respectfully,

Mrs. W. A. Mestayer.

A Line From Mme. Julie Rosewald.

Many San Franciscans will remember Mme. Rosewald, as an admirable artist on the operatic stage, who renounced her operatic career to settle with her husband in San Francisco, with which city they had both become infatuated. After the death of her husband Mme. Rosewald went abroad to spend some years in her old home, living on the fruits of the modest competence amassed by her husband and herself. Her future movements will be told in the note that follows:

Stuttgart, June 4, 1906.

Dear Mr. Hart:—Now as never before I appreciate the calm and truthful attitude of the Argonaut in this time of terrible disaster. Every ray of hope for our beautiful but stricken city is eagerly awaited and every encouraging word is implicitly believed when coming from so truthful a source as the Argonaut. Your chart of the burned district showed me that the houses from which I derived my only income had not escaped, and that I, like many other thousands, must take up work again in order to earn enough to live on. What I regret most deeply is that this task must be accomplished elsewhere. I shall have to labor away from San Francisco where I toiled so many years, because that city will for a long time have more pressing needs than for singing teachers. In the autumn I shall return to the United States, and shall begin music teaching in Baltimore, where I have a sister living.

Will you kindly attend to notifying me as to the date of the expiration of my subscription? It has become a necessity for me to look for my Argonaut, and I am most grateful for having received it during these sad weeks. I am very glad that you were able to save the register of your subscribers, to whom I have belonged for more than twenty years, but I wish you could have saved some of the more valuable property, for the Argonaut would have been sure to retain its readers even if the register of their names was lost.

Thanking you sincerely for having sent it, I remain with best wishes.

Julie Rosewald.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Florence Nightingale recently celebrated the eighty-sixth anniversary of her birth. She is an invalid, confined to her bed at her house on South street, Park Lane, where thousands of congratulatory messages were received.

Princess Elizabeth of Belgium, wife of Prince Albert, heir-apparent to the throne, is probably the most accomplished and versatile of the continental princesses. She is the daughter of Duke Charles Theodore of Bavaria, the famous oculist. The princess, who has inherited her father's scientific tastes, has taken her degree of M. D., and could, if necessary, act as physician to her husband and children.

The New York World sent a cablegram to William Jennings Bryan last week informing him that several Democratic State conventions had recently indorsed him as candidate for the Presidency in 1908. The cablegram was addressed to Mr. Bryan at Dresden, Germany. The cablegram was returned to The World with this formal notice from the cable company: "Your cablegram addressed to William Jennings Bryan, Dresden, not delivered. Party not known."

Chauncey Depew has been taken in hand by Billy Muldoon, who is trying to make a new man of the United States Senator on Muldoon's farm at White Plains. Depew is leading the simple life. Muldoon sends him to bed at 9 o'clock and rounds him out promptly at 6. He has put him on a horse and made him ride a trot for miles, given him ice-cold shower baths and mercilessly put him through a course of sprouts with dumbbells, weights and a medicine ball. The Senator has improved greatly.

The name of Dr. Richard Garnett, who died in London the other day, will ever be associated with the great work of cataloguing the vast library of the British Museum. The Treasury agreed to set aside $50,000 a year for the purpose, and the work of editing the new catalogue was handed over to him. By 1880 the presses were at work and ten years later the task was completed. The catalogue of today consists of 800 volumes in all and contains nearly 4,000,000 entries, including the cross references. Nearly 60,000 fresh entries are added each year.

John Philip Sousa, the composer and band conductor, believes that talking machines will drive the vocal chords into a state of uselessness due to disuse. He prophesied as much at a joint session of the Senate and House Committees on Patents, which was called to hear the new copyright bill discussed. "I tell you the human voice is not heard as it used to be," he said, "and I prophesy that the vocal chords may by this disuse become useless. Another evidence that these machines are taking the musical initiative from our people is that the sale of the banjo, the mandolin and the guitar are greatly decreasing, and the dealers tell me this is on account of the increased use of the talking machines."

THE MANAGEMENT OF THE FIRE.

Firemen Unskilled in the Use of Dynamite—Instances Where Scores of Blocks of Houses Could Have Been Saved.

I was in the immediate vicinity of some of the first fires which started near Battery and Sacramento Streets in San Francisco on the morning of April the 18th. I heard the engines hurrying in response to the alarm, and a few minutes later I encountered groups of firemen—idle. "No water: the mains are broken," was their response to my startled inquiry. And when I suggested dynamite, they shrugged their shoulders. It was evident that their training had not included the use of dynamite, and when no water was to be had they had no knowledge how to fight the fire. They were as helpless as babes in arms.

My companion said to me: "I know what I would do if I were in charge: I would seize every automobile I could get my hands on; I would ascertain from the directory the names of every dealer in high explosives in San Francisco; I would dispatch cars with demands for supplies of dynamite on hand and information about men capable of handling it; and I would be fighting this fire with dynamite inside a half hour."

I do not know the exact time that elapsed between the breaking out of the fire and the first dynamite explosion, but I believe it to have been between two and three hours. During this time the fire acquired enormous headway, and even when the explosions began to come, they were infrequent and desultory. There was no drastic dynamiting. No attempt was made at any time during the fire to my knowledge to cleave a straight line through the city by dynamiting. The fire, on the whole, burned very slowly. For example, the Call building burned at about ten o'clock Wednesday morning, the Bohemian Club, one block west and one block north, did not burn till late Wednesday night; the Fairmont Hotel did not burn till Thursday afternoon. It is four blocks north and three blocks west of the site of the Bohemian Club. The flames did not reach Russian Hill, six or seven blocks north of the Fairmont, till about nine o'clock Thursday night. At that time they crossed Vallejo Street five blocks at once. They did not reach Telegraph Hill, six blocks north of Vallejo, till six or seven o'clock Friday morning, and they did not reach the waterfront on the north end of the peninsula until Friday night late. All this time a desultory contest against the flame was kept up. The method was to destroy by dynamite buildings in the immediate path of the flames. This method (to the layman; I profess no special knowledge) seems to be open to the gravest objection—certainly it was not justified by results. It was early clear that the flames were advancing against the wind and in spite of all efforts of the dynamiters. That was clear Wednesday: it was clear Thursday: it was clear Friday. Why was not some other method adopted? Why did not the effective force retire to a point two or three blocks from the flames' path, and destroy a solid block or half block (to the alley)? It is the almost universal belief of every person who saw the fire as a whole that such a course would have been effective.

As I say, at nine o'clock Thursday night, the flames crossed Vallejo Street in a sheet five blocks wide. At this time, I know to my certain knowledge that not a single attempt was being made in that section to stay the progress of the fire. I stood at the time on the top of Russian Hill looking directly down this street, which, as the map shows, runs due east and west. The wind was not blowing strongly from the north. No brands were being carried into the unburned district. It was so light that had a single man been fighting the fire along that street he could distinctly have been seen. At first, it seemed as if the flames would not cross the street. But the mere heat was so great, though on both sides the houses were two story and wooden, that gradually the fronts began to smoke and finally there came little flickers of fire. It is my profound belief that men with wet blankets established at windows and doors on the north side of Vallejo street and on the roofs of the buildings could absolutely have stopped the fire at this point and saved a hundred blocks. But there was no one there.

It is true that I speak as a layman. But I speak as a layman with some experience. On Friday I endeavored to save a wooden house, one of a row of wooden houses that were separated from buildings on fire by an alley not more than twelve feet wide. Protecting these houses, and running along the alley on its north side, was a board fence. For one hour I kept the flames from this fence, single-banded, with only a bathtub full of water, a pail and a dipper, and the house was only finally burned through the fact that firemen who were supposed to be protecting the block from another direction suffered the uncoupling of their hose, and were not able to get it together again when it was too late. I know that a man with a wet blanket can prevent a fire from crossing a street against a strong wind from low wooden houses on one side to low wooden houses on the other, and I can conceive no reason why the fire should, had matters been properly handled, have crossed Vallejo Street.

The trouble is, a city is too vast an organism. Dependent, in ordinary circumstances, upon special organizations such as firemen and police, for special services, it finds itself in such emergencies as lately faced San Francisco entirely helpless. What happens when a small town is threatened by fire? Every male inhabitant turns out to fight it. What happened in San Francisco? What was everybody's business was nobody's business, and a little handful of firemen were left to fight it alone.

And in this I conceive to lie the fault of General Funston. On this strip of fire between Russian and Telegraph Hills on Thursday night of the fire were not more than thirty men—soldiers and firemen. It was within his power to impress into service five hundred or a thousand men. And five hundred or a thousand men would, even by the primitive methods of bucket brigades and wet blankets, have stopped the advance of the fire against the wind, at this point as doubtless at many others. The men who saved the house of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson with blanket and bucket know very well and will testify that had their number been multiplied a hundredfold they could have saved untold thousands in property values. When the fire was at Vallejo street, the bay, with an inexhaustible supply of water, lay only a comparatively short distance away. There were horses and wagons that might draw water in casks and barrels to be impressed into service. On Telegraph Hill alone there were 500 or 600 able-bodied men that lay there idly all Thursday night, who might have been made to work like fiends at the point of the rifle.

The few houses that were saved in this section of the city were saved by such methods—as those I have outlined. The house of Livingston Jenks stands on the edge of Russian Hill. He is a millionaire and a foremost citizen of San Francisco. At eight o'clock Thursday night I saw him upon the roof of his stately residence, dipper and bucket in hand. He had nailed cleats all along the roof to facilitate his climbing up and down, and there alone he faced the fire, a picture of courage and determination.

His house stands, and so do those of others on the hill. This was the work of a few individuals, and it would not have sufficed had their houses been on the level with the rest. But had there been hundreds of men laboring in the same way, many a block would now be standing which is now in ashes.

Look at the achievements on Telegraph Hill. It is a colony of Italians, many of whom have interests in vineyards. In the vicinity, and in the cellars of houses, was stored a great quantity of raw new red wine. What did these men do? Why, they rolled from their cellars barrels of this wine, and distributed them along the street in front of their houses—wooden houses. They saturated blankets, and tablecloths, and bedspreads and everything of the sort with the wine and hung them over the fronts of the houses from windows and from the roof. I was there. With an ax I broke in the heads of the barrels and carried the wine in buckets. And what was the result? Those houses stand. They are among the half a hundred structures that are intact east of Van Ness Avenue and north of Market Street.

On Friday morning, about seven o'clock, I should say, there was a remarkable chance to stop the fire which had then advanced from Vallejo some five or six blocks. Instead of remaining a solid front of flame, the center had advanced more rapidly than either end, with the result that the fire line now formed a V, the east wing of which was climbing Telegraph Hill, the west wing of which was advancing toward the north slope of Russian. The opportunity lay in the fact that the slopes of both these hills are not entirely covered with houses, and that the solid wall of flame had, through lack of fuel, become a series of isolated fires.

There were at this time two lines of hose drawing water from the bay. The engines were stationed at the north waterfront and pumping steadily; the hose ran up to the south ten or twelve blocks to the line of fire. Looking from the top of Telegraph Hill I saw the strategic value of the situation—saw that each fire might be put out separately; I thought that undoubtedly the fire would at this juncture be stopped.

I went down the hill to the west toward a place where I had seen firemen working. As I approached I was amazed to see the hose, its nozzle pointed up by means of a box and two bricks, playing uselessly into the middle of the street. The firemen, a group of only fifteen or twenty, had looted a grocery store, and with cheese and olives and canned goods and plenty of alcoholics to drink, were eating breakfast.

I remonstrated. "Well, if you had been dragging the hose around for two days," said the fellow who appeared to be in command, "and it hadn't done a damn bit of good, you'd be wanting some breakfast, too," and he fell again to his can of salmon.

Further along I came upon a squad of soldiers. They were just finishing two kegs of beer from a corner grocery. Meanwhile the fire was burning on toward perhaps sixty square blocks which it ultimately destroyed without a single hand lifted to stop it.

HENRY ANDERSON LAFLER.

San Francisco, June, 1906.

In detailing Major J. W. Littell, Quartermaster's Department, and Captain James A. Logan, Commissary Department, to accompany the Barnum and Bailey Circus in its tour through Virginia, West Virginia, and Ohio, to observe the methods employed by the show people in feeding and transporting men, animals, and supplies, Secretary Taft is following the examples set by three European governments. When the American circus was in Germany, Emperor William was struck with the system and expedition of the circus people in handling their great outfit and moving it from place to place. After the Kaiser had personally witnessed the circus strike camp and entrain its animals and large force of employees, he caused to be detailed from the general staff of his army three officers to travel with the circus so long as it remained in Germany to observe and make a report on its methods. Officers of the French and English armies were detailed on the same errand and for the same purpose. The circus carries 1,100 men and a huge quantity of impedimenta.

The Trol Homeopathic Hospital in Bedford was afire. A clinic was going on in the operating room. An operation was half done. Fire or no fire, it must be finished. The patient was removed to another room. The hall outside was blazing. Water was dripping from the ceiling. Umbrellas were held over the patient. The operation was completed, the surgeons working imperturbably, the nurses assisting imperturbably.

An invalid whose condition is causing anxiety is Lord Curzon, who married Miss Leiter, of Chicago. He has become a martyr to neuritis. He has consulted the best neurologists in London and Paris, has undergone the latest electric and massage treatment without obtaining the slightest relief. His physicians advise him to live in some dry and equable climate for a year, and to abandon society and politics. Curzon is unwilling to take their advice. His political future might be ruined if he should withdraw at the present juncture.

SAN FRANCISCO PURIFIED.

English Tourist Says the Calamity Was Due to Divine Vengeance on "California's Sodom."

A pharisaical English globe-trotter, who toured San Francisco with hands and eyes uplifted at the "unparalleled iniquities" of the stricken city, tells virtuous London, in the June Blackwood's, that the fire and earthquake were sent by Providence for the purification of the sinful metropolis. The writer's moral indignation is not matched by his moral courage, for he hides behind a single "J," which was doubtless what his police-guide, in the subjoined narrative, dubbed him. After an attempt to describe the overland journey, "J" records his first shock, which occurred when the Limited reached Salt Lake City. He writes:

"Here it was boarded by a bevy of young ladies. Thirty-four, all told, took places in the sleeper. We noticed this, for inquiry on the platform showed that it was a parcel of students returning to resume term at the Stanford College. The average age of these young ladies would probably have been seventeen,—that is, their ages varied from fifteen to twenty. But it was not until the next stop that our interest really became alive to the affairs of those school-girls. We skirted round the Great Salt Lake until we arrived at Ogden. Here another batch of university students boarded us. This bunch was composed of boys. They were of much the same age as the girls. The numbers were precisely the same; their destination was the same educational establishment; and it was evident that they joined the train by appointment. Even in this there is nothing. If the deportment of the mixed party during the day and the night that they were passengers on the Overland Limited had been the same as one would have expected from youths and maidens similarly circumstanced in this country, there would be little necessity to comment upon the incident. But from the moment that the train steamed out of Ogden until we boarded the ferry at Oakland, these children engaged in individual attentions which revealed a state of precocity totally foreign to our appreciation of the decorous and healthy relationship which may exist between very young persons of the opposite sexes. If such scenes as we witnessed in that public conveyance are typical of the results from mixed educational institutions, long may we, in this country, remain shrouded in our insular conservatism on the subject.

"It must not be inferred from the above observations that we witnessed anything beyond an unusual relaxation of decorum by the boys, and a want of modesty by their weaker companions. But it seemed to us a thoroughly unwholesome premise for the serious problem of life, that these children should be encouraged at this tender age to trifle with that subtle magnetism between the sexes which is the great mystery of our being, and against which even the armour welded by knowledge and experience of the world is so rarely proof. But although we did not know it then, yet in the saloons of that express train we had at Ogden first come in contact with the ruling atmosphere of the Capital of the West.

"As San Francisco opened out before us, it seemed a pyramid of tall buildings grouping round the marvelous 'Call' building and the much vaunted City Hall. Little did we think, as the panorama of this city of palaces of the West unfolded before us, that all this handiwork of men, in which they vested so much pride, would, a few months hence, in a few moments, be virtually destroyed by the irresistible machinery of the Almighty. You can fell a tree or destroy a building. Yes! But raze a city? No. It seems incredible: since the combined gun-weight of the Prussian siege-trains in months made but little impression on Paris. Yet San Francisco the beautiful, San Francisco the magnificent, San Francisco the California Sodom, was shaken and burnt out of all recognition in four-and-twenty hours. Such is the gamble that the dwellers in this 'city of the plain' were content to make with Providence.

"China Town was the main cesspool of the San Francisco now gutted and purified by the great conflagration of 1906. Heavily has the hand of an incalculable fate been placed upon this fair Californian city. But few will deny that it will not reap a lasting benefit from the greed of these purifying flames. China Town, relic of the 'forty-niners' at their basest ebb, sink and sewer of a city, tainted in every vein and vessel, relic of a former existence, nourished solely on the evil traditions of the past, is gone for ever. At least, the dock of miserable, iniquitous, and squalid architecture wedged in between Stockton and Sacramento streets has disappeared. The new City of the West will arise superior to this degraded elf. A new China Town may be built, a China Town that will be sanitary and safe. The maze of ramshackle tenements, lean-to joss-houses, audy brothels, and disgusting dives, have gone. The operation has been severe, but in a few years the dwellers in the City of the West will return thanks to Providence for the present pains they have endured under the operating-knife."

"J" evidently belongs to that salacious-minded class of tourists to whom a city's parks, art treasures and historical points are well enough if time permits, but who linger with reminiscent delight over memories of vice in many guises and sordidness in many mells. So to the Chief of Police he makes request that he be given an escort, and Captain M—— (Munchausen, probably) is assigned to the duty.

"He was here to show us over the jail before plunging us into the seething swirl of iniquity in the town outside. The anteroom of the detention-floor furnished a peculiar study. It was nine o'clock, and the business of the night was beginning. The various 'cell'-rooms open out from the anteroom, which is just a bare boarded room, with benches round the wall. When we arrived there were only three occupants of the anteroom—two men and a woman. Each in their way furnished admirable studies in human nature. Quite near the door was a young man sitting on a bench; his face was buried in his hands, and his back was convulsed with emotion. He was weeping like a child. Captain M—— suggested that he was a student who had been arrested in a street brawl. He had just realized the pain that his present circumstances would cause in his home on Nob Hill. But the last occupant of the anteroom presented a pathetic study. A tall, handsome woman, she stood aloof at the end of the room. Apart from her dress, her fine forehead and refined features showed that she did not belong to the ordinary criminal class. She looked at us haughtily as the turnkey let us out of the elevator, and then turned her face to the wall. Her proportions were magnificent and her profile was beautiful. It was evident from the pallor on her cheeks and the set expression of her lips that she felt the indignity of her position keenly; but she was too strong a personality to lose her self-control even in these trying circumstances. 'That,' said the detective, 'is a product of San Francisco. I will bet that on inquiry at the bureau we find that she is here on the suspicion of soliciting. Of course you are surprised. No, she has not been doing anything of the kind, but she has felt the magnetism of that peculiar lust for vice which is the canker in the heart of the aristocracy of this city. She is here because her husband is trying to save her. He has discovered that she is attending some vicious woman's club, and has had her charged in the hope that the indignity of the proceeding and the close proximity of real criminals may impress upon her the awful consequences of the life to which her debauched companions may bring her. Sordid! Of course it is; but it is far from uncommon. It is only we detectives who know the extent to which the opium habit has caught on amongst high-toned women in San Francisco. And the trouble is that the high-spirited and most adventurous women seem to succumb first.' We were aghast at the bare thought of such a possibility, and inadvertently our thoughts went back to the parcel of schoolgirls we had met on the Overland Limited."

"J" is next solemnly assured that six Chinamen, petty criminals probably, who were engaged in a game of cards, were to suffer death in a few days. There have never been six men hanged in California in one day, and condemned prisoners are invariably segregated. But "J" believed it all.

"Four criminals, all of the same brutal type, were lodged in the next cell. As we drew near they jeered and spat at us. 'Keep clear, you sons of ———', snarled one, 'or you will get lousy!' Such was the type of salutations we received from these base ruffians, who even now, we hope, are expiating their sins to the profit of Uncle Sam.

"Captain M—— looked at his watch. 'China Town should now be in full swing,' he said, as the elevator took us back to the basement. Our first call was in one of the opium-dives in the basement of the rickety structure known as the 'old Palace Hotel.' With the aid of matches that we struck we penetrated into the cellar, where one of the most noted dens was situated. As the detective pushed the door open, the indescribable aroma of the burning drug almost nauseated us. The creaking door was pushed back, and we penetrated into an atmosphere which reeked of the narcotic. It was a filthy miserable hovel. There were perhaps half a dozen bunks. Each was occupied, and of the half-dozen decadents only two could move their hands to tend their light or prick their pipes. In vain our friend tried to awaken the old 'Chink' to whom the dive belonged. He opened his heavy drug-besodden eyes, but that was all. He lay back an inert log, with his head against the body of a black cat, which, having acquired the habit in this environment, was as comatose as its master. And to think that fair, dignified, educated women of our kind have acquired this habit! Think of the degrading possibilities! The squalor of it all!

"We passed through half a dozen such dives, and then made our way to haunts of female vice. The first series were Chinese, each furnished with a little grille above the entrance from which passersby could be solicited. It was degrading of its kind, but, in its Oriental colouring, respectable in comparison with the scenes which followed. We had no knowledge that human beings of European nurture could sink so low in the depravity of vice, or that a civilized community could tolerate in its midst such a miserable centre of filthy traffic as existed, until the timely earthquake, in the heart of San Francisco. We have seen the 'Yoshiwara' district in Tokio, have wandered through most of the large seaport towns of the world, but have never witnessed a parallel with that human market in China Town. There are streets and streets of tiny cubicles, each of which contains a woman whose existence is a degradation of the laws of nature, and an outrage against civilization. The brief survey that we had of this shameful spectacle was sufficient to cause us to turn with relief to the less sordid slums of the Chinaman's location."

After a description of the stock-sights of the quarter, our innocent English visitor, who is in the confidence of Providence, tells us that the white man has haunts of vice hardly less depraved, and that divine destruction of the city was inevitable. But as the largest wholesale whisky dealer in San Francisco—whose warehouse was in the heart of the burnt district—did not lose a pint of alcohol, and nine-tenths of the houses of worship were destroyed, "J" must confess that truly does the Almighty work in divers ways His vengeance to perform.

"We have finished with China Town, and an outraged but long-forbearing Providence has also finished with this disease-centre of the West. But we have not finished with San Francisco. All that is depraved, sordid, and vile in that fair city is not confined to China Town. Before we returned to our quarters in the old Occidental Hotel—alas! destroyed with the rest—our mentor took us to one of the many brilliant haunts of the white man in which the city abounds. It must be nameless, for it is a house to which San Francisco was wont to bring its wife—even, sad be it said, its daughter,—to sup. Yet, in its way, the atmosphere of this brilliant eating-house was as depraved, as sordid, as the street terrors in China Town from which we had fled in horror. There was little in that restaurant, from the copies of high art pictures upon the walls to the ornaments on the counter, that were not devised by the evil-minded directorate to act as stimulants to vice. Yet such is the atmosphere of San Francisco that we were conducted to this refined sink of the most positive iniquity by a member of that public body whose duty it should have been to have rooted out all this depravity.

"But there had to be an end to such things. The big clock on the ferry building, as the traveler of today arrives from Oakland, tells the hour when that end came. Its hands point to thirteen minutes past five. The mechanism of this clock was disorganized by the first shocks of the earthquake, on the morning of April 18 last, and for a month it has stood above the city of ashes that was San Francisco, as a monument testifying to the hour in which Providence itself saw fit to intervene for the purification of a city that had haunted its unparalleled iniquities for nearly sixty years."

The Bell Boy's Philosophy.

If yesterday would come tomorrow
There wouldn't hardly be no sorrow.

For then we'd have another try
At chances that we let go by.

Instead of givin' luck the blame
We'd grab the good things when they came.

We'd take the best and leave the worst
If all the days came hind-end first.

The fools that stand and wonder now
Would know just when to act and how.

If yesterday would come agen
We'd not say 'if' so often then.

We'd turn the merry face to sorrow
If yesterday would come tomorrow.

I'll Never Take a Rebate.

"I'll never take a rebate; no!"
Said little Thomas Greed.

"The courts are getting funny, so
It must be wrong, indeed.

"Now, there is Jerry Octopus,
He thinks a rebate great—
He always makes an awful fuss
If he must pay for freight.

"The prosecutor's after him;
The sheriff has a writ,
And Jerry, in the twilight dim,
From home was forced to flit.

"I would not take a rebate!—Why,
It is against the law.
I would not play a trick—not I;
I'd have no 'man of straw'.

"I'll never take a rebate; no;
I'm very sure of that.
But there is more than one way, though,
By which to kill a cat."

VANITY FAIR.

The Vassarian, the annual class book of Vassar College, has just been published and it did not escape the censorship of the faculty. The spirit which some of the girls call downright prudery shows itself in the illustrations of college dramatics. All pictures for the Vassarian have to be submitted to the faculty censorship and if a girl appears in man's attire in a photograph that part of the picture below the knees is blotted with ink before it is allowed to go into the book. Inez Milholland's impersonation of Romeo in the outdoor Shakespearean production last week was the crowning event of the theatrical season at Vassar. Through the addition of the faculty's ink decorations the figures in the picture appear to be floating through an everyday environment of tables and chairs.

The most aristocratic journal ever produced in England will be The Throne, which is to make its appearance in London this month. It is to be more like an album of beautiful pictures than a society journal, and it has the most influential backing. Queen Alexandra has consented to contribute to the first number, which is in itself a very unusual honor, and nearly every duchess, American and English, will do something for the production. The Throne will not be found on any of the ordinary bookstalls. It will be privately subscribed for, at the rate of $16 a year. The promoters may make it a weekly or a fortnightly edition. A feature of the journal will be the reproduction in color by a new process of some of the famous pictures in English country houses. Mrs. Arthur Paget, who was Miss Mary Stevens, daughter of Mrs. Paran Stevens, of New York, has consented to look after the American news, and Mrs. Hwa Williams, the best dressed woman in London, is to look after the fashion department.

Mrs. E. H. Conger, wife of the ex-Minister to China, has just completed a residence upon the Pacific Coast. Shortly before the Congers left Peking Mrs. Conger's attention fell upon a beautiful rug which she longed to bring back to her American home. The price of $90 which the celestial merchant placed upon it was declared by Minister Conger to be outrageous. Mrs. Conger was insistent, and the rug was brought away from the Orient. Shortly after reaching America Mrs. Conger was visiting in Chicago, where she exhibited the rug. Experts made an examination, and she almost fainted away when a Chicago citizen offered her $7000 for the rug. Mrs. Conger accepted the offer, and the new house in California is built out of the money.

Mrs. Shonts, wife of Theodore Perry Shonts, of Panama Canal fame, has taken over to London her two daughters, extremely pretty girls, who have just finished their education in Paris. They were presented by Mrs. Whitelaw Reid at court last week. Their mother is about to give several dinners for them under the tutelage of Mrs. George West, who met the family in Paris.

We are inclined to be a little too conceited about our English hotels, says a writer in the London Chronicle. The travel editor of the Queen has been looking through Baedeker's "Great Britain" (1906). Baedeker turns a Continentally cold, calm eye on our hotels, and out of ninety mentioned, he "stars" only eighteen as especially good of their class in London. But of fifty hotels in the Montreux district of Switzerland thirty have achieved the mark of excellence. Is the editor of Baedeker's "Switzerland" less critical than the editor of the "Great Britain"? Or are the Swiss hotels really better "of their class" than our own? At any rate, one may be sure that the Swiss takes his hotel-keeping as a serious profession. This writer lunched not long ago with the manager of a London hotel and restaurant (starred). On an instant he was introduced to the waiter—"My son," said the manager. The waiter was twenty-two years of age. He was born in Switzerland, and had two languages to begin with—French and Italian. He had his schooling in German, and he spoke excellent English. He had been through the kitchen, could poise a half-dozen of ill-assorted dishes on one palm, and will certainly before many years have passed be awarded the Star of Baedeker; for he will be a manager who has seen the whole business. Is there an English waiter who has risen to the management of a "starred" Swiss hotel? Yet one has found English inns—buried in the heart of the country—that are "especially" good of their class, though this is not the place for their advertisement. They may lack the bath-room adjacent to the bedroom. This writer could add many stars to English inn-keepers, if he had the authority of Baedeker. But the star would be bestowed for the engaging personality of the landlord, who is seldom a glorified waiter.

The prediction of the Countess of Aberdeen made at the International Council of Women in Paris recently that the French woman will be the first to obtain the vote upon any large scale may well have caused surprise among the British, German and American delegates. American writers upon "the woman question" have often fallen back upon two absurdities: the first, that Tacitus described the Germans whom the Romans fought as paying special deference to their women; the second, that "the French have no word for home." Add to this the misapprehensions of a five-weeks' tripper "seeing Paris by night" and a hasty observation on the Salic law and you have the genesis of an impression of the position of women in France which is as prevalent as it is preposterous. The fact is that Tacitus' observations would have applied quite as well to the Franks as to other early northern tribes; that the French get along very well without the word "home" so long as they have the thing; that French family life is at its best of almost ideal beauty, and that their sticking so long to the Salic law was one of the blunders of the Bourbons which does not in any case affect opinion of the republic. Since the Revolution in France many things have changed. For one thing, the waste of men in war has familiarized women with varied industry and with the management of estates and business establishments as in perhaps no other country. The French "family council" system retains for a woman not only the respect of her grown son but even a considerable measure of legal control over him long after English and American law would emancipate him. consent. In a hundred ways France is the He cannot even marry without his parents' country of the married woman. That young girls are still carefully watched and secluded is of minor importance. The system works not badly. There may even be lands where daughters have too much freedom and power for their own good and where mothers are too meek. The growth of "feminism" in France of recent years has been rapid. It compelled the institution of a divorce law. American woman suffragists were for years divided into two bitterly hostile factions on the question whether to work with the public in the several States or to appeal direct to Congress. The French feminist adopts the latter course without hesitation. According to the Countess of Aberdeen, she has commenced by trying to convince the legislator instead of the public.

From a gastronomic point of view New Yorkers are generous spenders, says a New York correspondent. The restaurant returns clearly indicate this. "I am quite certain that the majority of the well-off, perhaps, I ought to say of the rich, men of New York who breakfast, lunch and dine in restaurants almost the year around spend at least $50 a week for food and drink alone," was the assertion of a man who for a time was employed in one of the large hotels of the city. "My summary includes unattached men who live in clubs, apartments and hotels and family men who seldom take anything more than a light breakfast in their own homes, the other members of their families sometimes joining them for a dinner at a restaurant. The amount I quote, however, is what I believe these men spend for food for themselves alone." Another manager of a Fifth Avenue eating emporium figured it out that the rich New Yorker spends about $10 a day for food and drink: "Fine wines, taken with lunch," continued this man, "will increase this sum considerably. The wine bill alone of many a diner is $5, and his total weekly expenditures nearer $100 than $50. The figures I have given strike an average merely. Yes, take it all in all, the rich New Yorker is about the most extravagant spender I come in contact with, although visitors from all over the United States with money to spend patronize the restaurants liberally when they strike New York."

The new Cunarder Lusitania, the largest, longest, and fastest passenger boat ever constructed, was launched at Clydebank, England, on the 7th inst. Not only is the new ocean express eighty feet longer than any vessel now afloat; not only is she to be more luxuriously fitted than any of her rivals, but, most important of all, her calculated speed is to be twenty-four to twenty-five knots an hour (say, twenty-seven to twenty-nine statute miles). The Lusitania must develop 68,000 horse-power to give the necessary speed. And does one realize that such a ship carries the population of a fair-sized town? One thousand three hundred third, 500 second and 550 first class passengers, in addition to a crew of about 800, seems a large number of people to crowd into one steel hull, yet when one looks over the open spaces of her great decks one will wonder where in the world they all are.

Electric elevators from one deck to another, telephones, catering such as no hotel can surpass—these things are a matter of course.

Among San Francisco's musicians are many who are known across the country. Some of these lost their studios, some their homes, and many organists lost their instruments and churches. Almost all of the business of the profession is swept away for the time being. Among the larger organs destroyed were those at St. Ignatius Catholic (76 stops), Grace Church (47 stops), St. Mary's Catholic, First Congregational (40 stops) and St. Luke's large new organ. The St. Ignatius organ was the largest west of Chicago, unless excelled by additions made to the Mormon organ.

In their ragged regimentals,
Stood the old Continentals,
Yielding not,
When the grenadiers were lunging,
And like hail fell the plunging
Cannon shot;
When the files
Of the isles,
From the smoky night encampment,
Bore the banner of the rampant
Unicorn
And grummer, grummer, grummer,
Roll'd the roll of the drummer,
Through the morn!
Then with eyes to the front all,
And with guns horizontal,
Stood our sires;
And the halls whistled deadly
And in streams flashing redly
Blazed the fires;
As the roar
On the shore
Swept the strong battle-breakers
O'er the green-sodded acres
Of the plain;
And louder, louder, louder
Crack'd the black gunpowder,
Crack'd again!
Now like smiths at their forges
Work'd the red St. George's Cannoneers,
And the "villainous saltpetre"
Rang a fierce discordant metre
Round their ears;
As the swift
Storm-drift
With hot sweeping anger,
Came the horseguards' clangor
On our flanks;
Then higher, higher, higher,
Burn'd the old-fashioned fire
Through the ranks!
Then the old-fashion'd Colonel
Gallop'd through the white infernal
Powder-cloud;
And his broad sword was swinging,
And his brazen throat was ringing
Trumpet loud.
Then the blue
Bullets flew,
And the trooper jackets redden
At the touch of the leaden
Rifle-breath;
And rounder, rounder, rounder,
Roar'd the iron six-pounder,
Hurling death!

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A man accompanied by his wife visited a merchant tailor to order a suit of clothes. The couple differed as to the material and the manner of making and the wife lost her temper. "Oh, well," she said, turning away, "please yourself; I suppose you are the one who will wear the clothes." "Well," observed the husband meekly, "I didn't suppose you'd want to wear the coat and waist-coat."

Marion Crawford recently gave a dinner in Rome and during the dinner the talk turned on Venice.

"There is a young woman from Duluth," Mr. Crawford said, "whom I met one bright October morning in Sorrento. She told me that she was touring Italy with her father. She said her father had liked all the Italian cities, but especially he had liked Venice."

"Ah, Venice, to be sure," said I. "I can readily understand that your father would prefer Venice, with its gondolas and St. Mark's and Michael Angelos—"

"Oh, no," said the young lady; "it wasn't that. But he could sit in the hotel, you know, and fish out of the window."

The manager of a manufacturing firm was watching a truckman tugging at a heavy case. The man's face was red, and the muscles of his neck were standing out. The manager thought it was the right moment to offer practical assistance.

"Wait a minute, there," he said. "Let me show you how easy things become when you use a little brains with your muscle."

He took up a hook, stuck it into the case, gave a pull, and went sprawling into the gutter. He got up, looked at the hook and said:

"Confound it! The handle comes off."

"Yes, sir," said the truckman. "My brains told me that, and I didn't use it."

A Pike county girl married a guide, and the day after the wedding the guide took out a life policy for $1500. Then, with his wife, he started for Porter's Lake with a party of sportsmen, the wife to cook and wash dishes, the man to clean fish and so on. Unfortunately the young guide was bitten by a rattlesnake one morning, and a few days afterward he died. The widow notified her family and friends of his death in a note that said: "Bill parst away yistidy. Loss fully covered by insurance."

W. H. Pigg, who has started an elk ranch at Freshwater, Colo., was showing his herd of elk to a party of Eastern capitalists.

"I am sure you will succeed in this venture, Pigg," said a brother. "You are a persevering man, and perseverance always brings success."

Mr. Pigg laughed.

"I am persevering," he admitted, "and I believe in perseverance. At the same time I don't rate it as high, sir, as you do. Perseverance without intelligence is nothing. A hen can sit on a china egg, but there will be no result."

In Mitchell vs. Com., 106 Ky., 602, the jury rendered the following verdict: "Wee the jury agree and find the defendant guilty as charged in the indite and sess his fined at 100 dollars. Isaa Clouse." On objection to this as no verdict, the court said: "We think it expresses—though only phoretically—the intention of the jury so that no one could be mistaken in regard to it." The ruling was evidently based on Lewis Carroll's maxim: "Take care of the sounds and the sense will take care of itself."

A merry party being gathered in a city that made such a racket that the occupant of a neighboring apartment sent his servant down with a polite message asking if it would be possible for the party to make less noise, since, as the servant announced, "Mr. Smith says that he cannot read."

"I am very sorry for Mr. Smith," replied the host. "Please present my compliments to your master, say that I am sorry he cannot read, and tell him I could when I was 4 years old!"

It is not necessary that a lawyer should go to win verdicts, but he must have the tact which turns an apparent defeat to his own advantage. One of the most successful of verdict winners was Sir James Scarlett. His skill in turning a failure into a success was wonderful. In a breach-of-promise case the defendant, Scarlett's client, was alleged to have been scarlet into an engagement by the plaintiff's mother. She was a witness in behalf of her daughter, and completely baffled Scarlett, who cross-examined her. But in his argument he exhibited his tact by this happy stroke of advocacy: "You saw, gentlemen of the jury, that I was but a child in her hands. What must my client have been?"

An amusing story is told of Mr. (now Count) Witte's acumen. Zubatoff, the agent provocateur of the police, asked Father Gapon to write a certain report for presentation to Mr. Witte, about labor organizations, and as if emanating from the men themselves. Father Gapon, with the aim of making a tool of Zubatoff, agreed, wrote the report, and a delegation of the workmen presented it to Mr. Witte. The latter read the report through, then calmly asked: "Did you write this, gentlemen?" "Yes," they answered. "Then you ought to become journalists," Mr. Witte replied; and with these words he dismissed them.

Herbert Tate-Willis, the well-known authority on bridge, plays badly if there are too many onlookers about.

"As some people dislike any one to look over their shoulders while they are writing letters," he said recently, "so I dislike to have any one look over my shoulders while I am playing bridge."

"Two gentlemen were playing one night at a club to which I belong. While they played two other gentlemen entered the room. These latter two took their positions, each behind a player's chair, and, blowing cigar smoke into the players' ears, and breathing on the backs of their necks, they nodded sagely, or frowned, or whispered advice, as they deemed best. The pleasant game, in short, was quite spoiled."

"Finally one of the players rose."

"Would you mind playing this hand a minute or two for me?" he said, turning to the man behind him.

"Why no; not at all," the man replied, and he took the cards, and the first player left the room.

"Some little time went by and then the second player turned to the man behind him."

"Play these cards for me a moment; there's a good fellow," he said, rising hastily.

"Sure, old man," was the reply, and the second player left the room.

"The substitutes played out their hands and had a new deal. They played out their hands again, and had another deal. They could not imagine what had become of the two men for whom they were substituting."

"A waiter entered the room, and one of the substitutes said:

"Waiter, where are Mr. A. and Mr. B., do you know?"

"Yes, sir," the waiter answered. "They're playing in the next room, sir."

"There is a well-known English bishop who writes a very bad hand. This bad hand caused a sad error to happen some years ago."

"A young clergyman had written to the bishop to inquire about a vacant curacy, and the reply that the young man got informed him that the salary was small and the work difficult. But there was one mitigating circumstance. The incumbent, among his other duties, would visit the earl every morning and spend two hours there."

The curate would have rejected the post but for the daily visit to the earl. That attracted him. There would, no doubt, he told himself, be many fashionable dinners, to which he would naturally be invited. He would make many friends among the rich and powerful. These friends would be able to help him in his career. The earl, perhaps, had daughters. One of them—who knows?—stranger things had happened.

"And so the curate accepted the difficult and poorly paid curacy, to discover, on his first visit to the town, that he had misread the bishop's letter, and that his daily two hours' visit was not to the earl, but to the jail."

PATRIOTIC VERSE.

The Flag Goes By.

Hats off!

Along the street there comes
A blare of bugles, a ruffle of drums,
A flash of color beneath the sky;
Hats off!
The flag is passing by!

Blue and crimson and white it shines,
Over the steel-tipped, ordered lines,
Hats off!
The colors before us fly;
But more than the flag is passing by.

Sea-fights and land-fights, grim and great,
Fought to make and save the State;
Weary marches and smelting ships;
Cheers of victory on dying lips;

Days of plenty and years of peace;
March of a strong land's swift increase;
Equal justice, right and law;
Stately honor and reverend awe;

Sign of a nation, great and strong
To ward her people from foreign wrong;
Pride and glory and honor,—all
Live in the colors to stand or fall.

Hats off!

Along the street there comes
A blare of bugles, a ruffle of drums;
And loyal hearts are beating high;
Hats off!
The flag is passing by!

Reveille.

The morning is cheery, my boys, arouse!
The dew shines bright on the chestnut boughs,
And the sleepy mist on the river lies,
Though the east is flushing with crimson dyes.
Awake! awake! awake!
O'er field and wood and brake,
With glories newly born,
Comes on the blushing morn,
Awake! awake!

You have dreamed of your homes and friends at night;
You have basked in your sweetheart's smiles so bright;
Come, part with them all for awhile again,—
Turn out! turn out! turn out!
You have dreamed full long I know.
Turn out! turn out! turn out!
The east is all aglow.
Turn out! turn out!

From every valley and hill there come
The clamoring voices of life and drum;
And out in the fresh, cool morning air
The soldiers are swarming everywhere.
Fall in! fall in! fall in!
Every man in his place,
Fall in! fall in! fall in!
Each with a cheerful face,
Fall in! fall in!

Michael O'Connor.

Cavalry Song.

Our good steeds snuff the morning air,
Our pulses with their purpose tingle;
The foeman's fires are twinkling there;
He leaps to hear our sabres jingle!
HALT!
Each carbine sends its whizzing ball;
Now, cling! clang! forward all,
Into the fight!

Dash on beneath the smoking dome:
Through level lightnings gallop nearer!
One look to heaven! No thoughts of home;
The guldons that we bear are dearer.
CHARGE!
Cling! clang! forward all!
Heaven help those whose horses fall!
Cut left and right!

They flee before our fierce attack!
They fall! they spread in broken surges!
Now comrades, bear our wounded back,
And leave the foeman to his dirges.

WHEEL!

The bugles sound the swift recall:
Cling! clang! backward all!
Home and good-night!

Edmund Clarence Stedman.

Warren's Address.

Stand! the ground's your own, my braves!
Will ye give it up to slaves?
Will ye look for greener graves?
Hope ye mercy still?
What's the mercy despots feel?
Hear it in that battle-peal!
Read it on yon bristling steel!

Ask it,—ye who will,
Fear ye foes who kill for hire?
Will ye to your homes retire?
Look behind you!—they're afire!
And before you, see
Who have done it! From the vale
On they come!—And will ye quail?
Lead on! Lead on! Lead on!
Let their welcome be!

In the God of battles trust!
Die we may,—and die we must;
But, oh where can dust to dust
Be consigned so well?
As where Heaven its dews shall shed
On the martyr's patriot's bed,
And the rocks shall raise their head
Of his deeds to tell?

LITERARY NOTES.

Burgess' Tribute to Garnett.

In a recent number of the Boston Transcript, Gelett Burgess had a two-column appreciation concerning his friend Porter Garnett. Mr. Burgess's article was post-seismic and supposed to be post-obituary, for he evidently believed that his friend Garnett had perished by the earthquake shock. As a matter of fact Mr. Garnett was somewhat seriously injured by a fragment of wall falling on him, but fortunately, as his friends will be glad to know, he completely recovered. Concerning his friend, Mr. Burgess wrote at length, incidentally saying of him: "Curiously enough one of his chief tours de force was a description of a fire in San Francisco, and he himself was one of the first to suffer in the recent disaster. Mr. Garnett was a purist, even an eccentric in his devoted adherence to diction. He used to assert that the double possessive was fully as bad English as the double negative. His 'Essay on Style,' while not, to ordinary view, notably unrheterical, contained over ninety errors in grammar, syntax and usage."

"Garnett discovered Coppa's restaurant, and gained Joe's consent to a new scheme of decoration. With the assistance of the artists of the Quarter the walls were covered with cartoons and sketches. What was lacking in decoration and in art was made up for by a bizarre and esoteric humor that was the perpetual despair of the Philistine and the Bromide. One saw at each table new-comers with questioning puzzled faces pointing to inscrutable legends in Esperanto, in Greek or Yiddish, and wondering at the enigmatic accompaniment of illustration. There was a sort of intellectual and artistic hash spread over the walls."

Mr. Burgess describes at length many unique facts about Coppa's and the Bohemian set which frequented it, closing by saying: "If the dispatches concerning Mr. Garnett be true, San Francisco's artistic fellowship will have suffered a severe loss."

As showing the financial punctilio which prevails among the members of the Lark Coterie, it is pleasing to be able to add that when Burgess discovered that Garnett was still in the land of the living, and that he had unwittingly but unwarrantedly sung Garnett's requiem, he did the handsome thing. He at once sent to Garnett the $25 check he had received for writing Garnett's obituary. This is as it should be. The money did not belong to the Transcript, for it got the story. It did not belong to Burgess, for he took it in exchange for what he mistakenly believed to be the truth. So it must have belonged to Garnett. The law has decided that a man owns his own body, to the extent even of bequeathing it after his death. So by parity of reasoning a living man is fairly entitled to the price of his own obituary.

Dr. Oanziger's Manuscripts.

1131 O'Farrell Street, San Francisco, June 24th, 1906.

Jerome Hart Esq., Dear Sir: I note what you say in the current issue of the Argonaut relative to the destruction of the Argonaut library and that of my friend Mr. George Hamlin Fitch, literary editor of the Chronicle. I note it with a keen pang, for I myself lost not only my library covering much of the literatures of the ancients and moderns, but in that fearful disaster I lost my manuscripts, the work of over eighteen years of tireless activity. Among those manuscripts was a companion piece of my book "Jewish Forerunners of Christianity," published by John Murray, London and Dutton, New York. "A Dictionary of Words and Phrases from Oriental Tongues as compared with Anglo-Saxon." Four unpublished novels; a Hebrew grammar; a Latin phrase book and over 6,000 folio pages of translations from Semitic literatures—not to mention the thousands of annotated letters from savants and literary men in Europe and America. My home was on Geary near Van Ness avenue, and probably the last of the dwellings to be destroyed. Had I been in the city at the time I would have attempted to save my manuscripts at the risk of my life, for these works constituted the sum and substance of the years of striving in San Francisco, from the time I arrived here, unable to speak a word in the English tongue, until I went into government service as a consular officer to Madrid, Spain. My heart goes out in pity to all men who like myself have suffered irreparable loss, the magnitude of which is beyond the grasp of the Philistine's mind. But more sustained in the Argonaut literary repository. Where in California or elsewhere could one find the rich and rare tone, the uniqueness of form, the variety of style and the uniformity of good taste that entered into the make-up of that matchless old periodical? It has had contributors and collaborators whose glory will not fade as long as good English shall find appreciation. Its character, from a purely editorial point of view, regardless of the merits of the points under discussion, and even disagreeing with its position, was always of a nature to command respect, stimulate thought and awaken the best reasoning in the reader. To its files, literary men, my humble self included, went as to a never ceasing well of pleasure and suggestion. I was a constant reader of the Argonaut and looked for it in every part of Europe as for a friend whose salute is ever sweet, ever full of information, suggestion and encouragement, and I assure you, sir, that the sight of the Argonaut, though in somewhat changed physical form, was a very pleasing one to me.

Let me hope that you will prosper and rebuild that splendid Repository not as full, not as splendid, not as venerable perhaps as it was, but as brilliant and beneficent as it was in former years.

Very sincerely yours,

Dr. Adolphe Danziger.

President Jordan's Poem.

Dr. David Starr Jordan has the following poem, entitled "A Castle in Spain," in a recent issue of the New York Independent:

I know a castle in the heart of Spain,
Built of stone, as if to stand for aye,
With tile roof red against the azure sky—

For skies are bluest in the Heart of Spain.

So fair a castle men build not again.
'Neath its broad arches, in its courtyard fair,

And through its cloisters—open everywhere—

I wander as I will, in sun or rain.
Its inmost secrets unto me are known,
For mine the castle is. Nor mine alone:

'Tis thine, dear heart, to have and hold
and thine;

'Tis all the world's, likewise, as mine
and thine;

For whose passes through its gates shall say,

"I dwell within this castle: it is mine!"

"The Jungle" is being dramatized and will be produced in Chicago in September. The author says there will be scores of cattle and hogs (four-footed ones) in the company, and mentions, as a feature, the squeals of hundreds of pigs.

A report is current that the American magazine, for thirty years Leslie's Monthly, of which Ellery Sedgwick is the present editor, is to be sold to a syndicate composed of Ray Stannard Baker, Ida M. Tarbell, Lincoln Steffens and several other magazine writers.

A London review is authority for the statement that, although the books of the famous Polish novelist, Henryk Sienkiewicz, are widely popular, they have not brought him a fortune. "The Russian Empire has not yet adhered to the Berne convention, and Polish copyrights can therefore be violated with impunity."

The troubles that overshadowed De Musset in life appear to follow his fortunes still. A statue of him was to have been inaugurated recently at Neuilly-sur-Seine, but an embargo had been laid upon it, and the ceremony could not take place. It lies ignominiously in its case at the packers', under seizure for storage.

Winston Churchill—the English one—who already has one or more performances to his account which are records in their way, must now be credited with another. It seems that for his life of his father, Lord Randolph Churchill, the young member of parliament received from the Macmillans the biggest price ever paid for a work of this kind. He obtained $40,000 down, with the additional agreement that half the profits on the book should come to him after the publishers have pocketed $20,000 as their share. In other words, Churchill has been paid at the rate of $1.25 a line, or about twelve cents a word, and if the book sells as well as it is expected to do his words are likely to produce twice that amount.

"Vacation 1906," has been issued by the California Northwestern Railway.

This useful little book furnishes information to those who wish to stop at hotel or private home in some town, at a mineral resort, rustication on a farm, or enjoy that to the Californian. The California Northwestern traverses Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino, and Lake counties. One may live quite inexpensively in that favored section of the State, and those who lost their residences in the late catastrophe would do well to write to the Tiburon ferry for a copy of "Vacation 1906."

Hall Caine, we have always believed, is the Isle of Man's proudest possession. But a letter inscribed "Hall Caine, Esq., Isle of Man," has been returned to the sender as insufficiently addressed. And Mr. Caine is a local legislator, as well as a novelist. Two ardent schoolboys once addressed a letter to "Victor Hugo, The Ocean"; and it found the great man in one of the Channel islands.

One of the real literary lights of Los Angeles is H. W. Collins, proprietor of a queer little secondhand bookstore on South Main street, near Sixth. In his younger days Mr. Collins was manager of a bookstore in London, patronized by Tennyson and his contemporaries, who were wont to chat freely with the intelligent salesman, who knew the inside as well as the outside worth of a rare volume.

When Ibsen, in the spring of 1898, celebrated his seventieth birthday, a number of English admirers presented him with a large silver goblet. This gift, Mr. William Archer tells us in the June Monthly Review, gave him peculiar pleasure: It occupied a place of honor in his drawing room when I visited him in August of the same year. In his study, a bright corner room looking out upon the palace park I was somewhat surprised to notice, holding a very prominent position, a huge gilt-edged and brass-clasped family Bible. "You keep this close at hand," I said, pointing to it. "Oh, yes," he replied, "I often read in it for the sake of the language."

Seventeen of the rarest early English pro-Shakespearean plays have unexpectedly come to light in the library of an Irish gentleman. The plays are indeed of greater historical value than those of Shakespeare, for they mark the literary growth of England in its early stages, practically from its rise to the time of the great Elizabethan dramatist. Among them are at least four unrecorded editions, and they include the unique pre-Shakespearean comedy "Welth and Helth." The author of this play is unknown, and it is believed to be unique. It was entered on the Stationers' Books in 1577-8, but the copy bears no date, nor printers name. There is also a copy of the exceedingly rare original edition of George Wapull's "The Tyde Taryeth no Man, A Most pleasant and merry Commodity right pythle and full of delight," imprinted at London in Fleete Strete, by Hugh Jackson, 1576.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Puccini's Early Struggles.

In the course of a chat with an English interviewer, several weeks since, Puccini, the Italian composer, said that "Madame Butterfly" will be given under Conried's management, in this country. Puccini is now composing the score of an opera for which d'Annunzio has provided the libretto, speaking of his early struggles the composer said: "Le Villi, my first opera, was produced at Milan in 1884, and I received 2,000 francs for it. During the four months I spent in writing

I had lived on credit at a little restaurant called the Aida, in a slum in Milan. My dinner usually consisted of a piece of badly-cooked meat and a cup of more or less sour wine. I recall to this day the half-ashamed manner in which I used to tell the waiter to creak up the bill, and then sneak out of the place, because I had no money for a tip. When I was paid for 'Le Villi' I went to this restaurant and settled the bill, which amounted to 300 francs.

"The proprietor, having heard of the performance of the opera, told me that there was no necessity to pay the amount. 'Let it run on,' he said. But I was indignant with the man. 'I will pay it now,' I exclaimed, 'and I will never dine again under your roof, because you have made me feel my unfortunate position.' I suppose the manager to distrust me—and he may have had reason for so doing—but I always felt confident I should succeed, and although poor, I was proud of my name, and would not have cheated him for a sou.

"'Edgar,' my second opera, came out at La Scala in 1889, but the hook was not good. However, I received 12,000 francs for the music, and this money was very acceptable in those delightful days. I often wish I could go back to those old times—though just for precaution's sake I should desire to keep my present balance at the bank! It is not pleasant to be hard up, and sometimes I did not know where I could find a franc. I used to copy manuscripts for a small remuneration, but I had to give this up, because my writing was not clear. Then I played the piano at cafe concerts. Indeed, I did anything to keep myself alive. Only those who have been poor know how the poor exist."

Symphony Concerts at the University.

A series of six concerts has been announced by the University of California for the present summer. The University Orchestra, conducted by Dr. J. F. Wolfe, Professor of Music in the University, will give symphony concerts in the Greek Theater at half past three on the Thursday afternoons of June 28 and July 12, and 26. The Minetti String Quartette, consisting of Mr. Giulio Minetti, first violin; Mr. Hans Koenig, second violin; Mr. Andre Verdier, viola; and Mr. Arthur Weiss, cello, will give concerts of chamber music in the Greek Theater at half past three on the Thursday afternoons of July 5 and 19 and August 2. For the symphony concerts, admission will be one dollar or seventy-five cents; for the chamber music concerts, fifty cents or twenty-five cents.

Season ticket for the six concerts will cost, for a chair in the reserved section, within the diazoma, $3; for the unreserved section, $2. Subscriptions should be addressed to the office of the Regents, University of California, Berkeley.

These concerts are altogether public in character, and without any element of private profit. Remuneration is provided only for the musicians. Any surplus goes toward further musical undertakings at the University. The theater syndicate promises to make Los Angeles the dramatic center of the Pacific Coast, until San Francisco arises from its ashes. Contracts are already here for extended appearances of Richard Mansfield, Maude Adams in "Peter Pan," the Savage Grand Opera Company, the new production of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," the San Carlo opera company of Italy, John Drew, E. H. Sothern, Julia Arlowe, Lulu Glaser and a score of others.

Viola Allen will appear in the new theater during October in an elaborate production of "Cymbeline." E. S. Willard has secured the American rights for "Colonel Newcome," Michael Morton's dramatized version of Thackeray's "The Newcomes." The play was a disappointment at its first production in London several weeks ago.

A dramatized version of "Ramona" is to be given in the very place where the incidents of the novel are laid, Ramona of the play will depict the life of the real Ramona amid the scenes where the real Ramona lived out the story which formed the basis for the great novel. Among the actors will be several San Jacinto people who were models from whom Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson drew her characters.

Charles M. Schwab is said to be the financial supporter of Hammerstein's venture to build up the Manhattan Opera House as a rival to the Metropolitan. Schwab's impresario ambition is mainly the result of a reported grievance involving the absence of his name from the lists of boxholders at the Metropolitan Opera House. Hammerstein has tried to get Jean de Reszke, the Polish tenor as artistic director.

Eight months ago Lina Abarbanel, the German lyric soubrette, knew perhaps one or two scattering words of English. Today she is appearing as the prima donna in an English production, "The Student King," and she has mastered the language of the country with surprising proficiency. When Madame Modjeska made her first appearance in San Francisco, 30 years ago, in "Adrienne Lecouvreur," she had been studying English but four months.

Wilfred Clarke continues at the Orpheum this coming week with his leading lady, Theo Carew. Nita Allen and her company repeat their successful one-act comedy, "Car Two, State-room One." It is laid on the "Owl" train. Among the company is Dr. Frank Rodolph, who has taken the stage name of Frank Erwin. Cliff Gordon, "the German politician," will give a monologue. The brothers Damm, European acrobats, are muscular marvels. The Kaufmann troupe of bicyclists will continue their act, and Bert and Bertha Grant will change their songs and dances. Orpheum Motion Pictures will complete a great comedy program.

BURNED SILVERWARE MADE NEW

Like the magic touch of King Midas is the wonder-working skill of the silversmith at Hammersmith & Field's. Burned, blackened, bent treasures in silverware are there being restored to former design, polish and temper. A large array of silver victims of the late fire: tea pots, salvers, waiters, dishes and a punch bowl rim—apparently—hopeless wrecks, are in process of being restored to all their sparkling beauty and delicate tracery.

Citizens of San Francisco who have mournfully dragged from the ashes of their homes treasured bits of silver to keep as souvenirs will find a pleasant surprise in the miracles being wrought at the handsome new quarters of Hammersmith & Field, on Van Ness, corner of Eddy, just opposite the new "Tait's."

Next Sunday go to Byron Hot Springs.—You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the springs, and the entire expense of the trip is $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from railway station to hotel and return, a delightful ride of two and a half miles, accommodations at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel, and use of the wonderful mineral baths, all for $7.50. Try it.

Engagements and Weddings.

The engagement is announced of Mrs. Katherine Buck, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Buck and cousin of the late Mrs. Lewis Risdon Mead, to Captain James T. Bootes, U. S. M. C. Miss Buck will sail shortly, with friends, to the Orient, where Captain Bootes is stationed on the U. S. S. Wisconsin, and their wedding will take place either in Shanghai or Chefoo.

The engagement is announced of Miss Margaret Simpson, daughter of the Rev. Stephen Price Simpson of New York, to Mr. Foster Sturgess of San Francisco. The wedding will take place in New York in October.

The wedding of Miss Ruth Finette Miller, daughter of the late Major and Mrs. O. C. Miller, to Captain Louis Brechmier Jr., U. S. A., will take place today (Saturday) at Christ Church, Sausalito. The ceremony will be celebrated at high noon, the Rev. Mr. Maxwell, rector of the parish, officiating. Mrs. Clarence Percy Nicholson, the bride's sister, will be the matron of honor, Lieutenant Clarence Carrigan, U. S. A., will be the best man, and Captain Henry B. Clark, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Guy Manning, U. S. A., the ushers. A reception to about fifty guests will follow at the bride's home, "The Pines." Captain Brechmier and his bride will leave on their wedding journey, returning thence to Fort Baker, where they will be at home after August 1.

The wedding of Miss Marian Burness to Mr. William A. S. Foster took place on Wednesday, June 20, at the home of the groom's parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Foster, in San Rafael. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. William Alexander. Mr. Foster and his bride will make their home in Willits.

The wedding of Miss Margaret Foulke, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Morris Foulke, to Mr. Winthrop Howe Estabrook took place on Tuesday, June 19, at the home of the bride's parents at Gazelle, Siskiyou County.

The wedding of Miss Maude Muir, daughter of Mr. John Muir, to Mr. Thomas Hanna took place on Wednesday, June 20, at Martinez. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Stoddard. There were no attendants and only a few very intimate friends and relatives were present.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Scott have sold their house on the S. W. corner of Laguna and Clay streets. J. C. Wilson wished to buy it and had paid a deposit, but the check was returned and Washington Dodge, who is said to have paid in the neighborhood of $50,000 has become the owner of the property.

Mr. and Mrs. Horace L. Hill have sold their fine house on Sacramento and Laguna streets, to Henry Miller, the "Cattle King", for $125,000.

Mr. and Mrs. William K. Vanderhilt Jr. will spend the summer at the Marble House at Newport.

Mrs. William H. Crocker sailed on Tuesday last from New York for Europe, to be absent until the fall.

Fourth of July at Del Monte.

It is an odd sort of a season for all California resorts. That place which affords the most comfort and the most pleasure at the most reasonable rates is the place which is drawing San Franciscans. Many families have taken advantage of the opportunities offered at Hotel Del Monte, where all conditions are as usual in spite of disturbances elsewhere. In fact, a recent visit there shows that things are better than usual, for the hotel during the past year has been thoroughly renovated. The rooms in the main building as well as those in the large annexes, are now supplied with all modern equipment, including baths, electricity and telephones. New carpets, new paper and new furnishings add to the general effect and comfort which has ever made the hotel famous among all other resorts. And then there are the large park-like grounds and the sea, both close at hand, the golf links and the salmon fishing. Just at present, and likely to continue for several weeks, the salmon are running in Monterey Bay as never before, and ardent sports are getting all kinds of fish trophies. Over at the Presidio are many events, devised by army men, and Monterey and Pacific Grove offer a round of outside attractions. Special rates are made to families who desire to make Del Monte their home. It is just the place to spend the Fourth of July holidays. Special round trip rates. Parlor car direct to the hotel leaves Third and Townsend streets 3 p. m. daily.

Mrs. Henry A. Butters and Miss Marguerite Butters have closed their Piedmont home for the season and gone to their country place near Chico. Miss Frances Stewart left last week for Chicago where she will spend several months. Miss Stewart has been visiting in Piedmont since the fire.

Mr. Willis Davis and Miss Sidney Davis are staying at Independence Lake for a few weeks.

ARMY AND NAVY.

Rear Admiral Bowman H. McCalla, U. S. N., was retired on June 19th and was succeeded temporarily as commandant of the Mare Island Navy Yard by Captain Alexander McCracken, U. S. N., Captain of the Yard, until the arrival of Rear Admiral H. N. Lyon, U. S. N., detached from command of the naval station at Honolulu and ordered as permanent commandant at Mare Island.

Major General A. W. Greeley, U. S. A., and Mrs. Greeley, left on Thursday evening for a trip to Yosemite Valley and thence to Los Angeles and San Diego. They will be accompanied by Captain Frank L. Winn, U. S. A. Acting Aid-de-Camp, and will be absent a week or ten days.

Colonel R. H. Patterson, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who was for several months the commanding officer of Fort Baker, and who has recently been ordered east to command the Artillery District of Savannah, has arrived with his family at Fort Screven, Georgia.

Colonel William L. Pitcher, U. S. A., who has recently been promoted, has been assigned to the command of the Fourteenth Infantry, stationed at Vancouver Barracks. Colonel Pitcher has been Lieutenant Colonel of the Twenty-eighth Infantry, stationed at Fort Snelling, Minnesota.

Lieutenant Colonel Daniel M. Appel, U. S. G., U. S. A., will assume charge of the Medical Supply Depot, U. S. A., in San Francisco on June 30th.

Professor W. W. Hendrickson, for many years head of the Department of Mathematics at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, was retired on June 21st, and was succeeded by Professor Paul Dashiell. Professor Hendrickson was Lieutenant Commander in the Navy before being transferred to the Academy.

Major Samuel W. Dunning, U. S. A., Military Secretary of the Pacific Division, and Mrs. Dunning, who were turned out at the Empire in this city, are at present living with Major Dunning's brother in Oakland.

Major C. A. Bennett, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has changed stations from the Presidio of San Francisco to Vancouver Barracks. Major Bennett has one month's leave which he and Mrs. Bennett are spending at St. Helena.

Captain Louis R. Burgess, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., for the past two years and a half Adjutant of the Artillery District of San Francisco and the post of the Presidio of San Francisco, will be relieved on July 1st by Captain D. V. Ketcham, Artillery Corps, U. S. A. Captain Burgess will go at the end of two months leave to Fort Totten, New York, where he has been ordered or a year's course at the School of Submarine Defense. Captain and Mrs. Burgess and their family will spend the month of July in Mill Valley with Mrs. Burgess' parents, Dr. and Mrs. Davis, and in August will go to Tacoma for several weeks stay as the guest of Captain Burgess' parents.

Captain W. F. Hancock, U. S. A., is staying with Captain Haynes, U. S. A., at the Presidio of San Francisco, waiting his examination for promotion to Major which will take place July 5th. Captain Haynes and Captain H. L. Hawthorne, U. S. A., will also be examined for promotion on the same date.

Captain Jesse M. Baker, Quarter Master, U. S. A., has gone from San Francisco to Seattle, Washington, and reported to the quarter master at the latter post for temporary duty, relieving Captain Maurice Cralle, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.

Captain Charles G. Dwyer, Paymaster, U. S. A., has been ordered relieved from duty here and to proceed about July 15th to Omaha, for duty, until the close of the camp of instruction, at Fort Riley and to proceed then to New York.

Captain John R. Proctor, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., is expected to arrive in the next transport from the Philippines and will command the 105th company, Coast Artillery at present commanded by Lieutenant J. R. Ponce, U. S. A.

Chaplain Oliver C. Miller, Thirteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., stationed at Fort Riley, Kansas, has been placed on the retired list on account of disability, incident to the service. During the Spanish war, Chaplain Miller served as Chaplain of the Eighth California Volunteer Infantry and in January, 1901, was appointed in the Regular Army from California. He has been attached to the Thirteenth Cavalry, 4th rank of Captain since February, 1903.

Chaplain William E. Gladden, U. S. A., is assigned to the Twenty-fourth Infantry, U. S. A., and ordered to report July 15th to the commanding officer at Fort Logan, Colorado, after which he will proceed to San Francisco, sailing thence for Manila for duty in the Philippine division.

Through the State and Navy departments Rear-Admiral Goodrich, United States Navy, has been thanked by the Mexican Government for his assistance in stamping out an epidemic of diphtheria in Magdalena bay, Mexico. Admiral Goodrich sent surgeons of the Pacific squadron ashore to minister to the sick and assist local physicians in fighting the scourge.

Lieutenant Clarence S. Kempff, U. S. N., has been ordered detached from the U. S. Flag Ship Ohio, and transferred to the U. S. Cruiser Raleigh.

Lieutenant Morris E. Locke, Ninth Battery, Field Artillery, U. S. A., will leave August 1st, for the maneuvers at American Lake, and from there on August 15th for Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, where he has been ordered for a year's course in the Infantry and Cavalry School.

Lieutenant John Burke Murphy, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., now stationed at Vancouver Barracks, has been ordered to Fort Monroe, Virginia, for a year's course in the Artillery School. Lieutenant and Mrs. Murphy, the latter of whom was formerly Miss Jean Nokes of this city, will arrive here during the summer for a visit to relatives and friends, going in August to Monroe.

Lieutenant Leigh Sypher, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has resigned his commission as an officer of the army, and has engaged in business here connected with construction of modern buildings. Mr. Sypher was to have gone to the Artillery School at Fort Monroe this fall.

Lieutenant R. C. Weightman, U. S. R. C. S., has been detached from the Manning and ordered to the McCulloch.

The Naval Board of Inspection and Survey will leave Washington, D. C., on July 16th for Seattle, where the trial trip of the battleship Nebraska, will be conducted. The board will come thence to San Francisco and try the battleship Milwaukee, the trial to be made in the Santa Barbara channel.

The Small Arms Competition of the Pacific Division will be held at the Presidio at Monterey, beginning July 30th and lasting until August 7th, inclusive. Lieutenant-Colonel Garrard, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., will be in charge, but no other officials of the competition have as yet been designated.

Three troops, Fourteenth Cavalry, left on Saturday last for the Presidio of Monterey.

Del Monte Offers

During the reconstruction of San Francisco, Hotel del Monte offers a welcome shelter to those desiring a homelike place for rest and recreation. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire Hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

The Value of President Roosevelt.

In the course of a debate on the Sundry Civil Bill in the Senate last week Senator Bailey said, "I understand the present Executive has spent $100,000 more than any of his predecessors. If that be true, he has cost more and is worth less than any other President we have ever had."

The Senator from Texas is an able man, but that remark might have been made by a foolish one. It was inspired rather by Senator Bailey's dislike for the President than by justice or reason.

There are certain of us who do not always agree with President Roosevelt, although we do not dislike him as does Senator Bailey. In fact, there are many of us who honestly like the President, despite our dislike for many of the things he says and does. But such men as Bailey and Tillman should not allow their dislike for the President to lead them to attack him when he is earnestly engaged in doing that which is for the good of the entire nation. Let us briefly summarize a few of the things done by President Roosevelt. He has destroyed the Paper Trust. The Fertilizer Trust has been brought to book, and some eighty indictments have been found against it. Two of the Presidents of subsidizing companies composing the Tobacco Trust have been indicted, and that trust has been forced to bring its books into court. The Drug Trust has been enjoined. The Beef Trust has been brought into court. Congress has been somewhat reluctantly forced by the Administration to go after the Beef Trust. The President is directly responsible for the passage of the Railroad Rate Bill. The Administration has put a stop to the stealing of government lands in this and other Pacific States. The Administration convicted Senator Mitchell of Oregon of accepting bribes. It drove Senator Burton of Kansas out of the Senate for the same offense. It is still engaged in trying to bring to justice some dishonest members of Congress from Oregon. It is about to bring proceedings against the Standard Oil Company, which is generally admitted to be an iniquitous monopoly. And the most recent of the President's crusades against monopoly and on the side of the people is his action against the meat packers. In this last he has met with vigorous opposition from the multi-millionaires of the meat industry, who have endeavored to terrify him with the danger to the cattle industry of the West. This was a master move, for the President's heart is in the West, and his liking for the men of the cattle ranches is well known. But the President resisted this attempt to sidetrack him. Thereupon strong opposition to the meat investigation developed in the House of Representatives. In dealing with this matter the President showed some of his habitual haste and impulsiveness in his correspondence with Chairman Wadsworth of the Agricultural Committee. But the people will pardon him in view of the fact that he accomplished his end. At least we hope so. As we write the bill is in conference between the Senate and the House, with a deadlock on the question of the packers paying the fees for inspection. The meat packers are now holding out on the forlorn hope of dodging the fees and attempting to throw them on the government. The Administration is attempting to force the packers to pay the fees. Here again we believe the President is right, and here again we hope and believe he will succeed.

Out on this coast little of the product of the Western meat packers is consumed. Therefore little interest is felt in this matter. Throughout all of the Eastern half of the United States, however, the consumption of these meats, either refrigerated or from the can, is large. This is also the case in Europe. The feeling throughout both the United States and Europe over the revelations of conditions in the packing houses is one of disgust and horror. European governments are sending representatives to the United States to see that meat products intended for the consumption of their armies are packed in a cleanly manner and from animals which were not diseased.

The foregoing is a brief resume of what the President has done for the people during his short term of office. When Senator Bailey says that Mr. Roosevelt "has cost more and is worth less than any President we have ever had," we believe that few Democrats will agree with him and no Republicans at all.

Insurance Black List in Congress.

Scarcely a day passes now that there does not transpire some new method of spreading among the people the truth about the insurance companies. Up to now there has been very little attention paid in the Eastern press to the crooked actions of insurance companies here. Many Eastern journals ignore the insurance situation altogether; some have given a few lines to it perhaps once or twice a week. But to those who do not see the Eastern papers the utter indifference paid by them to a matter of such vital import to San Francisco would seem amazing.

The latest development on the side of the unfortunate policy-holders is this: Representative Kahn made a speech in the House on June 28th giving the facts concerning the insurance situation. He said that the total loss was probably three hundred and fifty millions, with not more than two hundred millions of it covered by insurance. He also related that some sixty of the companies had signed a compact agreeing to pay only 75 per cent of the face of their policies, utterly regardless of conditions. He then narrated the attempts of the policy-holders to get justice, the organization of a policy-holders' protective league, and their intention to advertise the honest and dishonest companies throughout the United States and in Europe. Mr. Kahn added: "Official data concerning the insurance situation is now being gathered by the Insurance Commissioners of the State of California. At the opening of the next session of Congress I shall lay before the House, and have printed in the Congressional Record, the list of those insurance companies who have failed and refused to meet their just and honest obligations, so that the country will know in whom to put trust." The Associated Press dispatches say: "This announcement caused a sensation in the House, and every insurance company affected will know what it is up against." Representative Kahn said after his speech that the insurance data when printed in the Congressional Record would be mailed to every policy-holder in the United States. Thus there will be laid before them an official list of the defaulting insurance companies.

We earnestly hope that Representative Kahn may carry out his plan. It is not only a desirable one for the injured policy-holders of California, but it will be of great benefit to all insurers throughout the United States. It will enable them to choose between honest companies and bunco companies.

The Relief Fund and the Relief Problems.

Last week General A. W. Greely, U. S. A., notified Mayor Schmitz that he would withdraw the troops of the Regular Army from San Francisco on July 10th. The municipal authorities endeavored to have this time extended, but General Greely stated that he "considered the spirit of American institutions as adverse to the quartering of troops in large cities in times of peace"; furthermore that he believed the care of the many thousands of destitute persons in San Francisco presented problems outside of the functions of the army and distinctly for civil regulation. At the request of the Mayor, General Greely drew up a careful document, in which under some twenty-five numbered heads he set forth in detail certain practical suggestions to aid the municipality in solving the problems of handling the refugees.

Since the great disaster of April 18th the special work of meeting emergency conditions has been vested in a committee of fifty civilians appointed by the Mayor. There were also on the ground the United States troops commanded by General Greely, and the National Red Cross under Dr. Devine. At first there was some little clashing between these three bodies, but after a time they worked together as harmoniously as might be. Under the changed conditions a new executive body had to be appointed. As the most important element in the old Citizens' Committee was the Finance Committee, Mayor Schmitz called in its members to his aid in appointing a new body, of three members, called the Relief Commission. Its chairman is Dr. E. T. Devine, of the National Red Cross Committee. The second member is Edward F. Moran, formerly an editorial and special writer on the Examiner, and subsequently a member of the Civil Service Commission; in addition to his knowledge of journalism, civil service, and politics, Mr. Moran has of late been devoting a part of his time to the study of law. The third member of the commission is Geo. H. Pippy, President of the Union League Club. The salary of these commissioners is fixed at $600 per month. They are to report to the Finance Committee; while they are an executive body, they will be controlled by the Finance Committee, as that committee holds the purse-strings. At the first meeting of the commission the members passed a resolution inviting General Greely, Mayor Schmitz and James D. Phelan, Chairman of the Finance Committee, to sit with them at their meetings.

From the very first meeting it became apparent that the problems before the Relief Commission are colossal. The sum to be disbursed by the Finance Committee on the recommendations of the Relief Commission is over six millions of dollars. This enormous sum is about equal to the annual revenue of San Francisco. It is to be disbursed presumably in much less than a year. At least everybody hopes so, although, as matters look at present, it would seem as if the problems connected with feeding, clothing and housing the destitute thousands will last for a very much longer time.

The Relief Commission, the Finance Committee and the municipal authorities have been so profoundly impressed by the magnitude of the problems before them that they part most reluctantly with the assistance of the United States Army. Therefore they have hailed with gratitude the suggestion of General Greely that a certain number of army officers should continue to assist the commission. He, therefore, sent to Dr. Devine the names of some eight or nine officers, stating that he was willing to recommend to the Secretary of War that these officers be granted leave of absence for six months, and that the commission, if it desired, could command their services, as they are familiar with the relief work. If so detailed, he stated that their regular pay and allowances would cease, and that they would be placed on half pay. The question of compensation, General Greely added, would have to be fixed by the commission; but that as the entire charge of the refugees, now including about forty thousand people, far exceeds the command of a major general, he would recommend that the chief superintendent be paid $625 per month. He further recommended Major J. A. Gaston, First Cavalry, now commanding the camps, as a desirable person for chief superintendent. Concerning the pay of the other officers General Greely said dryly: "I would suggest that it be at least $8.00 per day, which is the sum paid to brick layers in San Francisco."

A curious difference of opinion arose as the result of General Greely's recommendations. Some of the army officers expressed their willingness to perform the civilian functions desired. Others felt differently. Captain Kilian, who has done wonders in charge of the subsistence warehouse, said he was quite ready to remain in the same position if given leave of absence. Captain J. J. Bradley, who has been in charge of the Bureau of Clothing, has also been a most efficient officer under very trying conditions; Captain Bradley, however, declined to accept a position under the Relief Commission, saying that the duties were not those of an army officer but of a civilian. He did not criticize any army officer who chose to continue this work, but personally he did not care to do it himself. Captain Bradley recommended in his place Captain Peter Murray of the Eighteenth Infantry. Captain Murray declined for the same reasons as Captain Bradley. Captain E. E. Longan, Eleventh Infantry, also declined for the same reasons, and the further ones that he considered himself by taste, training and temperament unfitted for relief work. These declinations occasioned some surprise to General Greely, who said that it was by no means unusual and certainly not illegal for army officers to accept civilian duties when permitted by the War Department. He instanced the case of Colonel Simmons, who was receiving a salary of $10,000 a year for work on the Erie Canal, and of Colonel Gorgas and other army officers at present employed at high salaries on the Panama Canal.

There are so many unpleasant features connected with the relief work that before the commission shall have ended its days it is probable that the officers accepting service under it will feel that those who declined followed the part of wisdom. Some of these unpleasant features speedily developed. One of the most curious was the law suit brought against the Finance Committee by an association of refugees. In the complaint the court is asked to remove the Finance Committee and their appointees from office, as they had been "guilty of a conspiracy in so administering the money and supplies contributed by benevolent persons throughout the United States as to deprive the refugees in San Francisco of their just enjoyment thereof." The court is further asked to set aside as null and void all the acts of these "conspirators," to declare their offices vacant, and to appoint others in their stead, presumably from the list of the complainants. Injunction is prayed for to restrain the committee from disbursing any more of the relief fund, and particularly that they make accounting for the disbursement of a certain six million dollars and also of eighty thousand barrels of flour.

This matter of the flour is an extremely awkward one. Large quantities of flour were sent from the milling districts, particularly from the Northwestern States with Minneapolis as a shipping center. The Relief Committee speedily found itself burdened with enormous quantities of flour. The refugees were all in camp; they had no stoves or ovens; hence they were unable to use the flour to bake bread; they could make little other use of it; its care and custody cost the Relief Committee quite a sum. Therefore, it was decided to sell the flour to the highest bidder, and with the money to secure other supplies which were more needed. This was done. A bid was made and accepted, but speedily accusations were made in the press and by the refugees that the price offered was far below the market rate. After much recrimination this bid was annulled and further tenders asked for, which resulted in a higher bid being made.

In the interim the refugees grew much excited. The Examiner encouraged them in their attacks on the Relief Committee. Finally dispatches began to come from Minneapolis stating that the flour had been sent for the use of the destitute and not to be sold and that the donors were most indignant at any such contemplated plan. None the less the flour was sold and the money is to be devoted to other purposes.

We can see no good reason for questioning the judgment of the Relief Committee in a matter of detail like this. If they are not fit to control the distribution of eighty thousand barrels of flour, they certainly are not fit to administer the disbursement of six millions of dollars.

This is one of the unpleasant sides of relief work of which we spoke. Another came speedily to the front. Father Rogers of St. Patrick's parish came before the Relief Commission asking for special legislation in the matter of securing clothing and household utensils for the members of his parish. He stated that there were between eighty and one hundred young girls in St. Patrick's Parish School who have been kept off the streets by the Sisters of Charity and that for five weeks the Sisters have been endeavoring to get bolts of gingham from the Relief Committee to give these girls some work to do, but were unsuccessful. He further told that they had been forced to expend some $1200 for shoes, because the needy in his parish were unable to obtain them at the distributing stations of the Relief Commission. Dr. Devine, the Chairman, stated that the operations of the Relief Committee had always been on a non-sectarian basis, and that Archbishop Riordan and the heads of various other sectarian organizations had been asked to appoint a representative to inform the commission of the need in their ranks, and that thus they would secure relief through the commission. Commissioner Moran, however, moved that all the requisitions of Father Rogers and of the St. Patrick's Parish Society be granted without further investigation, which was seconded by Colonel Pippy and carried by two against one, Dr. Devine having his vote recorded in the negative "on the ground that the action was wholly sectarian."

Various other embarrassing questions are daily coming up before the Relief Commission. A partial census of the unattached women in the camps has been taken by the ladies of the Red Cross Society. These women are numbered by hundreds in the various camps, and are divided into four classes: first, respectable women who desire to work; second, respectable women who will not work so long as they are fed; third, unfortunate women desiring to reform; fourth, unfortunate women who are hopeless. These figures are, of course, exclusive of the married women. The class numbered "first" are most of them living with families. The latter three classes are badly mixed, and the local Red Cross Society desire to have the commission separate them before the army retires and the saloons are again opened, when it is feared conditions in the camps will become bad.

This foreshadows another problem with which the new Relief Commission will have to cope. The liquor saloons have been closed since the 18th of April, and never in the history of San Francisco has there been a time when the city has been so free from disorder and crime. But on the 5th of July the saloons will reopen. There has been such a rush for licenses even at the enhanced rate of $500 a year that all those applying will not be able to have their cases considered before the time of opening. When it is possible for the camp-dwellers to bring liquor within the camps breaches of the civil and canon law will beyond question ensue.

To add to the troubles of the Relief Commission, their first monthly budget as presented to the Finance Committee amounted to over $100,000. This would come to about a million and a quarter a year, for administrative work and sanitation. This estimate leaves out entirely all money for supplies for the refugees. Needless to say, this budget caused quite a commotion, and the Relief Commission decided to revise it.

These are but a sample of the myriads of questions which are presenting themselves for solution to the Relief Commission. There has suddenly been turned over to that civilian body a mass of about fifty thousand people who are without homes, without money, without labor and without food. All sorts of questions, political, sanitary, sociological and moral, present themselves and must be solved at once. But in the face of more pressing problems the ethical and sociological problems must go to the wall. The first thing to be done is to provide shelter for these people. They are now dwelling in tents. Already over five per cent of the tents have holes in them, and by next October seventy-five per cent of them will be unfitted to give protection from the rain, according to the estimates of the army officers. Some sort of shelter must be provided before next November. Fortunately the climate of California is such that the refugees now are not suffering. In fact it is probable that many of them have been advantaged by their camp life and their existence in the open air. But when the winter comes, even the mild winter of California, they must have shelter. What shape is it to take? Are they to be housed in enormous wooden barracks? If so, are these barracks to be erected in the parks? Or is land to be purchased or leased by the Relief Commission? If so, are the structures erected to be of a permanent or a temporary character? Shall the commission purchase land and build houses with its six millions? Shall the houses be detached? Shall the commission lease houses to tenants for a purely nominal rental to be slowly increased? In whom then shall the title vest? Shall the property be deeded to the municipality of San Francisco? Or shall the title vest in the occupants? If so, on what conditions?

Here are a few of the questions confronting the body of men now composing the Relief Commission and the Finance Committee. We speak within bounds when we say that never were there presented in a time of peace such complex, such colossal questions as now face the Relief Commission entrusted with the task of caring for the homeless fifty thousand refugees in San Francisco.

The Senate and the President.

The feud between the Senate and the President smoulders but is not extinguished. The latest evidence of it was the action of the Senate on the matter of giving the President $25,000 a year for traveling expenses. This legislation was in the form of an amendment to the Sundry Civil Bill. Mr. Roosevelt has been anxious to obtain this allowance of $25,000 a year, but he preferred to have it figure in the Sundry Civil Bill along with a hundred million dollars of miscellaneous appropriations. It could then be said by the Administration organs that he could not veto this personal appropriation bill, which action might render necessary an extraordinary session of Congress. Also that he could not investigate the constitutionality of the measure, as it was part of the routine appropriation bill, and that therefore Congress had forced him to accept the $25,000 a year.

Some of the President's enemies in the Senate saw an opportunity to "get even" on him for various acts of omission or commission. On the floor of the Senate, Mr. Foraker said that many Senators believe this allowance to be of doubtful legality, while some others believed it to be unconstitutional. He therefore suggested that it be made a separate bill, which would enable the President to obtain the opinion of the Attorney General on its constitutionality; thus he could veto it without crippling the appropriation bill. Senator Foraker said he would be obliged to vote against the $25,000 allowance if it were maintained in the Sundry Civil Bill, but would support it if it stood on its own feet, which would permit the constitutionality of the bill to be passed upon. The Senate seemed to be of the opinion of Mr. Foraker, and his suggestion was accepted. Thereupon the amendment form was dropped, and the Tawney House Bill was passed in its place by a strict party vote.

The Republican enemies of the Administration in the Senate, of whom there are not a few, were much elated with their victory over the Administration Senators, and with the success of their attempt to "put the President in a hole."

Unfortunate Strike in San Francisco.

Immediately after the great disaster of April 18th the Trades Unions in this city received much fulsome praise here and in other cities for their expressed determination to accelerate the rebuilding of San Francisco as follows: to refrain from attempts to raise the then union scale of wages; to discontinue the rules regarding the open and closed shop, which would permit non-union employees to work in the same establishments with union employees; to discontinue the rule forbidding union men to handle material coming from non-union shops.

Scarcely had the echoes of praise to the unions for their magnanimous and high-handed course died away when the union leaders began eating their words. The mechanics most in demand were the brick layers; they speedily demanded and received

$8.00 a day. It is true they pretend that this is not a union action but an individual demand, still no one can doubt that the union is behind them. Other mechanics also made demands for higher wages, tacitly sanctioned by the unions. Furthermore the arbitrary and unjust rule forbidding union men to handle building materials coming from non-union shops is gradually going into effect.

About the only industry remaining in San Francisco which was not in a condition of semi-paralysis from the great calamity was the shipping industry. The docks, piers, and sheds on the water front were not burned, nor was the shipping. But within a few weeks after the disaster the Seamen's Union took advantage of the demand for shipping to carry building materials, and demanded a raise in wages. The United Ship Owners parleyed with them for a while, and then refused. Thereupon the sailors, firemen, cooks, and waiters went out on strike. Since that time the shipping industry in San Francisco harbor is practically tied up. Some of the big passenger liners are refusing to take passengers and are going to sea in ballast. The work of rebuilding the new San Francisco has come to a standstill for lack of building materials.

Mayor Schmitz has attempted to bring the contending parties together, and has urged them to submit to arbitration. But the United Ship Owners have refused. In their reply they say: "As the sailors, firemen, cooks and waiters have been and are the most liberally paid men in like vocation in the world, we are of the opinion that there are no demands that should call for arbitration."

This journal is not sufficiently informed in the matter to express any opinion, further than to say that we believe—as the United Ship Owners say—that seamen on this coast get the highest wages of any seamen in the world.

How the Fireman's Fund Stands.

An official statement has been made to the agents and insurers of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company by Bernard Faymonville, Vice President and Manager, who returned on May 7th from the Philippines. As there has been much speculation concerning the prospects of that company, we summarize the statement in question. Mr. Faymonville substantially says: The Fireman's Fund records and maps were all burned; many share-holders were burned out and they were financially crippled; the company had large investments in California and San Francisco, all of which suffered severely; these facts caused a stampede among the company's outstanding policy-holders, and scores of thousands of cancellations and demands for return of premiums followed; a new corporation was, therefore, organized to relieve the old company of the threatening liability under its outstanding and unburned risks; the stock of the new Fireman's Fund Insurance Corporation was subscribed for, partly by stockholders of the old company, partly by new investors, and a part is still unsubscribed; it has a capital stock of one million dollars and a surplus fund of a like amount; the new corporation at once assumed all the outstanding liability of the old company not involved in the April 18th fire; as the time for filing claims was extended to August 18th, the company will be compelled to wait until that date to determine its final liability; no arbitrary deductions are made; losses will be adjusted on the merits of each case; the company "intends to pay all legitimate claims dollar for dollar;" "if it does not possess sufficient funds, it will call on its stockholders for more;" "the Fireman's Fund will probably have to retire, but in retiring it will endeavor to treat every claimant fairly and equitably."

Beyond a doubt the Fireman's Fund occupies a most unfortunate position. Most of its risks were in San Francisco; its real estate investments were in San Francisco; its negotiable securities were the stocks of San Francisco corporations; its stockholders were San Franciscans who lose both ways, in the destruction of their own property and in paying the fire losses of their neighbors. If it shall stand before such a colossal disaster, its officers are indeed worthy of the highest credit. It is earnestly to be hoped that they may succeed.

Curiosities of the Fire.

Ever since the disaster of April 18 the Argonaut has been intent on gathering strange and curious incidents of that colossal conflagration. Strangely enough, we have not been any too successful. Most of us were so dazed by the rapidity of the events that we remember them incoherently and set them down with difficulty. In the East, however, people seem to have no such trouble. True, they did not undergo the experiences they relate, but that they do not heed. We have encountered a number of narratives in Eastern papers which are of the most extraordinary description. In fact, they are as incredible as they are extraordinary.

In the magazine called "Success" we saw announced an article entitled "Remarkable Facts About the San Francisco Earthquake, reported by Hosmer Whitfield." This is a comparatively new magazine, devoted mainly to telling young men how to get there. Its ideals seem to be the great insurance, pork, copper, coal and oil millionaires. In short, the ideal of "Success" seems to be telling a young man how to become a McCall or a McCurdy, a Rockefeller or a Schwab. As this will show, its ideals are high. Its editors should put at the head of their first page Emerson's apothegm, "Hitch your wagon to a star."

Naturally, in such a high grade journal, we looked forward with much interest to the appearance of this article. We have not the honor of being on the exchange list of "Success," and "Success" has not the pleasure of being on the exchange list of the "Argonaut." Therefore we sent ten cents for an early copy of the July number, and at once turned feverishly to Mr. Whitfield's remarkable article headed "Remarkable Facts." The first paragraph runs as follows:

The residence of John D. Spreckles,

the sugar king, was situated on Van Ness Avenue, and was one of the most costly and luxurious palaces in California. When the soldiers were given orders to demolish it with dynamite, Mr. Spreckles went on his knees on the sidewalk and begged them not to do so.

This paragraph begins: "The residence of John D. SpreckLES." There is no "John D. SpreckLES." There is a "John D. SpreckELS."

The paragraph calls him "the Sugar King." He is not a "Sugar King." He never was. His father, Claus Spreckels, is the "Sugar King."

The paragraph goes on: "The residence of John D. Spreckles was situated on Van Ness Avenue." It never was on Van Ness Avenue. It is on Pacific Avenue.

The paragraph continues: "When the soldiers were given orders to demolish it." It was not demolished, but is still standing. The residence of Claus Spreckels was on Van Ness Avenue, but was not demolished with dynamite; it is still standing, and the damage done was through fire.

The next sentence runs thus: "Mr. Spreckles went on his knees on the sidewalk and begged the soldiers not to do so"—that is, not to demolish his residence with dynamite. As it was not John D. Spreckels', and as it was not demolished with dynamite, and as it was not demolished at all, and as his residence was not there, it is highly probable that Mr. Spreckels did not beg them to refrain from demolishing it. Furthermore, as John D. Spreckels had been dangerously ill for a number of weeks, and was then in bed a long distance away, at Pacific and Laguna streets, he probably did not kneel in prayer at Van Ness and Clay, in the midst of dynamite and fire.

Aside from these few inaccuracies we have no doubt that the paragraph is correct.

The remarkable Mr. Whitfield thus continues his "Remarkable Facts":

The night of the earthquake hundreds of horses in the stables throughout the city became unusually nervous. They pawed, kicked, neighed, and exhibited other signs of restlessness in their stalls. They seemed to want to break out and run away.

Those of us who believe that human hindsight is infinitely better than its foresight differ with Mr. Whitfield. Some of us believe that nobody knows what is going to happen. If anybody in San Francisco, in California, in the United States, or in the world knew on the 17th of April that an earthquake shock was coming on the 18th, they made no sign. The San Francisco newspapers contained on the 17th of April columns of advertisements by clairvoyants, soothsayers, wahrsagerinnen, fortune tellers, spiritualistic mediums and Egyptian veiled ladies; all these prophetic freaks were ready to tell your fortune while you wait from half a dollar up, according to the amount of idiocy your mother gave you when you were born. The advertisements of these freaks spangled the San Francisco dailies on the 17th of April. On the 18th of April there were no newspapers, no advertisements, and no prophetic freaks.

Thus it is seen that human foresight—even that of the oldest and most experienced foresighter—is no good. But Mr. Whitfield evidently believes in equine foresight. He thinks that a horse can see farther into the future than a man. Perhaps he can, but the deponent doubts it. The average horse at a distance of ten feet cannot tell a bale of straw bedding from a bale of rich wheat hay. Many horses will shy at their own barn; others will shy at their own shadows. For Mr. Whitfield to believe that animals so low in the intellectual scale as horses—almost as low, let us say, as clairvoyants—should be able to foretell cosmic disturbances, known only to college professors and to omniscience, speaks volumes for his credulity, but little for his think-tank.

The next paragraph in Mr. Whitfield's "Remarkable Facts" runs as follows:

I am told on the best authority that several hundred people went insane the day of the shock, while scores of people who had been victims of insanity for years suddenly regained their minds.

If "several hundred people went insane the day of the shock," the fact would have developed from the pressure on the asylums. The asylums were so seriously damaged that some are still unable adequately to house the unfortunates who were already in their care at the time of the earthquake. What then has become of the "several hundred who went insane the day of the shock?" On second thoughts the answer to that is contained in Mr. Whitfield's next statement that "scores of people who had been victims of insanity for years suddenly regained their minds." Probably these cured lunatics at once vacated their quarters in the insane asylums, and those who went mad on the day of the shock popped into their places.

Mr. Whitfield copies a "letter from a California woman," in which occurs the statement: "The thunder of exploding dynamite may die in my ears, but I will always hear the rattle of the trunks over the cobbles as the poor people dragged their earthly belongings to places of safety." San Francisco abolished cobble pavements many years ago. We are very proud of our smooth asphalt or bituminous pavements. For Mr. Whitfield to circulate such statements as these will bring down upon him the wrath of our Promotion Committees.

The next paragraph in Mr. Whitfield's "Remarkable Facts" runs as follows: "During the fire, armies of rats invaded the unburned districts. There seemed to be millions on millions of them." This paragraph might pass without comment, were it not for the well known peculiarity of the rodent family to be present only in the spirit in times of excitement. To illustrate our meaning let us relate a little story. Sometimes at high water the cellars in the lower parts of Cincinnati become flooded. Once a stranger, while walking about Cincinnati's downtown streets, stepping gingerly and with loathing, found himself picking his steps amid what appeared to be moving swarms of grayish brown rats. As he progressed along the streets the swarms increased, until they were like those following the Pied Piper of Hamelin. The stranger at last in terror started to shin up a lamp-post. Hanging on with one arm he clutched with the other at a passing native. "Say, Mister," said he, "do you see any rats?" The native looked at the stranger in surprise, "Rats? Why certainly. I see millions of them. Don't you?" The stranger replied: "Thank God! I thought I had 'em again." It would be a harsh judgment on Mr. Whitfield to put him in the same category as the strange gentleman in Cincinnati.

Among the many curious incidents narrated by Mr. Whitfield is the following:

At St. Mary's Cathedral occurred a notable act of spiritual and physical heroism. Tremors were running through the building and outside, and bits of mortar were falling, when two brave priests made their way to the top of the tower in spite of the continued rocking of the building, and there, clinging to the cross which surmounted it, steadied the sacred emblem and prevented it from falling to the pavement.

This incident has been several times narrated, and strange to say always in dissimilar ways. Some say that the two priests climbed the tower to chop off the woodwork, which had been ignited either by blasts of flame or showers of cinders borne on the wind; they thereby hoped to prevent the destruction of the entire church. But Mr. Whitfield knows better. According to him "tremors were running through the building and outside." Usually, by the way, earthquakes are felt both inside and outside of buildings. "Two brave priests made their way to the top of the tower in spite of the continued rocking of the building." We do not doubt the bravery of the two priests, but we never saw a man, whether steeple jack or sailor, who would climb a tower while the earth was quaking. We may be permitted to doubt the "continued rocking," and to believe merely that the two priests climbed the tower after the earthquake was over. Mr. Whitfield goes on: "There, clinging to the cross, the two priests steadied the sacred emblem, and prevented it from falling to the pavement." Two priests, no matter how brave, would scarcely commit such incredible folly. When whole towers fell down, what good would there be in simply saving a cross from falling? Probably the foundation for this remarkable narrative of Mr. Whitfield is the one we spoke of but now, that the priests were chopping off parts of the wooden tower that caught fire.

Mr. Whitfield goes from the city of the living to the city of the dead. He says: "The night following the earthquake hundreds found shelter in the massive mausoleums and beside the tombs in Laurel Hill Cemetery." If Mr. Whitfield believes that, he will believe anything. Many of the monuments in the cemeteries looked after the earthquake as if they had the blind staggers. Most people preferred sleeping as far away from structures—particularly of stone or brick—as they could get. It is probable that the entire population of San Francisco slept out of doors the night following the earthquake. Most of them slept out for two or three nights, and then moved back by easy degrees. Some forty thousand are sleeping out of doors yet. Among his other remarkable facts, Mr. Whitfield should not forget that a curious superstition pervades California—it is considered in this State extremely unlucky to be killed by a falling tomb.

The final paragraph from Mr. Whitfield's collection runs thus:

I. W. Hellman, one of the richest men in the State, was forced by soldiers to unearth a buried oven so that bread might be baked for the refugees. The first loaf was given to Mr. Hellman as a souvenir. The rich and poor were brought to a common level as never before in the history of the world. It showed what people can do in a brotherly way when necessity demands.

This anecdote is probably one of the few in the collection which most closely approximates to the truth. Still it is not entirely accurate. Mr. Whitfield says that "I. W. Hellman was forced by soldiers to unearth a buried oven." We hear on the best authority that there are the facts: Mr. Hellman was not engaged in burying an oven, but merely in digging a hole. In this hole he had intended to put away about fourteen million dollars in bonds which he happened to have about him at the time of the shock. When he had dug the hole to quite a depth a brutal soldier came along and informed the banker that he intended to take away the hole. When Mr. Hellman remonstrated the soldier hit him with the butt of a gun. Thereupon the unfortunate banker became unconscious. When he recovered his senses Mr. Hellman saw that his hole was missing. He cried loudly for help. When some bystanders rushed up he told them of the occurrence, adding that the brutal soldier had struck him, had stolen his hole and fled. "But," said one of the bystanders who knew him, "Mr. Hellman, are you sure that he has stolen the hole? I think you are in a hole, sir." Mr. Hellman sat up and saw that it was indeed a fact. He had fallen over backwards into his own hole. He was mistaken. He had done the soldier an injustice he admitted, as he smiled through his tears. Mr. Hellman, by the way, lost everything but what he had about his person at the time. He is now beginning life all over again, far down the ladder, with only these few bonds between him and penury. But he has not lost heart. He is working strenuously to upbuild our Greater San Francisco, and hopes in time again to amass a modest competence.

We would like to state to Mr. Hosmer Whitfield that if he is going to tell remarkable stories about our late unpleasantness he had better get them straight. The foregoing may be depended on.

Tottering Insurance Companies.

Last week we remarked that when the Traders of Chicago effected its hurried re-insurance prior to its more hurried application for a receiver, during the semi-secret subsequent proceedings some thirty insurance companies were passed over. Their names were kept secret, by arrangement among the adjusters and insurance directors. We now learn from New York that this rumor is based on fact. Thirty-two American companies doing business in New York have been forced to take extraordinary measures to entrench themselves against disaster. Five of them have reinsured in other corporations. Eight companies have called in funds from their share holders announcing an increase in capital stock. Eighteen other companies have begun to raise special funds, either by stock assessment or otherwise. One company has withdrawn from business in California.

We are under the impression that more than one company will withdraw from business in California before this crisis is over, and in many cases their withdrawal will not be voluntary.

Bankers' Insurance Black List.

The Washington Bankers' Association last week appointed a committee to secure from the California Insurance Commissioners' office a list of companies seeking to evade payment of losses resulting from the San Francisco disaster. These lists will be furnished to every banker in the State of Washington. The Oregon Bankers' Association is also taking steps to secure similar lists. Thereupon there will be at once put in force in Pacific Coast States the black list of the insurance companies that have "welched" in California.

Similar action will soon follow in other States. As soon as the Argonaut can secure a correct and authoritative list from the State Insurance Commissioners we shall print such a list, keep it standing, and circulate it as widely as is in our power.

Insurance Roll of Honor.

As we have not hesitated to condemn the crooked companies so we consider it our duty to name the honest ones in the present insurance crisis. Not all of the managers are rogues, nor are all of the shareholders fraudulent bankrupts, we are glad to say. Last week we chronicled the fact that the Continental Fire Insurance Company of Hartford was rapidly settling claims and paying cash to its policy-holders on the dollar-for-dollar basis; likewise that the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company of Hartford had already paid to its policy-holders, on the dollar-for-dollar basis, nearly a million of dollars. This week we have to add to the Roll of Honor the Aetna of Hartford, which has some three millions of liabilities in the burned district of San Francisco; this company has already settled 933 claims, on which it has paid $1,405,733. A group of companies comprising the St. Paul Fire and Marine, the American Central of Missouri, and the Mercantile Fire and Marine of Boston, are also rapidly paying their policy-holders. They have a net liability in the burned section of about $2,500,000, and have already paid about 800 losses, aggregating $700,000. The Union Assurance Association and the Law, Union & Crown, both English corporations, have paid 400 claims, aggregating about $500,000.

There are doubtless other companies to be added to the Roll of Honor, among which we hear is the Liverpool and London and Globe, but we have no figures concerning them.

Another Insurance Manager Resigns.

Two notable events in the insurance world of late have been the resignation of George D. Dornin, Pacific Coast Manager of the National of Hartford, and Rudolph Herold, Pacific Coast Manager of the Hamburg and Bremen. Both these officials had occupied prominent positions in the insurance world here for a third of a century. Both resigned owing to their refusal to stand for the crooked procedure of their companies in arbitrarily scaling down the policy-holders' claims. The third man to leave under similar circumstances is V. C. Driffield, recently Pacific Coast Manager for the Trans-Atlantic Insurance Company of Hamburg. He resigns because the home office instructed him to "admit no liability whatever." He adds for the benefit of policy-holders that the statements given out in this State concerning the company's weak financial condition "are entirely erroneous, for the capital and surplus of the company aggregate $1,964,326." Mr. Driffield advises the policy-holders to organize as a body to protect their interests. His advice is sound.

The Policy-Holders' Protective League.

We chronicled last week at some length the proceedings of the Policy-Holders' Protective League at their first meeting. Since then the following gentlemen have been appointed trustees:

Trustees at large, H. Weinstock of Weinstock, Luhrin & Co.; Merchants' Association, Andrew Carrigan of Dunham, Carrigan & Hayden Company, Albert Dernham of Buckingham & Hecht; Chamber of Commerce, Charles H. Crocker of H. S. Crocker & Co., Rudolph Taussig of Louis Taussig & Co.; Merchants' Exchange, James D. Phelan of the Mutual Savings Bank, F. W. Van Sicken of Dodge, Sweeney & Co.; San Francisco Board of Trade, Charles Holbrook of Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson, J. D. Grant of Murphy, Grant & Co.; Manufacturers' and Producers' Association of California, F. W. Dohrmann of Nathan, Dohrmann & Co., A. Sbarboro of the Italian-American Bank.

The trustees have held several meetings, but have not yet formulated a plan of procedure. It is believed that they will soon lay their plan of campaign before the members. Then the insurance companies will be confronted with a solid body whose policies aggregate something like one hundred millions of dollars.

Insurance East and West.

We observe that a number of the crooked insurance companies who are trying to bunko their policy-holders here in San Francisco are advertising largely in the Eastern press that they are "meeting their claims squarely and paying dollar for dollar in the great San Francisco disaster." These statements are lies—plain, bald lies. We advise those gentlemen in the Policy-Holders' Protective League who are so timid about advertising the truth concerning the insurance situation in San Francisco to read some of these lying advertisements as a tonic.

A LETTER FROM GEN. FUNSTON.

Presidio of San Francisco, Cal., July 2, 1906.

To the Editor of the Argonaut.—Dear Sir: Two weeks ago the Argonaut republished from the Boston Transcript an article from a correspondent relative to the recent conflagration in this city in which I was held up to scorn for not having taken upon myself the responsibility of blowing the whole city to flinders with dynamite. In your last issue somebody who calls himself Henry Anderson Lafier breaks loose and tells how all of us failed miserably, and incidentally confides to the public how he would have done it, if only he had been discovered in time. He points out especially my grievous omissions in such pathetic fashion that I am all but convinced that I am quite a reprehensible person, and should not be at large. As a rule, I try to avoid controversies through the columns of the press, for they are the most profitless things on earth; but I do not believe it best for me to allow the statements made by these two persons to stand uncontradicted, not that their individual views concern me in the slightest degree, but for fear that they may influence the opinions of others as misinformed as they themselves evidently are as to the occurrences of the 18th, 19th and 20th of April. Both letters are unique in the lack of information shown by their writers as to my status and the limits of my authority during the fire, as well as to the difficulties encountered by those engaged in fighting this the greatest conflagration in modern times.

Mr. Lafier says: "My companion said to me: 'I know what I would do if I were in charge: I would seize every automobile I could get my hands on; I would ascertain from the directory the names of every dealer of high explosives in San Francisco; I would dispatch cars with demands for supplies of dynamite on hand and information about men capable of handling it; and I would be fighting this fire with dynamite inside a half hour.'" All of which sounds well enough if there had been dynamite stored in the city which there was not. To store large supplies of high explosives in or near a large city would be criminal, and is everywhere unlawful. The nearest point where there was available any considerable quantity of high explosives was at Pinole, across the Bay. The obtaining of this dynamite, transferring it to the city wharves and thence by automobile to the points where it was needed was slow and tedious business and it was used up so rapidly in vain attempts to check the fire that it was impossible to accumulate a sufficient quantity of it to carry out the wholesale destruction contemplated by Mr. Lafier's gallant companion. If the city authorities could but have known that those gentlemen were available, to superintend getting this dynamite to the front, how different it all might have been!

The explosive used during the first hours of the morning of the 18th was gunpowder from the Presidio. It was, of course, ill suited to the work and nothing was accomplished by its use and on the other hand no harm was done by it, despite the fact that a few buildings may have been set on fire, as all that portion of the city where gunpowder was used was doomed to destruction, and could have been saved only by the use of carloads of dynamite. The quantity of gun cotton brought down from Mare Island Navy Yard was so small that it could not influence matters, despite the paeans of praise indulged in by the Boston Transcript's correspondent on that subject. I have neither the time nor the disposition to follow further the mental gymnastics and fairy stories of either of these gentlemen. Mr. Lafier is entitled to much praise for his excellent work in fighting the conflagration, for, according to his own statement he put out the fire on somebody's fence with a sponge or some other toilet article. It certainly was a gallant deed. Let us not forget the name of Lafier.

But to be serious.

There are a few facts that I wish the people of San Francisco would bear in mind, and the principal one is this. The city was never for one moment under martial law and the functions of the municipal government did not at any time lapse. The Mayor and not myself was the supreme authority. Without warrant of law and without being requested to do so I marched the troops into the city, merely to aid the municipal authorities and not to supersede them. The dynamiting, although done by a detachment under Captain Coleman and Lieutenant Briggs of the Army, was by specific authority of the Mayor, and the officers mentioned were working under the general directions given them by that official. Usually they acted in conjunction with the Fire Department, although circumstances made it necessary for them often to use their own judgment. Much of the first work done by them was ineffective because, as stated above, not enough dynamite could be obtained to blow down a sufficiently wide space ahead of the fire. They, however, did most effective work after the fire crossed Van Ness, north of Sutter. They at this time, the night of the 19th, had plenty of dynamite and the buildings were smaller. Working partly on their own initiative but guided largely by the advice of Col. Chas. Morris, Artillery Corps, they demolished enough buildings to stop the flames, without which action the city would to a certainty have been burned out to the Richmond district. I do not claim and do not deserve the slightest credit for this action, as I was not present and so can speak about it freely. On the afternoon of the 20th the Western Addition was again saved, as the flames working westward reached Van Ness north of California. This was everybody's fight and firemen, soldiers, sailors and citizens worked effectively. It was the wide street, the fact that the houses were more scattering and the water being pumped from the bay at Fort Mason that at last brought success. Although present much of the time, I did not take charge, but left the control of matters with the municipal officers where it belonged. During much of this time I was with the Mayor. He was alert and vigorous and not afraid to take responsibility, and there was no occasion for me to more than render him such assistance as lay in my power. I was giving more of my attention to the problem of feeding and sheltering the 300,000 homeless and hungry people than to fighting the fire.

I have never posed as the savior of the city or of that part of it that was saved, so that there is no occasion for such ignorant and cowardly attacks as those referred to. It is a mighty poor sort of man whose hindsight is not better than his foresight and I am free to acknowledge that if I had my part of it to do over again I would do a better job. I have no doubt the Mayor and the officials of the Fire Department will acknowledge the same thing. Such monumental catastrophes are beyond the training and the experience of all men. But I have made this letter too long. I hope it will suffice to disabuse the minds of the people of San Francisco, as I have no time to attempt to reply to every person who feels called upon to break into the columns of the press with his accounts of what he did not see and does not know.

Very respectfully,

Frederick Funston.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

For Years to Come.

Canajoharie, N. Y., June 20, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I enclose P. O. order for $5.00 for one year's subscription. I am glad to see that you still survive after all the troubles of fire and earthquake shock, and hope you will prosper and give light and good cheer for many years to come.

Yours truly,

Jno. F. Finn.

Has Been Reader from Childhood.

San Francisco, June 23, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: In accordance with your published request, I am sending you, under separate cover, some numbers of the Argonaut published this year before the fire, and trust they may help you to complete your files. I take this opportunity of expressing my gratification in the continuation of the paper's publication, and may say that my father took the Argonaut from its first number, and that I have continued reading it from my early childhood with the greatest pleasure.

With best wishes, I am Yours very truly,

J. D. Ruggles.

Government Insurance.

San Diego, Cal., June 29, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Apropos of my suggestion that the State should go in to the insurance business, and your objection that it would lead to political and administrative corruption, "which would render State insurance impossible," and that the State of California could never have paid the San Francisco losses, I would like to ask why it would not be practicable for every building in the United States to be insured by the federal government, as a matter of course. Why not save the huge expense of writing out policies and collecting premiums (consider also the saving in needless advertising) by simply considering everything insured, and raise the money by an extra State or federal tax on all assessed property—the local tax collectors paying over their receipts to the State and the State accounting to Washington.

Whenever and wherever a fire occurred a statement under oath could be sent on to the nearest Government adjuster of claims, who, of course, would be selected from the most experienced men now in the business, and the damages would be paid or the building restored out of Government funds. It might be said there would be no end of fraudulent claims, but there would be this difference between then and now: Now if a man swindles the insurance company it is nobody's business to inform against him. It purely concerns the insurance company and is nobody else's business, and many fraudulent claims are paid because the companies think it would hurt their business to dispute them. In the case of Government insurance it would be to every taxpayer's interest to see that the country wasn't robbed. I merely put the suggestion forward for consideration.

F. A. Binney.

The Argonaut Ranks First.

Editor Argonaut: I have for a long time regularly taken your valuable paper. Of all the periodicals that come to my house, the Argonaut ranks first in the estimation of myself and family. Since the fire, I have not been able to secure a copy until your last edition. Very truly yours,

W. A. Irwin.

Some War Numbers.

Palo Alto, June 17, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: In compliance with your request for back numbers we are sending a package set aside for various reasons—including the Spanish-American War.

We have long been constant readers of the Argonaut, but as suburban San Franciscans, it has been an added enjoyment to buy the Argonaut on the train each Saturday, and we greatly regret missing the two issues succeeding the fire.

With best wishes for your future prosperity,

Yours very truly,

J. S. Butler.

A Complimentary Reader.

Editor Argonaut: Herewith find $1.00—continue sending to Frank Miller, "Holly Oaks," Sausalito, Cal. Your weekly voice is more instructive than the daily yell of the yellow journals; may your shadow never again grow less.

Domestic Help Scarce.

Marin Co., June 20th.

Editor Argonaut: I congratulate you on your renewed success, deservedly won because of the promptness and regularity with which your paper has been forwarded since the fire. Would that the daily papers could learn of you how it is done.

With the fact that 100,000 people are still destitute in San Francisco and its vicinity, is it not strange that domestic help is so difficult to get, and so inefficient, and that wages are higher than ever before? Yours truly,

A Friend of the Argonaut.

From a Connecticut Reader.

Plainfield, Conn., June 15, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I send some hack numbers. I see that some numbers are missing, probably lent to friends. If these are of the least use to you, I shall be only too glad to help you in your great tribulation. If sympathy would help you any you would be helped. Truly yours,

B. A. Walker.

Not Without the Argonaut.

Oakland, June 16, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I would not be without the Argonaut at three times the price.

Yours respectfully,

A. E. Van Emden.

Another Rothschild Experience.

San Francisco, July 2, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Apropos of your Rothschild observations last week, let me relate a little incident.

A couple of years ago I was on one of my sporadic visits to Europe. I had made arrangements to have £200 a month sent me from the Bank of California to Rothschilds. When I received my first draft, I went to Rothschild, presented it, told the paying teller that I expected to receive a similar amount every month, and asked if I could deposit my drafts, and draw against them for smaller amounts, as desired. He called the manager, who presently came into the little room where I was ushered.

"What do you want?" he said in a rough, gruff, bluff voice.

I explained my request, or attempted to, but before I was half finished, he said, "No, we can't do anything of the kind."

"Very well," I said, and supposed that was the end, as it should have been, but it was not.

He continued sharply, "Why don't you get a letter of credit for Ten or Twelve Thousand Dollars at once?"

"Well," I said, "I will have to pay for the letter of credit and by getting my monthly income of One Thousand Dollars this way, which it is all I want to spend in Europe, it comes out of my revenue."

"Yes," he said, "that it is just the way with you Americans, you want to make it all."

"Well," I observed, "you cannot complain, in any event you will get your business with the Bank of California."

"Oh," he said, "only a small commission not worth talking about," with a shrug of the shoulders.

I was so astonished that I really did not say what I might have said or perhaps what I should have said. However, on going out, the same Paying Teller said to me, who had evidently heard the conversation, "Lord Rothschild is a gentleman, this man is not."

Acting on the hint, like Othello, I wrote a note to Lord Rothschild, relating the circumstances as I have stated them now. A representative of his called at my hotel, and made very ample apologies, stating that the manager in question had been ill, and just come back from the Springs, and they were very sorry, etc. I asked Lord Rothschild's representative if the letter had been shown to this man, who had the management of the concern, and he said it had, and he could not deny the truth. Since then, of course, I transacted no business with that concern.

More Argonauts for Our Files.

Portland, June 29, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Being a yearly subscriber of the "Argonaut" ever since I resided in this city, over 28 years, and having read in one of your issues that you are desirous of obtaining some copies of the "Argonaut" prior to the San Francisco disaster, I forward to you to-day, by express, charges paid, some copies of 1903, '04, '05 and '06, which please accept with my compliments.

Wishing you renewed and deserved success, I am

Very truly yours, B. Neustadter.

In the course of the hostilities between Mexicans and Americans at the Greene Consolidated Copper Mines, the latter, no doubt, frequently referred to the former as "Greasers." Bret Harte once explained that a Greaser was a Mexican-Indian halfbreed; but undoubtedly it has commonly been used in American slang to signify any sort of Mexican. A writer in the forties set forth that "the Mexicans are called 'Spaniards' or 'Greasers' (from their greasy appearance) by the Western people," and Bartlett explains "Greaser" as "a term vulgarly applied to the Mexicans and other Spanish Americans," which first became common during the United States war with Mexico. It is used, no doubt, as loosely as "nigger."

Recent sales of Los Angeles realty indicate the astonishingly high values of business frontages in that city. One sale was the 40 by 150 feet on the east side of South Spring street, 80 feet south of Sixth, to E. P. Bryan of Clark & Bryan from Harry Gray for $125,000. As the improvements are not expensive the front foot price of $3,125 fairly represents the ground value. The improvements are rented for $6,600 a year.

A REAL EARTHQUAKE CITY.

The Thrilling Experience of an American in Venezuela—Caracas, an Incessant Centre of Earthquakes.

Caracas has got used to earthquakes, as Mexico to revolutions. Their frequency has developed a special nomenclature. "Terremoto," the literal translation of our comprehensive term, would bere be as insufficient as the word hurricane for the description of all kinds of atmospheric disturbances; "temblor," "vibración," "tremor," "golpe," "rasgo," "rasgada," "terremoto," express only a part of the wide scale between a faint vibration and a wall-breaking shock. Of temblors the city has at the very least a semi-weekly supply; "golpes" (involving broken windows and fractured brick walls) occur about twice a year—in some years every month. Last year Caracas weathered fourteen or fifteen of them. During the disastrous first week of September I had a remarkable proof how familiar long experience has made the populace with the attendant and prospective phenomena of the various kinds of earthquakes, and also how impossible it is to predict the day of their advent. As a general rule, a turbulent spring is followed by a quiet summer; and when I deposited my surveying instruments in the Posada de San Gabriel, the landlord congratulated me on the prospect of a "tiempo mas pacifico," a period of more than usual peace. There had been two severe shocks in the preceding month and no end of temblors, and the probabilities were that the best of the year would make amends. The atmospheric indications were also more favorable; the ominous mist of the Coast Range had cleared away, and for a week or so we could sleep in peace. This was on the 5th of September. The following day was even brighter. A light haze veiled the horizon of the Orinoco Valley, where the rainy season still resisted the influence of the trade-winds, but not a cloud approached the coast plain. The air was both clear and cool. But in the afternoon, about an hour before sunset, I heard a sound of hurried footsteps on the front stairs of the hotel, and the guests on the veranda put their heads together.

"What is it?" I inquired. "The stage room Guarenas?"

"No; I wish it was," said the landlord. The driver could tell us about it, I suppose. They say there has been another temblor on the river, all the way from Guarenas to Sao."

"Yes, and clear across the coast," added one of the newcomers. "The Artesas in Santa Rita (the northern suburb of Caracas) are quite sure that they felt it in their own garden. It jarred the glass in their garden-house."

"Well," said the landlord, "if it is not a local shake, we need not care. The uplanders have not had their fair share, anyhow."

The stage was late that evening. Between Santa Rita and the hotel the driver had been stopped at nearly every street corner, and his arrival filled the house with news-mongers. There had been two very perceptible jars at Guarenas, and half an hour after he had left the village he had heard a many-voiced shout, very likely a signal of something worse than a temblor. Guarenas is the alarm station of the Aranco track. Its valley seems to be the very centre of the Caracas earthquake region; and an alarm cry, or sometimes the boom of a old howitzer, is a well-understood danger signal for the neighboring villages.

"Yes, that settles it," said the landlord. It's a golpe de fuera (a shock from the outer regions, a non-local disturbance) and may reach all the way to Cumans."

The local earthquakes seem to have their centre in the mountains of Caracas, and seldom reach the coast, while the pandemic shocks are supposed to originate in the Andes of New Granada, and often shake the continent from the Isthmus to the mouth of the Orinoco.

"At what time tomorrow," I inquired, "do you think we shall have another shak?"

"It will be sooner than tomorrow, if it comes at all," said the posadero; "but it will not ruin us, or we should have had a care of it before this."

The night was clouded, but certainly not sultry, and at nine o'clock the streets were still full of promenaders. Two hours later I was awakened by the rattling of a passing carriage, mingled with the hum of so many voices on the veranda, that I was not quite sure if the sudden vibration of window-shutter came from below or from the window of my bedroom. The next moment all was absolutely still. Was it the expectant silence of a whole city listening for a repetition of the tremor? I do not know if the heavier earthquake shocks are preceded by any sensible, though inaudible symptoms; but I remember that in walking toward the window I clutched the bed-post just before the house was shaken by a violent concussion, directly followed by several short, sharp jolts, such as the occupants of a heavy coach might feel if the freak of a runaway horse should jerk the vehicle to the top of a narrow platform and then rattle it down a flight of steps on the other side. There was a general rush downstairs. "Never mind the bottles, Frank," I heard the landlord call out to one of his waiters. "Just move the cupboard back, and shut the windows. Say, run back and tell Pablo (his youngest son) to hurry up." "No, it is not over yet," he replied to a sotto voce remark of the professor. The people of Caracas seemed to share that opinion. There was a light in nearly every window, and the square was nearly full of refugees, while a number of "serenos," or night-watchmen, ran from house to house and knocked hurriedly at every unopened door. The capital of Venezuela signals its loyalty by the consumption of native wines, and the sleep of some extra patriotic burgher might be earthquake proof.

"Yes, that was a 'golpe transversal,'" remarked the landlord, "a transverse shock that did not come from our mountains but merely crossed them on its way to the coast. If it goes in its old track, I am afraid the people of Rio Chico will have to build their cabins over again, this third time since last February."

The sky had cleared up, and a late moon brightened the housetops with its peaceful light; but now and then the windows rattled ominously, and the watchmen were still hammering away from door to door, when nature found a way to second their efforts in a very effectual manner. A shock like the thump of an explosion shook the town, and on the lower steps of the veranda (resting on nearly a level with the ground) I felt a push, as if the flagstones under my feet had been dislodged by a sideward blow. All along the street pieces of broken glass and stucco rattled down on the pavement; the assembly on the plaza swelled suddenly to a vociferous crowd; the great bell of Alta Gracia rang out a booming alarm appeal and a minute after a six-horse carriage came tearing down the street with the impetus of a fireman's team—the patrol wagon, going to the penitentiary to remove and guard the prisoners. The bells paused for a moment, and "Dios, Dios, ten piedad!" (Have mercy, Lord!) resounded through the streets as words spoken in a closed room; for I believe that the prayer was uttered by half the inhabitants of the populous town. There was no kneeling in the streets and no ceremonies; the cry came from their hearts, and, though nobody shouted, the thirty thousand voices swelled the chorus, above all the din and tumult of the distracted city. For the next ten minutes the clatter of the falling debris continued, as if the buildings were still vibrating from the after-effects of the first concussion; for the occasional underground rumblings felt rather like the recoil of a distant shock. But presently the multitude crowded toward the up-town quarters. There was a panic in one of the river suburbs and even through the tramp of general flight we could hear the distant echo of an outcry that meant something more than the yells of an idle mob. The warehouse of the associated foreign merchants had fallen, and the custom house building was "dislocado"—disjointed and top heavy, and going to collapse. Rumor added that the Plaza de la Torre was a mass of ruins; the mischief was spreading; the prophecy of Doctor Ortiz—a local Vennor—was coming to pass.

"All possible," said the landlord, "but we are safe. It's spreading northward; it has passed us, and the golpes de fuera never turn back."

He said this in a tone of conviction and, indeed, soon after locked his office door, and sent his children to bed. The next morning the crowd around the telegraph office almost blocked the street. Caracas has no Associated Press, and the telegraph companies issue official bulletins at five or ten cents each, according to the size and import. This morning their middlemen charged a real (about twelve and a half cents) and twice as much to buyers who would not wait, for the demand exceeded the supply. The earthquake had shaken the whole north coast of South America, besides five of the seven Isthmus States, with the main axis of its progress along the track of 1826. The shock at twenty minutes after two o'clock a. m. had traveled three thousand miles in less than half an hour. Guayaquil, Ventura, Maracaibo, Caracas, Aspinwall and San Juan de Nicaragua had been visited by a coast wave, that tore ships from their moorings, and buried hundreds of shore-dwellers under the ruins of their houses. In Venezuela the Aranco track had deflected the main wave, and the coast towns had suffered comparatively little with the exception of Rio Chico (the very place my host had mentioned when he recognized the shock as a "golpe transversal"), where half the buildings, mostly adobe cabins, had been prostrated by the first concussion. In Caracas itself the total loss amounted to eight persons killed, twenty-six wounded, sixty-two buildings totally destroyed, and sixty-seven "disjointed," or badly cracked. The serious damage was confined almost wholly to the river suburb. The uptown quarters had escaped with broken stuccoes, and the famous Calle de San Martin was again entirely unharmed. In 1812 fourteen thousand persons were killed by the fall of their dwellings.

Caracas, founded in 1567, has been visited by eighteen terremotos or earthquakes of the first magnitude. "Golpes," rumblings and tremors are never counted, but must amount to an average of sixty appreciable shocks per year; involving an average yearly damage of three hundred thousand dollars, or the equivalent of a per capita tax of four dollars. This impost has taxed the ingenuity of the inhabitants, and taught them some useful lessons. Projecting basement corners (giving the house a slightly pyramidal appearance) have been found safer than absolutely perpendicular walls; mortised corner-stones and roof-beams have saved many lives, when the central walls have split from top to bottom; vaults and keystone arches, no matter how massive, are more perilous than common wooden lintels, and there are many isolated buildings in the city. In many streets broad iron girders riveted to the wall, about a foot above the house-door, run from house to house, along the front of an entire square. Turret-like brick chimneys, with iron top-ornaments, would expose the architect to the vengeance of an excited mob; the roofs are flat, or flat terraced; the chimney-flues terminate near the eaves in a perforated lid. Every house has its "lado seguro," or safety side, where the inhabitants place their fragile property; and there is a supposed and not altogether imaginary connection between north sides and security. The transcontinental shocks move from west to east, the local ones from east to west, and sometimes from northeast to northwest; so that in two out of three cases the west and east walls have been stricken broadside, while no shock has ever approached the town from the north,—that is, from the direction of the sea. A native of Venezuela would laugh at the idea that a "terremoto" is an upheaval of the ground. The movement of dislodged rocks, the disjointment of house walls and their way of falling, the motions of a tidal wave during the progress of an earthquake, all prove that the shock is a lateral push and its operation could be imitated by covering a table with loose pebbles, card-houses, etc., and striking the edge of the board. Bedsteads, experts say, should not be placed too near a window, for if the wall gives way it is apt to split along the weakest line of the masonry. For the same reason, it is unlucky to stand in an open door. The safest place during the progress of an earthquake, is the north side, or the center of a room, or else the middle of an open street. I noticed that the owner of a lucky house is apt to overrate its stability; for even in the perilous districts the markets are often crowded with buyers and sellers, while an adjoining street resounds with the crash of falling bricks. Low water, not preceded by an unusual drought, is a suspicious sign; and if the Cura spring fails at the same time believers go to bed with their boots on, although skeptics assert that both phenomena are apt to prophesy after the event. A mist in the afternoon is regarded as a harbinger of mischief, and in order to distinguish it from a common dust haze the natives watch the wooded heights of San Sebastian; for during the dry season the "paramos"—the treeless tablelands north of the city—are in a chronic state of haziness.

Tender-footed cats may feel a vibration before it becomes distinct enough to affect a bell-frame, but most animals are as indifferent to such portents as to their fulfillment. A moderately well-rooted forest tree can stand an earthquake better than any building, and to the inhabitants of the prairies the most violent trembling of the ground can cause nothing but a trifling inconvenience, a momentary difficulty to preserve their equilibrium. On the pastures of Venezuela cattle graze peacefully the year round, except in the mountains, where the noise of falling rocks sometimes stampedes a whole herd. Still, there is a tradition that, a few hours before the catastrophe of 1812, a Spanish stallion broke out of its river suburbs, and took refuge in the eastern highlands.

Caracas is moving eastward; the upper (northeastern) suburbs grow from year to year, while the streets below the mint exhibit manifold signs of neglect. The agricultural population of the surrounding country has steadily increased, for crops are not materially the worse for a periodical instability of the ground, except perhaps in the orange district of Valencia, and at the mouth of the coast rivers, where tidal waves have often submerged the littoral plantations. Intelligent observers, therefore, predict that, in spite of local and imported earthquakes, the population of Northern Venezuela will continue to increase, but that the present site of Caracas will ultimately be abandoned.—Horace D. Warner.

Argonauts for Our Files.

In response to the Argonaut's request for loose and unconnected copies of the Argonaut which we would be glad to have in order to build up complete files, we have received packages of papers from a number of our readers. Among the many who have very kindly sent us papers and to whom we extend our thanks are the following:

OLD FAVORITES.

A Maudle-In Bajlad.

(To his Lily.)

My lank limp lily, my long lithe lily,
My languid lily-love fragile and thin.
With dank leaves dangling and flower-flap chilly,
That shines like the shin of a Highland gilly!
Mottled and moist as a cold toad's skin!
Lustrous and leper-white, splendid and splay!
Art thou not Utter and wholly akin
To my own wan soul and my own wan chin,
And my own wan nose-tilt, tilted to sway
The peacock's feather, sweeter than sin,
That I bought for a halfpenny yesterday?

My long lithe lily, my languid lily,
My lank limp lily-love, how shall I win—
Woo thee to wink at me? Silver lily,
How shall I sing to thee, softly or shrilly?
What shall I weave for thee—what shall I spin—
Rondel, or rondeau, or virelai?
Shall I buzz like a bee with my face thrust in Thy choice, chaste chalice, or choose me a tin
Trumpet, or touchingly, tenderly play
On the weird bird-whistle, sweeter than sin,
That I bought for a halfpenny yesterday.

My languid lily, my lank limp lily,
My long lithe lily-love, men may grin—
Say that I'm soft and supremely silly—
What care I while you whisper stilly?
What care I while you smile? Not a pin!
While you smile, while you whisper—'Tis sweet to decay?

I have watered with chlorodine, tears of chagrin,
The church-yard mold I have planted thee in,
Upside down in an intense way,
In a rough red flower-pot, sweeter than sin,
That I bought for a halfpenny yesterday.—Anon.

Lovers and a Reflection.

In moss-prankt dells which the sunbeams flatter
(And heaven it knoweth what that may mean; Meaning, however, is no great matter)
Where woods are a-tremble with rifts atween;

Thro' God's own heather we wonned together,
I and my Willie (O love my love):
I need hardly remark it was glorious weather,
And flitter-bats wavered aloof, above:

Boats were courtseying, rising, bowing,
(Boats in that climate are so polite),
And sands were a ribbon of green endowing
And O the sun-dazzle on bark and bight!

Song-birds darted about, some ink
As coal, some snowy (I ween) as curds;
Or rosy as pinks, or as roses pinky—
They reek of no eerie To come, those birds!

But they skim over bents which the mill-stream washes,
Or hang in the lift 'neath a white cloud's hem;
They need no parasols, no goloshes;
And good Mrs. Trimmer she feedeth them.

Then we thrif'd God's cowslips (as erst his heather),
That endowed the wan grass with their golden blooms;
And snapt—(it was perfectly charming weather)—
Our fingers at Fate and her goddess-glooms:

Thro' the red heather we danced together
(O love my Willie), and smelt for flowers:
I must mention again it was glorious weather,
Rhymes are so scarce in this world of ours:

By rises that flushed with their purple favors,
Thro' becks that brattled o'er grasses sheen,
We walked or waded, we two young shavers,
Thanking our stars we were both so green.

We journeyed in parallels, I and Willie,
In fortunate parallels! Butterflies,
Hid in weltering shadows of daffodilly
Or marjoram, kept making peacock eyes:

And Willie 'gan sing—(Oh, his notes were fluty; Wafts fluttered them out to the white-winged sea)—
Something made up of rhymes that have done much duty,
Rhymes (better to put it) of "ancientry":

Bowers of flowers encountered showers
In William's carol—(O love my Willie!)
Then he bade sorrow borrow from blithe to-morrow
I quite forget what—say a daffodilly.

A nest in a hollow, "with buds to follow,"
I think occurred next in his nimble strain;
And clay that was "kneaden" of course in Eden—
A rhyme most novel I do maintain:

Mists, bones, the singer himself, love-stories,
And all least furlable things got "furl'd";
Not with any design to conceal their glories,
But simply and solely to rhyme with "world."

O if billows and pillows and hours and flowers,
And all the brave rhymes of an elder day,
Could be furled together, this genial weather,
And carted or carried on wafts away,
Nor ever again trotted out—ay me!
How much fewer volumes of verse there'd be.
—C. S. Calverly.

The Shipping Guide says that there are 32 large steamers and 44 sailing vessels now on the way to San Francisco with material for the reconstruction of the burned districts. The cargoes consist chiefly of structural steel and cements. The greater number of the vessels are coming from New York, Philadelphia, London, Antwerp and Hamburg.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Andrew L. Harris goes into office at a greater age than that of any man before him when he took the oath of office as Governor of Ohio. The next oldest man was William Allen, the Democrat chosen in 1873, who was 66 at that time. Mr. Harris will be 71 next fall.

The east side of New York has a Portia who is making a success of her chosen vocation. She is Esther Kunstler, aged 22. She has been regularly admitted to the bar and has taken upon herself the task of defending the poor people on the east side. She is becoming famous for courtroom re-partee.

President Roosevelt appeared one day last week clad in white except as to his shoes which were of tan. He wore a short coat of white linen and trousers of the same material and a white shirt of some soft stuff. He did not wear a waistcoat, and his trousers were held up by a leather belt. He looked cool, comfortable and the picture of health.

Levi Reed, the first white child born of the site of Chicago more than 78 years ago and a pioneer of the Pacific Coast, died in Portland on June 23. When Chicago was not dreamed of the parents of Levi Reed lived at Fort Dearborn, a frontier stockade erected to protect the whites from the Indians, and while they lived there he was born, the first white child.

At the Miami University commencement at Hamilton, O., Senator Dolliver of Iowa appeared as the principal speaker in the academic gown of a doctor of laws. The Senator remarked that he felt as if he were in bathing suit and a peekaboo bonnet. When the audience laughed Senator Dolliver turned to President Benson and said: "I have said nothing funny. I believe the people are laughing at my clothes." He then took off the gown and dropped it upon the floor, where it remained until he had finished.

Oscar Hammerstein, while abroad in search of operatic stars, discovered a Russian giant, Marchnow, whom he brought with him to this country last week. Marchnow stands nine feet, three inches in height, stocking feet, and weighs more than 400 pounds. When Marchnow reached Dover preparatory to sailing for New York, he refused to leave the car to board the steamer. At length, wildly fighting and protesting, he was placed on a stretcher formed by the shoulders of twenty-two seamen and carried to the Pretoria's deck.

Lady Mary Hamilton, only daughter of the late twelfth Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, and the richest woman in Great Britain, who was recently married to the Marquis of Graham, eldest son of the Duke of Montrose, is extremely popular among the English working class. During the by-election in April she inaugurated what became known as a "laides' battle," by actively campaigning in behalf of her future husband, who, however, was defeated by Pearson, Liberal, a son of Sir Weetm Pearson, by a majority of 197. Mrs. Pearson, the young wife of the Liberal candidate, also took part in the fray. The campaign was one of the most lively of recent years, begging the people to give her as wedding present the election of her future husband to Parliament.

Harry Nelson Pillsbury, the chess master, died at Philadelphia on June 17th of apoplexy, after an illness of many months. His first notable victory at chess was a score five to four in a match with John F. Bar of Boston, in 1891. In 1893 he won the New York city tournament with a total of seven out of a possible nine, and in 1895 won first prize at the Hastings tournament against many of the strongest players of the world. This victory logically made him one of a quartette of the then most famous players named to compete at St. Petersburg—Lasker, Steinitz, Tschigorin and Pillsbury. Lasker scored with the world's champion, Pillsbury was 3-1-2 to 2-1-2. In all Pillsbury played in fourteen international chess tournaments and was a prize winner in all except one. Blindfold chess, it is said, his record has never been equaled.

OXFORD: TOWN AND GOWN.

By Jerome Hart.

Oxford as a primitive seat of learning dates from the time of Alfred the Great. Some writers date it even earlier. But the original town was completely wiped out at the time of the Danish conquest. Modern Oxford goes back only to the time of William the Conqueror. The monasteries founded there about that time were practically the beginning of the present colleges. Oxford is monastic. Even the town plan is cruciform—four wide streets lead out toward the points of the compass from the central place called "Carfax," a corruption of "Quatre voies," "Four ways." High Street, with its buildings, is regarded as "one of the most magnificent streets in Europe." At least it is so regarded in Oxford.

Oxford and Cambridge differ diametrically from Harvard and Yale. The American universities are homogeneous. The English universities are heterogeneous. The American universities are made up of a president and faculty ruling several thousands of students on well-defined lines. The English universities are made up of some score of colleges, each college with a different foundation and differing radically in customs and rules.

A student from one of the Oxford colleges is much more apt to say that he is an Oriel, a Merton, or a Magdalen man than he is an Oxford man.

Volumes have been written about each of the single colleges and halls, of which there are some thirty odd, making up the University of Oxford. It would be impossible therefore to write about all of them in the limits of a newspaper article.

The customs in the Halls of Oxford date back to monastic times. As the monks had nothing whatever to do except to pray and eat, they spent much time eating. Presumably, they may have spent much time praying, but as to that history sayeth not. If there is anything in which modern Oxford strongly resembles its monastic forebears it is in the fact that it apparently has little to do. Oxford is never in a hurry. The customs in Hall are also apparently founded on the manners of the old monks in their refectories. A German student visiting Oxford a couple of centuries ago found the Halls divided into three tables: The first, called the "Fellows' table," at which were seated earls, barons, gentlemen, and doctors; the second, for master of arts, bachelors, minor gentlemen, and eminent commoners; the third, for people of ordinary condition. Were the German student to revisit the glimpses of the moon after his trip of two hundred years ago, he would find matters much the same at Oxford now. The dinner in Hall usually begins at six and in some cases at seven. It is inaugurated by grace, gabbled rapidly in Latin, very much as the old monks must have gabbled it, probably. Grace is usually said from the high table.

The day I was at one of the Halls the bill of fare read exactly as follows:

Fish.
Entree.
Joint.
Sweet.

This is the ordinary bill of fare; it is varied by changing from fish to soup and soup to fish. The average charge for the repast is two shillings; in some colleges less.

It goes without saying that this Spartan menu is intended for the table at which sit persons of low degree. The fellows, the earls, barons, and the gentlemen had the following Lucullan repast served to them on the same day:

Bisque Soup.
Roast Mutton.
Roast Veal and Bacon.
Pineapple Cream Ice and Wafers.
Fruit Jelly.
Cheese and Butter.

EXTRAS.

Poulet a la Chasseur, one shilling.

Asparagus, sevenpence.

New Potatoes, threepence.
Cream, twopence.

Cold Savoury, fourpence.

Here, again, is one struck with the resemblance between the old monastic usages and those of Oxford today. Doubtless the fat, red-nosed Abbot; his Sacristan, with fair round paunch; his Almoner, with bulbous belly with good capon lined; and the other spiritual gentry of high rank, sat at the upper table and lived on these costly viands, while far below the salt, at the last table of all, sat the humble lay brothers, the scullions, the male chambermaids of the monkery, those who washed the pots and pans which held the sauces and gravies that made glad the Abbot's heart.

Attendance in Hall at least five times a week is compulsory, and absentees are fined. Too many absences during term are apt to lead to the "rustication" of the offender. Still, it is generally understood in Oxford that the regular eating of so many dinners means a degree. Thus it would seem that higher education there depends rather on the intestinal than the cerebral convolutions. Gowns must be worn in Hall, and black coats are required, but the rule is little heeded. Still a coat of too noisy a pattern may bring down a request from the high table that its wearer go out and change it. The meals in Hall are hurried, rarely lasting more than thirty-five minutes. They can scarcely be called social functions.

If the meals in Hall are not brilliant, the quarters are magnificent. The Hall is usually lofty, and rich carving and stained-glass windows may be seen on every hand. The Hall at Christ Church is said to be the finest dining-hall in the world. It has a magnificent carved oak ceiling, and at one end two fine bay windows resembling those at Hampton Court Palace. The walls are hung with portraits by Holbein, Lely, Lawrence, Van Dyck, Kneller, Hogarth, Reynolds, Gainsborough, and other masters. The Hall has been used on several occasions for theatrical performances before royalty, and King Charles the First once held a parliament there. A portrait of Queen Elizabeth hangs in Hall as a "founder," because she united Christ Church with Westminster.

One of the most notable pictures in Christ Church Hall is that of Gladstone, by Sir John Millais. The picture shows him in his rich red robes as a D. C. L., at the age of seventy-six. Christ Church seems to be very proud of Gladstone. As Oxford it, and always has been, extremely conservative, not to say retrograde, I do not know whether the university generally shares in Christ Church's pride. If it does, I do not know whether it is proud of the beginning or the ending of Gladstone's career, for he started in as a dyed-in-the-wool Tory and ended up as a semi-socialistic Radical.

The Sheldonian Theatre is the scene of the Oxford commemoration, where are conferred the honorary degrees. On the occasion of my visit, the chancellor of the university, Lord Goschen, successor to Lord Salisbury, presided for the first time over the convocation and conferred the degrees. The list of those who received them was long, including many distinguished men; therefore the audience was an unusually brilliant one. The demand for tickets was naturally large. Knowing not Oxford ways, I despaired for a time of obtaining access to the theatre. But I found a perfectly respectable and well-clad attendant—a pious man, for I saw him praying devoutly afterward in Magdalen Chapel—which honest and pious servant, for and in consideration of a small bribe, got us excellent seats.

The recipients of the honorary degrees were headed by the French ambassador, Mr. Cambon, and the vice-chancellor. These gentlemen were handled in three batches, if I may use the term. The first batch received the degree of doctor of civil law. They were as follows:

David Binning Monro, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Bishop of Worcester, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, Lord Tennison, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Herbert Henry Asquith, George Wyndham, Sir Richard Henn Collins, Sir Frederick William Richards, Sir John Denton Pinkstone French, Pasquale Villari, John Singer Sargent, and Charles Booth.

The second received the degree of doctor of science. They were as follows:

Charles Algernon Parsons, Guglielmo Marconi, Sir William Selby Church, Sir

Andrew Noble, Sir William Crookes, Sir David Gill, Sir John Murray, Alfred Marshall, Joseph John Thomson, Horace Lamb, Andrew Russell Forsyth, James Dewar and Joseph Larmor.

The third received the degree of doctor of letters. They were as follows:

Mr. Bywater, Lord Reay, Sir Spencer Walpole, William Dean Howells, Lewis Campbell, William Lambert Newman, and Andrew Lang.

The audience certainly had a great deal of color. In addition to the light-colored costumes of the hundreds of women in the gathering, there were the doctors of letters, medicine, and science, in gowns of brilliant crimson, purple, and the duller gray. Then there were the masters of arts, in their black gowns and crimson hoods. Every now and again you would see the blue silk and white fur of a bachelor in civil law or music.

While we were waiting for the procession to enter we were regaled with selections on the great organ. With a thrill of patriotic pride, I noticed that the organist moved his audience more strongly with an American cake-walk than he did with "Rule Britannia."

Lord Goschen opened the convocation. He wore a gorgeous black and gold robe as chancellor of the university. (Really, this sounds as if I were describing the ladies' costumes at an afternoon tea.) Each candidate was presented by his sponsor in a Latin speech, which was answered by Lord Goschen in another Latin speech, in which the many good qualities of the candidate were dwelt upon at length. It was difficult for all of us to hear the Latin speeches—probably more difficult for most of us to understand them; but it was quite apparent that Lord Goschen indulged largely in superlatives. The Bishop of Canterbury was "grandissimus"; Lord Curzon was "illustrissimus"; Speaker Gully was "sapientissimus"; General French was "fortissimus"; while our own artist, Mr. Sargent, was "spectatissimus." The most interesting persons to receive degrees were (naturally to us) Americans—Mr. Sargent, the artist, and Mr. Howells, the writer. Probably the most notable person on the list was the French ambassador, Mr. Cambon, owing to the then newly born friendship between England and France. Lord Curzon also attracted much attention; he looked pale and ill, and was leaning on a stick. The Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Gully, made one of his phenomenally infrequent absences from the House, having been given special permission to "proceed to Oxford to receive a degree." Mr. Howells was greeted with very cordial applause.

I had always heard of the propensity of Oxford undergraduates at convocation to chaff the candidates from the gallery, which procedure is tolerated by the university authorities. Undergraduate humor generally is not noted for its subtlety. British undergraduate humor is probably less subtle than the American. For example, when Sir John Millais received a degree at Oxford, the undergraduates solemnly lowered a pot of Brunswick black from the gallery. Even to the meanest intelligence it was apparent that this was a merry undergraduate jest on the fact that he was the painter of the "Black Brunswicker." It is to laugh.

But on this occasion the undergraduate gallery was strangely silent. Perhaps they were overcome by the brilliant array before them. No merry jest was cracked, no pot of paint was lowered. The only joke I heard was when Lord Reay was introduced whereupon the gallery shouted "Hoo-reay." After a decent interval for reflection, the audience broke out into mournful laughter.

An instance of British conservatism amused me not a little. A bar separated the chancellor and his dais from the profane vulgar, in whom I include the candidates. When each candidate was introduced an official lifted the bar, whereupon each candidate instinctively stepped forward to the dais. In every case the official gravely caught him and held him back.

There were thirty-four candidates, and every one of the thirty-four saw the bar lifted, stepped forward, was stopped, balked, blushed, and then proceeded when the chancellor stopped speaking.

The Boston Newsboys, a protective union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, has voted to send one of its members to Harvard University in the fall. The union some time ago started a scholarship fund, hoping to raise $5000. The fund now amounts to $2500, which yields an income of $100. President Elliot, an honorary member of the union, urged the body not to wait until the fund is complete, offering to accept the income of the present amount until it is larger. The beneficiary of the fund will be selected by competitive examination.

"Americans as a rule dress far better and more smartly than Europeans," he says. "Side by side with the latter they invariably have the appearance of being turned out spick and span. An American who had landed at Hamburg on his first European tour told us how surprised he had been to notice that 'only poor people live in Europe!'"

Bertha Krupp, the richest girl in the world, owner of the great gun works which her father established at Essen, Germany, is soon to be married. Miss Krupp, who holds nearly all of the $40,000,000 capital stock of the great gun works, has an income of $2,400,000 a year—about $6,600 a day. When her mother dies Bertha and her younger sister, Barbara, will divide $75,000,000 more between them in stocks and bonds and property, including iron and coal mines in Westphalia and Spain. Bertha owns the whole town of Essen. Miss Krupp is good looking, religious, unassuming and dresses plainly. She personally attends to the beautiful little Florentine garden her late father laid out for her. She has had an orchid house constructed and she has collected rare floral specimens from England and South America.

"Hothouse lamb" is beginning to appear on the menus at many of the first-class hotels, says the New York Sun. This particular delicacy has been in season for a month or more, but it has been so expensive that only the highest priced places have offered it. Now that the regular season is waning and the ordinary spring lamb is coming into market the price has dropped to where most good restaurants can touch it. A quarter of hothouse lamb can now be bought, if one is willing to pay $4 or $5 for it.

England is littered with dismal maiden women and grumpy old bachelors who, having been thwarted in love in early youth, have made a point of passing through life deaf and blind to the charm of everybody in the world save the one they happen to have lost. This is glorifying into a virtue what is in reality nothing but pig-headedness and want of imagination, remarks a cynical lady writer,

The intimation contained in the cable dispatches to the effect that Alfred de Rothschild had loaned his private band to the American Ambassador to discourse sweet music during the dinner given at Dorchester House, in honor of King Edward, serves to draw attention to a form of luxury which, so far as I am aware, has not yet crossed the Atlantic and is unknown until now in America, writes a London correspondent. The private orchestra of Baron Alfred Rothschild is famous

What Sacramento thinks of Los Angeles is shown in these remarks by the San Francisco correspondent of the Sacramento Union. What Los Angeles thinks of Sacramento we doubtless soon shall hear:

If I were in Northern California and should miss a friend who had lost an eye, an ear, a leg, a lung, his mind, or any other useful or ornamental organ, I would repair immediately to this town. Here I would be sure to discover him. In San Francisco for forty years I had watched every variety of the peculiar human animal disappear—all sorts and conditions of the race in whom nature had manifested her various expressions, wondering all the time whence and where they went.

It is all clear now. They are all down here, contemplating the beauties of this wonderful place and growing fatter and sleeker in its stimulating sunshine. Cranks who, in San Francisco, would have starved years ago, are here comfortable and prosperous; preachers who, even in Oakland, found the pasturage short and dry, here have rich and prosperous flocks; Christian science healers, progressive free-lovers, astrologers, clairvoyants, political economists and other advanced "thinkers," whose names have been familiar to me for decades, are all here doing well. What I cannot understand is this: Why did Messiah Dowie locate in Chicago when he could have been so happy in Los Angeles?

But this is not by any means (to me) the funniest thing about this funny town. Every one of these people is blown up with the immensity and importance of Los Angeles. No statement concerning its intrinsic greatness is too extravagant, and no praise of its present and future too absurd, for their immediate and serious acceptance.

Social and diplomatic London has not ceased discussing Ambassador and Mrs. Reid's reception at Dorchester House to Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth at which King Edward was a guest. The company included Cabinet Ministers, political leaders of both parties, diplomats and persons of prominence in English society. Dinner was served in the main dining hall, which contains many of the valuable paintings for which Dorchester House is famous. King Edward took out Mrs. Reid, and at the King's desire Mrs. Longworth was seated at the other side of him, thus taking precedence of the duchesses. Ambassador Reid escorted the Duchess of Marlborough with the Duchess of Buccleuch on his left. There was Emperor William showed special attention to the Longworths during the Kiel regatta. He entertained the distinguished young couple aboard the Imperial yacht. It was quite an American evening. Besides Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, Allison, Howard and George Armour and Mr. and Mrs. Jordan Mott were present. Princess Estel was amiable and Emperor William jolly and complimentary to America and Americans.

After the dinner the Emperor and Princess Eitel, with their guests and the Emperor's staff, went on the quarterdeck of the Hamburg to witness the illuminations. The clubhouse, the hotel and other buildings were outlined in electric lights, and the sixteen battleships and ten cruisers in the harbor were strung with incandescent globes, while many searchlights playing about made a gorgeous scene. Just above the room in the hotel occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Longworth were the Stars and Stripes in colored lights. A great assemblage from Kell and neighboring towns crowded the water front to witness the illumination. Mr. and Mrs. Longworth were detained by Emperor William until after 11 o'clock. The illumination ended by the war ships sending up blazing rockets.

Vance Thompson gives us a sketch, in the Woman's Home Companion, of the man dressmaker of Paris. The dressmaker is a slim young man with a long nose and big, winsome eyes, says Mr. Thompson. Wearing a gray frock coat and patent leather shoes—corseted and powdered and perfumed—he is more than a man; he is a dressmaker. He is saturated with dandyism. It is not of an offensive kind. His manners are a strange mixture of humility and insolence, for he is at once a salesman and an artist. And he talks, talks, talks—bending his slim body into polite curves—gesticulating with his thin white hands—rolling his eyes in their painted orbits; the while he fumbles silks and velvets and satins and lace and wool.

The mere man who comes into a dressmaker's shop of an afternoon—in Paris no one goes to the dressmaker's save only in the afternoon—begins by sneering at this fantastic creature. That mood does not last long. Contempt gives way to admiration. There is something marvelous in the way this lord of lace and ribbon dominates the women—the royal highness as well as the spoilt actress. He is charming; he is frivolous. Then of a sudden his face darkens; he becomes serious; he stares at her royal highness, studying her form from head to foot; he smites his brow and cries despairingly: "No! no! I can't see you in that gown—to-day I can't see you in any gown—I will study—an inspiration will come—you must wait." And royalty goes away flattered, she knows not why.

At the opening of the tourist season Switzerland has more than 2000 hotels which, altogether, can accommodate 115,000 travelers at one time. It will cost 110,000,000 to run them, but it is calculated that they will take in $240,000,000 from the expected 490,000 tourists. They employ 28,000 persons. Indeed, there is hardly one of the inhabitants of Switzerland who does not derive some profit from the influx of travelers to the Swiss mountains during the summer.

An unpleasant squabble such as took place one evening last week might be expected in a frontier bar-room, in the cafe of the Waldorf-Astoria, New York. The participants were New York. The participants were Dick Plunkitt, ex-Sheriff of Tombstone, Colonel Dinklesheets, who runs a newspaper in that place, and Bat Masterson, Deputy United States Marshal. Plunkitt, Dinklesheets and several other Western men were in the cafe discussing Masterson's reputation as a bad man, which had been questioned in the New York Press, which once devoted a large part of a page to showing up Masterson as the hero of battles that were invariably bloodless, and as having been ignominiously arrested in New York once as a common gambler. The conversation of Plunkitt and companions was along these lines when Masterson joined the party and took exception to the remarks. In the ensuing unpleasantness Dinklesheets struck at Masterson, missed and was knocked down by the latter. Then Plunkitt and Masterson got together, but did no damage to each other.

Though Henry Rochefort, the fire eating veteran French journalist, must be more than seventy years old, he is still one of the most remarkable duellists in France. Few men dare match swords with M. Rochefort, and he is constantly challenging people who find one way or another of not meeting him. M. Rochefort's latest "antagonist" is M. Buneau-Varilla, son of the engineer who has figured so prominently in the Panama Canal negotiations.

Armed with bioscope cameras and miles of film, a British expedition is starting out to traverse the Dark Continent from the Cape to Calro. The leaders of the expedition, Brian Belasis and Lionel Cooke, are actuated mainly by commercial motives, but hope incidentally to get many moving pictures and phonographic records of scientific value. They have a commission from the Zoological Society to bring home a white rhinoceros and any other rare animal they can capture alive. Braving the hostility of the Central African natives, the expedition will push forward to the mysterious capital of Nyassaland, which no white man ever had penetrated. By posing as magicians and by distributing presents they hope to gain access, and to take pictures of life in the forbidden city. Passing through Abyssinia, the expedition will visit the Court of the Emperor Menelik, show him moving pictures of London, and obtain bioscope records of his gorgeous court.

King Sisowath of Cambodia, his sister and twenty of his 300 wives are in Paris, and the King bids fair to become as popular as is the Shah for he is a quaint and merry monarch. Sisowath left his sixty-nine sacred dancing girls at arselles, and this is the only disappointing feature of his trip, to Paris to visit the "great king"—that is President Fallieres—who protects his own domain of Cambodia. The King's name is on every tongue, and his advent at all times looked forward to, but his full name is seldom mentioned, for it is Prea Bat Samdach Prea Sisowath Chamchorapong Harirach Braminthor Prouvanayk-raykeofa Sobapdecy—a trifle unwieldy for daily and familiar use.

Champ Clark relates many instances of the grim humor that was so prominent a characteristic of the late Senator Vest of Missouri. Mr. Clark tells us, during one of Vest's campaigns in the early 90s, it was necessary for him to sojourn overnight in the town of St. Charles. The best hostelry the place afforded was poor enough, and at breakfast Vest was especially put off by the stuff that was placed before him for coffee. After having sampled the beverage, Vest, with a frown, called for the proprietor. When that individual had appeared the Senator asked, with a wave of his hand toward offending liquid smoking innocently before him: "Sir, what is this stuff?" "Coffee," meekly replied the proprietor, somewhat taken aback. "Coffee!" repeated Vest, in fine scorn. "My friend, I could insert a coffee bean in my mouth, dive into the Missouri river, swim to the town of Alton, Ill., and I'll guarantee that one could ball a much better coffee than this, sir, or the entire route!"

The chilling dignity that enshrouds ex-President Fairbanks has been made the theme of countless jokes by the nation's law makers. This is the best: The Vice President, Fairbanks, came down Fifteenth street, Washington, in a carriage. The other day in his finest carriage, he met Representative Brownlow, who was walking. "Get in, Brownlow," said the Vice President, "and I will take you up to the Capitol." Brownlow hopped in. They chatted until the carriage reached the corner of Fifteenth and F streets, where the Vice President halted the stage in order to go into a store. Left Brownlow in the carriage. Two other Representatives, walking to the Capitol, came along and found Brownlow there, sitting in state. "Hi, Brownlow," said one of them, "how do you do this? When did you get a turn-like that and what are you doing?" "Nothing," Brownlow replied. "Nothing at all; merely getting a free ride in the ice wagon."

There was a great deal of innuendo in Horace Greeley, as well as not a little affectation. He was rarely without one trouser leg carelessly left in the upper part of his boot, a necktie with the bow under his arm. Once in the public room of an hotel a friend of Greeley's kindly pointed down the disarranged trouser leg and straightened the necktie. Greeley thanked him and soon after left the room. When in the course of half an hour he appeared in the street, the trouser leg and the necktie had been fully disarranged, and the man who had as negligent of things earthly as he always looked. It was part of his pose as a man of genius to wear a rouser leg and his necktie as if he had put them on in a hurry, while he lay in meditation. It was a less eccentricity, but then it was accorded with the real innuendo who had not a leaning widow in a Maine town, according to the Boston Herald, was a strict abolitionist in her theology, and she admitted no lodger into her boarding-house who had not a leaning toward Universalist views. One day a sea captain happened along to her rooms. "What do you believe?" asked the widow. "Most anything," replied the captain. "You believe there is a hell?" "No," was the reply. "Well," parried the widow, "how do you think will go there?" "The captain cautiously remarked that he thought twenty thousand would be a fair estimate. The widow, then, stated that he could come for twenty thousand," she said, "is that more than none?"

A freight steamer once came into the port of the sea of Azov, and had among its cargo one hundred pieces of machinery numbered from 1 to 100. When the pieces were unloaded it was found that No. 88 was missing, but two pieces numbered 88 showed that there had been one, the final tally being correct. The customs officials did not take the view of the matter, the port being in need of funds, so they fined the ship 500 rubles for being short of cargo as per manifest, namely No. 87, 89, 90 rubles for smuggling—having pieces numbered 88 when the manifest called for but one.

One day in Washington recently a group of politicians were talking. "Uncle Joe" Cannon was recalled by a story. He was a friend of mine in the past," said he, "who once joyfully sought an oil expert, declaring that he had struck this fluid on his land. He brought a sample in a bottle. Now evidently my friend had been in a great hurry, hastily grabbing the first bottle at hand, for, when the chemist had duly analyzed the sample submitted he sent the following telegraphic report: "Find no trace of oil. You have struck paregoric."

Sam Bernard, the well-known comedian, said at a wedding breakfast in New York: "I am glad to see here a luxury to which all brides and bridegrooms are not accustomed. I, for instance, called one day in June upon the dear old lady who did my washing and ironing. 'Where is your son this morning, Mrs. Smith?' I said. 'I don't see him around. I hope he isn't ill?' 'Oh, no, said the old lady. 'He's to be married to-morrow, and he's upstairs in bed while I wash out his trousseau.'"

This story is told of Judge Dale, of Wichita, Kas. The Judge is one of the best golfers in his part of Kansas. One day he had a case in which several small boys had been subpoenaed as witnesses. Addressing a bright youth of about twelve summers, Judge Dale solemnly inquired: "My boy, do you understand the nature of an oath?" "Oh, yes, sir, quickly replied the youth. "I often caddied for you, sir."

Of Whistler, the famous American painter, an artist said at the Gralier Club in New York: "Mr. Whistler had been poor himself, and he saw nothing shameful or dishonorable in poverty. If you were poor he would mock without pity your destitution. I knew and admired Whistler in the early days of my career in Paris. He lived luxuriously. I lived in a garret. Though he liked me none the less for that, he did not permit any false delicacy to keep him from joking me about my poorhouse ways. One day, in a very shabby suit, I was strolling on the Boulevard des Italiens, when some one hailed me from the rear. I turned, and saw Whistler hastening toward me in his tall hat and lemon-colored gloves, waving his long black cane. 'Ah,' said I, rather flattered, 'so you recognized me from behind, did you, master?' 'Yes,' said Mr. Whistler, laughing maliciously, 'I spied you through a hole in your coat.'"

An Ohio politician enjoys telling of a political discussion he once overheard in a country grocery store. In some way the argument, quite a heated one, degenerated into a discussion in which one side took the position that the others were crazy to entertain such political tenets as theirs. At this point a solemn looking individual, who, up to this time had held his peace, suddenly interjected: "Gents, I want to say that I'm the only sane man here that has the papers to prove it." The crowd gazed upon him in astonishment. "It's true, gents," continued the solemn looking individual, as he drew forth a document from the recesses of his coat, "here's my discharge from the State Insane Asylum."

It is related by the Earl of Yarmouth that on one of his yachting cruises he took a great liking to an old sailor whose principal duty was to see that the paint everywhere was in first-class shape. One day the Earl saw a jet of water shoot up from the sea. "A whale," said the old sailor, and sure enough the great creature was seen in a minute. "Did you ever see a sea serpent, Walker?" asked the Earl. The old fellow paused in his work and said: "Yes, my lord. I saw one once. We had started home from Jamaica with a cargo of rum, and—" "Go back to your painting," said his lordship.

Two groups of persons were seated in a railway station. One consisted of a fashionably attired pair, the other of a pair who looked as if they were from the country. They had been there only a few minutes when a girl came in whose complexion was as nearly perfect as anything in this world ever is. While she was buying her ticket the young man remarked to the ladies with him: "Isn't Miss Crawford a beauty? Her complexion is as perfect as a rose." At the same time the other man clutched his wife's arm and whispered: "Lord, Nan, hasn't that gal got a purty hide?"

Charles Hawtreys, the English actor, tells how a golf caddy completely upset him on one occasion. Hawtreys and some other actors were playing a match game. At the first hole he got into a hunker and while he vainly tried to extricate his ball his caddy, a little elderly man with a scrubby beard, took out a clay pipe and began to fill it. At the fifteenth stroke the caddy struck a match on his trousers, whereupon the actor paused. "Well," said the caddy, as he lighted his pipe, "it's a fine day anyway."

San Francisco Newspaper Changes.

John McNaught, who has been general manager of the San Francisco Call for a number of years, has resigned. In an eloquent and lengthy appreciation of Mr. McNaught, the Call, last Sunday said, among other things: "With regret The Call announces the retirement from its staff of John McNaught. After twelve years in the editorial service of this newspaper, three of them devoted to the exacting duties of its highest executive office, Mr. McNaught has yielded to the demand of his private interests for personal attention at home and to his strong desire for a season of freedom from the burden and the cares of his position. He has requested that he be relieved of his responsibilities and has been given reluctant permission to withdraw. Going, he bears with him to their fullest measure the affectionate esteem and warm good will of those for and with whom he has toiled so long, and so faithfully."

C. W. Hornick will become general manager of the Call as a result of the retirement of Mr. McNaught. Mr. Hornick came here in 1905 to become business manager of the Chronicle. He had prior to that time been business manager of the St. Paul Dispatch and is a director in the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. The new managing editor of the Call will be Ernest S. Simpson, who for many years has been city editor of the Chronicle. Mr. Simpson has been prominently associated with newspaper work in this city for over twenty years. His retirement from the Chronicle has caused the promotion of H. A. French to the position of city editor.

It is the intention of the Call to install a new mechanical plant and to place the paper on a better basis than existed before the big fire.

Charles De Young has been appointed business manager of the Chronicle and will assume the duties of that position on the 15th inst. Mr. De Young succeeds C. W. Hornick.

James D. Phelan does not want the nomination for Governor. Edward H. Hamilton, who gave out this interesting bit of political news, says: "Those Democrats who have been looking to James D. Phelan as the party nominee for Governor this year will be disappointed to learn that Mr. Phelan is not a candidate for the nomination. Asked if he would be a candidate for the nomination, his name having been suggested, he replied: 'I will not be a candidate and you are at liberty to print that statement.'"

Chris Evans, whose career as an outlaw in the vicinity of Visalia is a sensational chapter in California's criminal record, has been released from San Quentin. He has just finished a fifteen years' sentence. Evans is supposed to have $30,000 buried near Visalia.

One day in the summer of 1891, Hall were being built, Governor Stanford and a Spanish gentleman were viewing the construction. The latter begged Mr. Stanford not to build higher than one story because of the danger of temblors. Mr. Stanford pointed to Encina Hall, then about completed, and said: "That is the boys' dormitory. It has been built with the greatest care by Mr. Briggs and his foreman Robert Kirke, and I believe there are no more expert stonemasons in the world. They built the great wall for me on Powell street after others had let it fall down." Then he went on to say, almost with the gift of prophecy, "The house on California street may fall down or burn up, but I believe that wall will endure for all time." He explained that Encina Hall was built of solid stone and that numbers of bond stones were used that went completely through the wall.

The characteristic optimism and good nature of the San Franciscans speedily reappeared after the recent catastrophe. On the walls of the improvised shops are many legends showing that they have not lost their ability to see the funny side of things. On the side of one of the curbstones kitchens on Sacramento street is written: "Eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow there may be another earthquake." "Don't kiss the cook!" That was what somebody chalked on the side of his cookhouse. All the famous restaurants of San Francisco had located on the curbs—if you believed the signs on the streets. One was called the "Fairmont," and another across the street advertised itself as the "Unfairmont." One legend ran: "If the waiter does not please you, shoot him; but for God's sake don't shoot the cook, for we can't get another. He's doing his best." A pessimist wrote:

"Out in the cold world,
Out in the street."
But it was not long before some one added:
"But what's the use of kicking
When you've got enough to eat?"

The commercial signs took up the spirit of humor. "We want you to know that we are still alive and quite well," was the sign that appeared at the peak of a heap of ruins on Market street. A lawyer hung out a sign from the tenth story of a ruined skyscraper with the information that he had "moved because the elevators were not running." A firm who had an undestroyed desire to lead expressed its gratification in the order of events in the verve:

First to shake;
First to burn;
First to begin
A living to earn.

According to S. H. Pearcey, a large land owner in the Isle of Pines, a revolt against Cuban authority in that island will occur in the near future unless the United States resumes control over it. Mr. Pearcey called at the White House recently, but the President declined to see him and he was referred to Secretary Root. He said that Americans now own nine-tenths of the property in the island, which they purchased solely on the assurances of President McKinley and the War Department that the island was American soil.

ELLEN TERRY'S JUBILEE,

To Ellen Terry.

Dear and beloved! What giving of dull gold
Or roll of praise, or chronicle of fame,
Can pay the debt we owe? Thy radiant name
Shines on our hearts; when thine and ours are cold,
How shall the child who knew thee not be told
Of Shakespeare's women, quickened in the flame
Of thy surpassing sweetness, that became
New star-born visions, one yet manifold?
Fact and desire, the day and the day's dreams
Lie sun-drenched; but thy life-long glorious part
It was to make things true, and that which seems Beside what is. Thy gift was to the heart,
Therefore the heart in richest gladness gives
An unmatched love, that ripens and outlives.
—Laurence Alma Tadema in Westminster Gazette.

The Ellen Terry Jubilee matinee benefit at Drury Lane Theatre, London, was made the occasion of an extraordinary manifestation of enthusiasm and affection. The demand for tickets for the performance was unprecedented. The reserved sections of the house were booked weeks in advance, but following the old traditions, the pit, amphitheatre, and the gallery were open to the first comers. Thirty hours before the curtain rose there was a line of patient admirers, mostly ladies, of the great actress. As the hour for the matinee approached, the entrance to the theatre presented the oddest jumble of ill-assorted characters ever drawn together for a common purpose. Such as were not exchanging desultory confidences with new acquaintances were playing cards, taking "cat-naps" or munching sandwiches. The illustrations of the people made homeless in San Francisco, says a London paper, represent the scene exactly. But the programme which had been arranged for the matinee was so comprehensive a tribute to her genius by the theatrical and musical professions that it justified any expense, any strategy, any endurance.

The first big item in the entertainment was "Trial by Jury," in which Mr. Courtice Pounds and Miss Ruth Vincent were defendant and plaintiff, with dramatic authors in the jury-box, and well-known players from all the theatres thronging the court. Mr. Gilbert, the author, was in his old place as Associate. Then followed M. Coquelin and M. Jean Coquelin, after which came a magnificent series of tableaux vivants with famous players posing in pictures arranged by academicians. "The School for Scandal," with an "all-star" cast that seemed oppressed by its responsibility, brought the first half of the programme to an end.

After the interval, "Much Ado," with Miss Terry as Beatrice, and every available member of her family appearing with her, went splendidly. Signor Caruso contributed two solos, and the minstrel entertainment, although it missed some opportunities, did very well. Nearly every well-known musical comedian sat around and contributed a song or a story.

Nothing now stood between the audience and the reception ceremony that was to bring the great day to a fitting climax. When Lady Bancroft stood all alone in front of a golden tableau curtain the house was hushed and attentive. Speaking slowly and earnestly, she said: "It is my happy duty to welcome you here to the Jubilee of Ellen Terry. It is a happy not a mournful occasion. She has spent fifty years in hard work on the stage and in defying Old Father Time. She is still our friend. Ellen Terry has basked in the sunshine of your affections for fifty years. Now she is going to appear before you."

The curtain flew upward, disclosing Miss Terry in a classical white costume, surrounded by an immense gathering that included almost every well-known personality of the English theatre.

After Miss Irene Vanbrugh had crossed the stage and handed to Miss Terry a large basket of beautiful flowers, Lady Bancroft addressed her directly as "My dear Ellen Terry—or may I on this occasion say Sweet Nell of Old Drury?—I have been speaking to my friends about you, and we are glad you are celebrating your jubilee and remaining with us."

Miss Terry, with much feeling, spoke a few words to Lady Bancroft, as her old friend of many years and once her manager. Then, approaching near-never felt before that language was given to conceal, not to reveal what we feel. After thanking Mr. Collins, the committee, and others, Miss Terry added, "There are also the great players from other countries who have come here today," and she turned to M. Coquelin, who stood on her left, and shook his hand. "To-Madame Duse I owe much. She has come all the way from Florence just to stand here at my side."

All through the little speechification, Miss Terry, was, of course, very near to breaking into tears, but only once did she give way to the thronging emotions of those unforgettable moments. This was when she thanked Mme. Eleonora Duse for her presence. She had begun a more or less formal compliment, but instead of finishing it she bent down, and, in her impulsive way, kissed the great Italian actress's hand. Eleonora Duse, however, would not have this. Leaning forward she lifted Ellen Terry up, and kissed her on both cheeks. It was a simple little incident enough, but no more touchingly beautiful sight could be imagined than this womanly homage of two actresses, each in her own world supreme.

Then Miss Terry said a few words about the public. "Though I stood here as long as the Pyramids have stood—there! I could never say what this day has been to me. I have the heart to wonder at all that you have done for me, but not the tongue to praise you. I will not say 'Good-bye.' It is one of my chief joys today that I still speak to you as one who is still among you on the active list. Still in your service, if you please."

After everybody had joined in singing "For Auld Lang Syne," Mr. Pinner, as the chairman of the executive committee, announced that the receipts closely approached £6,000. Then came "God Save the King," and the curtain fell on a memorable event.

A dinner was given at the Hotel Cecil at London in honor of Miss Terry. The 200 guests included persons prominent in the theatrical world. Winston Spencer Churchill, during the course of a brilliant eulogy of Miss Terry's genius, said he considered it regrettable that Great Britain had no national theater. Miss Terry replied to Mr. Churchill's remarks and to other complimentary speeches, and, after thanking all persons concerned in the testimonial to her, both in Europe and America, said she believed the overwhelming testimony of affection and homage she had received were due greatly to the intention of the public to honor Sir Henry Irving and herself together. A message from Joseph H. Choate was read which expressed best wishes on behalf of America and stated that Miss Terry's interesting and brilliant career would always be cherished in the memory of American lovers of dramatic art.

It was announced that the total sum realized for the Terry jubilee fund, including that received from the benefit performance at Drury Lane theater and subscriptions raised in America, amounts to $43,920.

Ellen Terry's jubilee brought up the story of her marriage to Watts, the painter, the one thing in her life which has always been more or less of a mystery. That the marriage took place and that a legal separation was obtained by Watts many years after the pair had parted, are about the only facts known to the general public. Miss Terry was only 16 when she married the artist. Watts lived in a big house with two maiden sisters. Watts played pranks all over the house, to the open disgust and amazement of the servants of the decorous household. Finally she determined to leave the house and return to her life on the stage. She arranged her farewell with the consummate mischievousness which characterized her. There was a big dinner party at the house, as staid and formal as the circle of people in which the Watts moved. Mrs. Watts appeared suddenly in pink tights. She made her bow and then fled. He never saw her again.

Of Watts Miss Terry was never known to speak, and so far as her outward life is concerned, her marriage is as if it had never been.

H. W. Bishop, the theatrical manager of Oakland, contemplates establishing a playhouse in Sacramento.

In the Academy of Music, New York, Miss Julia Marlowe and Mr. E. H. Sothern began the second week of a Shakespearean engagement which has been successful to the most gratifying degree. The great house is crowded with eager spectators. The promised revival of "Much Ado About Nothing" is received with many demonstrations of appreciation and pleasure.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Artistic and social Paris is deeply stirred by the announcement that Monsieur and Madame Le Bargy, the most famous couple on the French stage, are about to be divorced, and the rumor that when this has happened the lady will marry young Gasimir Perier, only son of the ex-President of the French republic. Five years ago Mme. Le Bargy was a beautiful society girl of aristocratic family. She was induced to study for the stage by Sarah Bernhardt, who was struck by her exceptional histrionic gifts. M. Le Bargy is a brilliant actor who has had a meteoric career. There is a story that reveals his talent more eloquently than volumes of eulogy. That most "spiritual" of critics, M. Catulle Mendès, was in Mme. Le Bargy's loge at the Comedie Francaise on the premiere of "Le Duel," in which M. Le Bargy acts the priest. When the curtain fell on a great scene, Catulle, enraptured, turned to Mme. Le Bargy and said: "Ah, madame, if your husband were not a priest, what an actor he would have made!"

At the Orpheum for the week commencing July 8 Claude Gillingwater, who has just concluded the season as leading man with Fritzie Scheff in "Mme. Modiste," will present his comedy-drama, "A Strenuous Suitor," supported by Carlyn Strelitz, Edith Hinkle, Walter Clarke and Jules Scott. Linden Beckwith as Mrs. Snider-Johnson, formerly of this city, is now known on the stage, will return with her original creation "The Singing Portrait." Miss Beckwith will appear as a colonial dame, a "cowgirl" and as a Scotch lassie. Ziska and King, comedy magicians, return. Nora Bayes, the singing comedienne, is to return for one week. Willie Zimmerman will also come back for a week. Julia Heinrich, the contralto, and her brother, Karl, the barytone, will be heard in new selections. The Majestic Trio of laughmakers, Macart's dogs and monkeys and Orpheum Motion Pictures will complete the bill.

The new Columbia Theater to be erected at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Geary street promises to be one of the handsomest and safest playhouses in the country. It is the intention of Gottlob, Marx & Co. to have their new theater open to the public in the early spring. The building is to cover the entire space on Van Ness avenue from the corner of Geary street to Myrtle avenue, 120 feet frontage with a depth of 150 feet. The site is such as to permit exits on four highways, with passageways on either side of the theater and ample stage exits. Entrance will be through an immense foyer on the Van Ness avenue side. The house will admit the seating of 2000 people. The office structure facing the avenue is being constructed especially for occupancy by physicians. The theater proper will cost about $200,000, and the office structure an additional $100,000.

The big spectacle entitled "San Francisco" opened in Dreamland Park, Coney island. An enormous crowd attended. There are five scenes in "San Francisco," and they depict the Pacific Coast metropolis, its foundation in 49 days and before, its growth to a large and prosperous city, its destruction by fire and earthquake, and its rebuilding, larger and finer than before. There are close upon 200 people in the show, including Indians, miners, tenderfeet, bad men, soldiers, Chinese, newsboys and some real actors who are said to have been in San Francisco at the time of the recent disaster. There are some beautiful and historic scenes. The big show is the destruction of the city. Buildings crumble and fall and terrified people throng the streets. It is exceedingly realistic. After the scene of destruction and misery the picture of rejuvenated San Francisco shows an ideally beautiful city.

Melba has completely broken down. It is more than doubtful if she will be heard again this season. Her physician has ordered absolute rest for some months and her friends are urging her to give up her engagements and begin her cure at once. Since the beginning of the Covent Garden season, which has never been fashionable, the diva has labored under the utmost difficulties. Only once, and that at the request of King Edward, has the great singer been heard. Illness has veiled her voice and she persistently refused to appear when she was not in good form. A fortnight since, while on her way to Covent Garden for the evening's performance, her touring car broke down. She pluckily hailed a passing tradesman's wagon and rode through London in the humble vehicle.

Patti has by no means made her final public appearance. She sang at the Royal Albert Hall, London, on the 14th inst., and her solos included the cavatina "Casta Diva," from "Norma"; the serenade by Gounod, "Qua tu chantes"; and the aria "Vol sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro." It was in 1850, when she was seven years of age, that Adellina Patti sang in public. In 1859 Strakosky was paying her $100 a week, and two years later Frederick Gye obtained her services at double that amount. Long afterwards he was glad to give her $500 a night. Her present impresario, Percy Harrison, pays the diva $4,000 for every concert at which she sings in London.

According to Eastern correspondence Sarah Bernhardt carried back with her the earnings of her recent American tour. This may be true, but if it is the first time she ever did anything of this kind. On her last tour she cabled every cent to Paris wherever she happened to be and cried back in money only the recel of her last two performances. When she was playing in the west the money was very high, but she never mind that. Every Thursday the week's receipts went on by this quick method to Paris.

Massenet's miracle opera, "Jongleur de Notre Dame," was produced for the first time in London on June 16. The music is praised for its freshness and suitability to the naive story written by Morris Lenau.

Mlle. Donald, who is singing the roles at Covent Garden, since her illness, was discovered in Canada by Salignac, a distinguished actor. On his advice she went to Paris three years ago to study and was engaged for the Nice opera season 1905. Her debut there proved so able that Covent Garden secured her and after her first season here she engaged for the Theatre de la Monnaie, Brussels.

Manager Ben Greet, it is announced, is to superintend the staging of "The Soup," next autumn. We are generously informed, also, that he will continue his "Everyman" and Elbethan repertoire company. And is the Greet who has prated so long of art for art's sake before universal audiences the country over? We next learn of Julia Marlowe starring in "The Lights of London."

LITERARY NOTES.

Recent Fiction.

Like his hero in "Sandy from the Sierras," the author, Richard Barry, advances rapidly in his chosen profession, not alone from a journalistic point of view, a year correspondent and high, but an author not altogether scholarly or scientific in aim, but write his first novel in order to reach to his full literary stature.

"Sandy from the Sierras" is a story of what we must now sadly term Old San Francisco; and as such, a greater interest will attach to it than former.

Many of the places mentioned in Barry's novel have now forever passed away. It is a book that reads in some degree the journalistic experiences of the author, although it is a clean-living youth of strict ideals who does not choose to enroll himself in the ranks of gay and irresponsible Bohemia. Nevertheless, being a journalist, he has some disreputable friends, who converse in theargon of tenderloin slang that causes such joy on the searacher after y. That Mr. Barry is an expert in this line goes without saying. In the book, in consequence, has the realistic rather than the literary flavor. But it shows also a healthy regard for cleanliness and purity of living, a genuine regard for old associations, for family ties and affections, a sincere respect for the simpler virtues of industry, loyalty and integrity that strike the reader curiously, gratefully, in the midst of the irreverent rattle with which Mr. Barry versifies his more serious passages. Published by Moffatt, Yard & Co., O.

The beretic in "The Secret Life: or, the Book of a Heretic," is by own confession a middle-aged woman who chooses to expound in this rathered volume, "the beresies one grown too staid and cautious to speech to any longer." The nown author, therefore indulges in the luxury of unloading an interest- and unconservative intellect of all fancies, vagaries, opinions and icisms. Some of her desultory, tten-out reveries amount to esays, both forcible and interesting, here and there a sudden, shy, nonette-like outflowing on poet- blooms on the page. The "beretic" is Rousseau's "Insulting confessions," dislikes "Sonnets from the fugues," is impatient of the lim- of feminine expression in art. Earthquake Literature.

The New York Evening Post is impressed by the literature of the San Francisco disaster, and thus urges: June Issue of Out West is, notably, a "San Francisco number," contains a series of articles on the ter written by such authoritative as Paul Cowles, superintend- Western division the Associated Press, and David Starr Jordan, presi- of Leland Stanford University. al of the papers deal with the iding of the city, and in read- hem, as in reading all the litera- of the subject, one is struck by ous comparison. This is the of the California writers, so far as we know without exception; thus John Galen Howard exclaims:

"To-day, as one looks back upon the pre-historic days which flowed so sleepily along before the earthquake, one can recognize here and there an intimation, a premonition of the forces which underlay the surface of San Francisco life, but it needed a coup de foudre to blast away the surface and to unite all powers for good which the old nature had never known how to bring to bear. To-day all that is changed, and San Francisco stands full-panoplied to wage her warfare for success."

The New York journal goes on thus: "Another writer, James D. Phelan, says that 'the burning of San Francisco, caused indirectly by earthquake shock, was merely a tragedy which will subsequently serve to make the history of California interesting. It will no way affect the resources which have made the City of the Golden Gate necessary to commerce and to trade. San Francisco is a natural city, and the mere burning of houses simply signifies that new and perhaps better ones will be constructed on the old site.' And still another, William E. Smythe, speaks in a higher, shriller tone:

"Before the disaster California was great, materially; to-day the material greatness has been multiplied tenfold by the force of a newly-awakened spirituality, which, seeking immediate outlet in works of brotherhood, will find its enduring expression in the unprecedented advance of Associated Man. California must surpass itself in the future because it has found its soul—because it has enlisted the higher nature of its people in the work of building a real commonwealth. And the breath of a real commonwealth, be it said, is not the land boom; nor is the town lot its corner-stone, nor the banking house its temple. These things have their place, but their place is neither in the deep-laid foundation, nor in the imposing front, nor yet in the crowning turrets of the real commonwealth. The California of the future, taking its inspiration from the ruin of San Francisco, will illumine the world with the brightness and beauty of the institutions it will create for the upliftment of the common man."

The tone of our California writers thus impresses the Post: "This is the fairly constant tone of those who write about the earthquake, and, with certain deductions, may be taken to represent the feeling of the people of the city in general. The comparison that forces itself on the mind is with the expression of horror that followed the Lisbon earthquake just a century and a half ago. Readers of European literature need not be told how the news of that disaster affected Voltaire and the young Goethe; it seemed to them, as it did to the world at large to throw doubts upon the very existence of Providence and upon the value of human activity. Which is really the profounder view, this almost unreasoning optimism, one might say gaiete de coeur, in the face of nature's overwhelming power, or the questioning mind of the eighteenth century? Have the people of San Francisco been spiritualized by this shock? Has any American felt, or at least expressed, the feeling that such a disaster may be regarded as one of the signs of our feeble tenure on the earth, of our terrible littleness physically, and that it should awaken a sense of humility rather than of vain boasting?"

New Publications.

"Tuxedo Avenue to Water Street," by Amos R. Wells, and "Spurgeon's Illustrative Anecdotes," compiled by Louis Albert Banks, D. D., (the Funk & Wagnalls Company) are two valuable books for a clergyman's library.

A new pocket edition of the works of George Meredith has been published by Charles Scribner's Sons. Each of the fourteen novels is complete in one volume, and the books are printed in good-sized, agreeable type, on opaque paper. This handy and cheap edition will be welcomed by many readers. Each volume may be bought separately; limp leather, $1.25 net; cloth, $1.00.

Personal and Miscellaneous.

The news of the death of S. Baring-Gould, at sea, was erroneous. The well-known novelist gives to the Graphic his experiences as a dead man. He had—among many other offers—the offer of a complete set of newspaper notices handsomely bound for three guineas. Those notices have been packed away unread, in a sealed envelope, with his will. Mr. Baring-Gould concludes: "I have found that people whom I did not know by name even, had cared for my writings, and they wrote or wired to me their congratulations; old pupils of forty years ago wrote and renewed old remembrances, friends who had dropped out of my life woke up to renewed affection. And so I find that I have more friends than I know of, and old friends draw closer, so that this little error has softened my heart, and made me thankful that I have a wider circle of such as feel kindly towards me than the little ring of my own family."

A new volume of Stevenson letters is in preparation by Charles Scribner's Sons. It is entitled "Letters from Samoa," and will be a companion volume to "From the Marquesas and Beyond," by the same author, Mrs. Margaret Isabelle Stevenson.

The Life of Oscar Wilde, which R. H. Sberard has been writing for Werner Laurie, will be ready next month. The author and his subject were friends for many years, and so this book has a personal note all through. One strong purpose of it is to dispel a number of false reports which have associated themselves with Wilde's life, as for instance, the weird recurring rumor that he is not dead.

Much interest has been aroused in Miriam Michelson's forthcoming novel, "Anthony Overman." This story of the old San Francisco is in an entirely different field from Miss Michelson's greatest success so far, "In the Bishop's Carriage." It deals with a dreamer who falls in love with a woman who is his antithesis. Doubleday, Page and Company expect to bring out "Anthony Overman" on Aug. 1. It will be illustrated by John Cecil Clay.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Bothin, whose handsome home on Van Ness avenue and Jackson street was burned, are at their country place at Ross Valley for the summer and fall.

Dr. and Mrs. John Rogers Clark have gone on a fortnight's fishing trip to Weber Lake.

Lieutenant and Mrs. Franklin Bache Harwood have returned from a trip to Yosemite.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Tallant have taken a cottage in Belvedere and will spend the summer there.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Griffin left on Saturday of last week for Oroville.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Simpson have been spending a week as the guests of Dr. and Mrs. Russell Cool at Los Angeles.

Mr. and Mrs. William T. Baggett and Miss Nell Rose Baggett, who were at St. Dunstan's all winter, are spending the summer at their ranch near Oroville.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter McG. McBean are spending the summer at San Rafael.

Mrs. Lester Herrick has gone to Seattle for a visit to her sister and will be absent several weeks.

Mr. J. Downey Harvey has been a recent visitor at Tuxedo, New Jersey.

Walter S. Newhall of Los Angeles has announced his intention of coming to San Francisco to reside to take charge of the construction of three large buildings—one at the intersection of Battery and Sacramento streets, one on Battery street between Pine and California streets and one at Leidesdorff and Halleck streets.

Col. and Mrs. John A. Darling have returned from their stay abroad and are sojourning in New England, where they have many relatives and friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Troy, formerly of San Francisco, who came to Los Angeles, have as their guests Mrs. Fanny J. White, mother of the late Stephen M. White, former United States Senator.

Mrs. William G. Irwin has returned from Honolulu, where he has been for several months.

Miss Alice and Miss Martha Brown, daughters of the late Thomas Brown, who are in Europe, where they have been for two years, expect to return to California this fall.

Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor of Oakland will leave this week for Portland, Ore., where she will be the guest of her sister, Mrs. Allen Lewis, for several weeks.

Miss Edith Treanor is the guest of her sister, Mrs. Clarence Oddie, in Tonopah for several weeks' stay.

Miss Mabel Hogg and her brother, Mr. William J. Hogg, have been visiting at Del Monte recently.

The Los Angeles Graphic says: "Harry Gillig, who has been sojourning in Los Angeles for several months, left here for Paris last week, and will sell his chateau at Neuilly next fall and return to this city and make his permanent residence. Gillig is still one of the handsomest fellows to be seen anywhere, and has one of the finest baritone voices any one ever listened to. He obtained instant and marked success in opera, but does not like the lyric stage and has given it up probably forever. He is not in love with money, either, but a few weeks ago he quietly dropped $30,000 in Hollywood on improved property paying 7 per cent. Besides other accomplishments Gillig is a superb pianist and guitarist, and a radiant conversationalist and linguist as well. Gillig has traveled far and wide, and has satisfied himself that Los Angeles is the choicest place on earth."

Mrs. Solon Huntington died Wednesday, June 27, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. E. B. Holladay, 2215 Buchanan street. Mrs. Huntington was the widow of Solon Huntington, brother of Collis P. Huntington. Mrs. Huntington leaves the following children: Mrs. E. B. Holladay of this city, H. E. Huntington of Los Angeles, W. V. Huntington of this city and Mrs. B. W. Foster of Huntington, W. Va. The grandchildren of the deceased are Howard E. Huntington, Mrs. Gilbert B. Perkins, Mrs. J. B. Metcalf, Mrs. J. D. Spreckels Jr., Miss Marian Huntington, Miss Helen H. Holladay and Collis H. Huntington. Her great-grandchildren are Elizabeth Huntington and Marie H. Spreckels.

General Nelson A. Miles recently delivered the commencement address before the University of Colorado at Boulder. There were some impressive things in it, as when this life-long soldier said: "We have had enough war, carnage, devastation and desolation. Those who know the least of the hardships and horrors of war are its most zealous advocates." So speaks the veteran warrior, whose service in the civil war, and as a brilliant Indian fighter in the West, entitles him to speak with authority.

The funeral of Alexander Weill took place in Paris on June 28. Mr. Weill was born in Phalsbourg, Lorraine, June 21, 1834. He came to San Francisco, February 4, 1855, and in 1856 he was a member of the famous vigilantes. He took his departure from this city in 1880 for New York. He founded the well-known banking firm of Lazard Freres. In 1871 he was founder and first president of the Ligue Nationale, which organization had 1000 members. In 1877, at the time of the failure of the French Savings Bank in this city, Mr. Weill, with Gustav Touchard, took charge of the bank's affairs, and by careful liquidation the creditors obtained 80 per cent. At the time of the recent disaster Mr. Weill placed at the disposal of his brother, Raphael Weill, $20,000 to be used to the best of his judgment.

Eugene Shelby has been promoted to be superintendent of the western division of Wells, Fargo & Co., and assumed his duties on Saturday. He takes the place formerly held by S. D. Bastow. Shelby has been connected with the company for thirty years, during which time he has resided in Portland. The western division includes all the offices between Ogden and Victoria, B. C.

Maid—"There's a much better tone in this house now, m'm, than there used to be." Lady (indignantly)—"Indeed! I don't understand you, Chalmers." Maid—"Oh, m'm, I mean down stairs, of course. Not upstairs."—Punch.

Next Sunday Go to Byron Hot Springs.—You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the springs, and the entire expense of the trip is $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from railway station to hotel and return, a delightful ride of two and a half miles, accommodations at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel, and use of the wonderful mineral baths, all for $7.50. Try it.

Inquiring Female—"And what do you do, captain, when it is too rough to go out in the boat?" Capt.—"Well, m'am, if the wreck ain't too far off, we generally tries to rig a line to her, an' then we sends out the breeches buoy." Inquiring Female—"Oh, the poor little fellow! But don't his parents object?"—Judge.

Removal Notice.—Gladding, McBean & Co., office and storage depot, Eddy and Hyde streets. The Eddy street west bound electric cars pass this corner, while all the cars on the Turk, O'Farrell, Post and Conventworth and Larkin and Polk street lines pass but one block distant.

"Just think, our new cook gets up at 6 o'clock without being called." "She must be a jewel?" "Yes, she's going to be married to the milkman next week."—Famille Journal.

ARMY AND NAVY.

General A. W. Greely, U. S. A., Mrs. Greely and Captain Frank L. Winn, U. S. A., are expected to return about July 10th from their trip to Yosemite and Southern California.

Brigadier General Constant Williams, U. S. A., has been relieved from the command of the Department of Columbia and has assumed command of the Department of Colorado. Colonel C. H. Noble, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., is in temporary command of the Department of Columbia. It is rumored that General W. S. Edgerly, U. S. A., who is returning from the Philippines, will assume command of that department upon his arrival.

Colonel Alfred C. Girard, Medical Department, U. S. A., retired, left last week for Chicago, where he will make his home for the future. Mrs. Girard will join him there later.

Colonel John L. Clew, U. S. A., Chief Quartermaster of the Department of California, and Mrs. Clew are enjoining in the advent of a daughter on June 28th. Mrs. Clew, who is at present in San Antonio, Texas, will arrive here shortly.

Colonel Louis Brechemin, Medical Department, U. S. A., and Mrs. Brechemin left on last Sunday morning for New York, where Colonel Brechemin has been ordered to assume charge of the Medical Supply Depot.

Lieutenant Commander Newton A. McCully, U. S. N., has been detached from duty in the office of Naval Intelligence in Washington, D. C., and after temporary duty at Seattle, Wash., will proceed to the Union Iron Works in this city for duty.

Lieutenant Commander William P. White, U. S. N., who has until recently been attached to the Chicago, has recently been examined for promotion at Mare Island.

Major George F. Downing, paymaster U. S. A., did not sail on the transport which left this port on July 5th for Manila, his orders for service in the Philippines having been revoked. Major Downing, who has been on leave at Lutherville, Md., was ordered to proceed to Chicago and report to the commanding general of the Department of the Lakes for temporary duty.

Major William L. Kneeder, surgeon, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to Brigadier General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., president of the Army Retraining Board, for examination by that board.

Captain William G. Haan, U. S. A., who is to be relieved from the general staff on August 15th, will take station at Fort Monroe, Virginia, where he will be on the Artillery Board and will have other duties in connection with the board. Captain Haan will probably go first to the maneuvers at American Lake for a brief stay before going East.

Captain Sydney A. Cloman, U. S. A., detailed as an observer of the camp instruction to be established at American Lake, Washington. He will proceed to Vancouver barracks this month and accompany the Fourteenth Infantry on its march from the post to American Lake.

Captain J. J. Bradley, U. S. A., who has had charge of the Crocker School, was relieved on Monday last and left for Vancouver barracks to join his regiment, the Fourteenth Infantry, of which he is quartermaster.

Captain Rogers F. Gardner, U. S. A., has been transferred from the unassigned list to the Thirteenth Battalion, Field Artillery, stationed in the Philippines. Captain Gardner will join his battery as soon as he is relieved.

Captain Harry G. Bishop, U. S. A., in his present duty of artillery engineer, Artillery District of Columbia.

Captain R. A. Longan, Eleventh Infantry, U. S. A., left on Thursday of last week for Fort D. A. Russell, Wyoming.

Captain George H. Shields Jr., Third Infantry, U. S. A., has been assigned duty as quartermaster and acting commissary on the transport Buford during the voyage of that transport to Alaska this month.

Captain J. W. Killian, Subsistence Department, U. S. A., who has been on duty at the Moulder School, Major A. Gaston, First Cavalry, U. S. A., Lieutenant H. A. Scott, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Richmond, First Cavalry, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Ineson, U. S. A., have each been granted five days' leave of absence, including longer leave to be granted by the War Department that they may take up the work of the Relief Fund Commission.

Lieutenant J. A. Moss, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted leave of absence for one month and will not go to the maneuvers at American Lake, as he is to report at the Infantry and Cavalry School at Fort Leavenworth, on August 16th.

Captain Henry O. Bisset, U. S. M. C., has been under treatment at the Naval Hospital at Mare Island.

Lieutenant Edward H. Pearce, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to the commanding officer of the Twenty-second Infantry for duty with that regiment.

Lieutenant Hamilton Bowie, Ninth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been detailed for a course of instruction in the bakers and cooks school at Fort Riley, Kansas.

Lieutenants Herbert M. Smith and C. J. Bartlett, assistant surgeons, U. S. A., have been ordered to report on August 27th to Lieutenant Colonel George H. Torney, president of the Examining Board at the Presidio of San Francisco, for examination for promotion. Lieutenants William R. Eastman and James F. Hall, assistant surgeons, U. S. A.

Three companies, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., and four troops, First Cavalry, U. S. A., left the Presidio of San Francisco this week, the former for their station at Vancouver Barracks and the latter for Fort Clark, Texas.

ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Dentist (prodding a patient's gum in search of a fragment of root)—Funny, I don't seem to feel it. Patient (ironical in spite of the pain)—You're in luck!—Les Annales.

Judging from the number of "Lover's Leaps" at the various mountain resorts, the favorite amusement of the aboriginal maiden must have been jumping over precipices.—Philadelphia Record.

Assistant—"This poet says that the last two verses of his poem may be omitted, if you think it is desirable." Editor—"I'll do better than that. I'll omit the whole poem."—Somerville Journal.

"Really, you know, I don't think Miss Summergal looks at all athletic." "Well?" "Well, you told me she was always engaged in some college sport." "Stupid! I said 'engaged to'."—Philadelphia Press.

"They found a cigar in a safe that had fallen down five stories in San Francisco and wasn't the least bit damaged by the fire." "Yes, I've tried to smoke several of those cigars."—Cleveland Leader.

Mistress—What made you angry with the doctor and tell him not to come any more? Bridget—Because he said he thought he would send me to a warmer climate, and I am on ter bim."—Los Angeles News.

"Do you think that wealth brings happiness?" "No," answered Mr. Dustin Stax. "It doesn't bring happiness. But it gives a man a little bit of option about the kind of worry he will take on."—Washington Star.

Not a great while ago Love was engaged in robbing some honest people of their peace of mind, when a loud knock sounded at the door. "Poverty, of course," cried Love, in the utmost vexation, and flew out of the window, leaving his booty behind him.—Puck.

American Girl (at Windsor Castle)—"Porter, is there any chance to get a glimpse of Queen Alexandra?" Gentleman at the Gate—"I'm not the porter. I am the Prince of Wales." American Girl—"How lucky I am! Is your mother in?"—New York Weekly.

They told the youngster to soak his feet in a tub of salt water if he wanted to toughen them. He soaked his hands, too. "It's pretty near time for me to get a licking," he explained. "Tomorrow I'm going to sit in it."—New York Sun.

"Why," exclaimed the visitor who was being shown over the house, "this picture is by one of the old masters!" "Well, maybe it is," replied Mrs. Newritch, apologetically. "But I'm sure the frame is quite new."—Chicago Daily News.

"Don't you like to hear the wind whistling through the wood?" asked the poetical one. "Well," replied the practical one, "if I'm out in the forest I do; but if the wood is made up into a $2 flute, I can't say that I do."—Yonkers Statesman.

Extract from testimonial in the Keighley News—"But I am thankful to say, after five weeks of your Indian treatment . . . the girl can read and write with her right eye as well as with the left." This makes the ordinary amblydextrous person look very silly.—Punch.

A school teacher, one day during the hour for drawing, suggested to her pupils that each draw what he or she would like to be when grown up. At the end of the lesson one little girl showed an empty slate. "Why," said the teacher, "isn't there anything you would like to be when you grow up?" "Yes, said the little girl, "I would like to be married, but I don't know how to draw it."—Life.

President Roosevelt has left Washington for his summer home at Oyster Bay. The President has had a vast amount of work during the session just concluded as he is, he is beginning to strain. Furthermore, he was deprived of his usual vacation last summer, owing to the conference between Russia and Japan. He has now gone to his Oyster Bay home, intending to get himself off completely from official business as far as possible, and to get as much rest as possible during the summer as he may. During the absence of President Roosevelt Secretary Hay will be a sort of "Acting President," as he was years ago, when the President went west in the West. At that time Secretary Hay was practically incapacitated by reason of ill health, and the Assistant Secretaries in the Department of State were persons in whom the country had no confidence and the President apparently very little, and he passed over the Department of State, whose duty by recent legislation made successor to the President in case of the death or incapacity of the President and Vice-President. Having transferred over the Department of State, Mr. Roosevelt held the reins of government in the hands of Secretary Taft. Now the Department of State is in charge of a man fully the equal of Secretary Hay in diplomatic ability and much superior to him physically. But Secretary Root is absent ; he sailed a few days ago with his family for Rio Janeiro, where he will preside over the Pan-American Conference. In his absence the President has determined to make Secretary Taft his representative at Washington.

This may be considered another proof of the President's belief that Secretary Taft should be kept in the view of the country as a possible candidate for the presidency. Not long ago it was rumored that the President intended to "shelve" Secretary Taft as a presidential candidate by appointing him to the supreme bench. But it has since become plain that Mr. Roosevelt does not desire the nomination himself, and will not accept it if it is possible for him to avoid it. It would also seem plain that he desires Secretary Taft to succeed him. But as the Secretary has often expressed his desire to round out his career by filling a position on the supreme bench, Mr. Roosevelt has shown his desire to appoint him to such a position. Therefore everything is now open to the genial Secretary ; he may remain in office as Secretary of War ; or he may go upon the Supreme Bench ; or he may secure the nomination of the Republican party for President. This last, of course, if the National Convention will give it to him, and with the power and prestige of the administration behind him, that can scarcely be doubted. .

Secretary Taft is expected to indicate in forthcoming speeches his desires concerning the Presidential nomination. Hitherto his expressions have been somewhat cryptic.

There are not wanting those who say that there is an understanding between President Roosevelt and Secretary Taft ; that the unwritten law against a third term in the presidential office might by strict construction be invoked against President Roosevelt succeeding himself ; that in order to avoid even an apparent contravention of that tradition, President Roosevelt is determined not to run again. But there is no law, written or unwritten, which would forbid his filling another term as President after there had been an interval filled by another.

Students of American history will recall the fact that when President Diaz of Mexico had occupied this office for so many terms that he felt he was slightly straining the constitution, he determined to throw a sop to Cerberus by refusing to stand for another term. Thrice therefore at Chapultepec did he refuse the presidential chair, magnanimously asking that it be given to a friend of his, one Manuel Gonzales. So said, so done. All Mexico—particularly all official Mexico—burst forth into plaudits over the generosity and patriotism of the president. Mr. Gonzales was overwhelmingly elected—some were unkind enough to say by reason of the urgent pressure of the Diaz administration behind him. These carpers were also unkind enough to add that it was understood Mr. Gonzales, at the expiration of his term, should use the power of the administration to further the re-election of his friend, Mr. Diaz. But during the Gonzales administration many things happened. It is a way they have. Gentlemen who climb to office sometimes forget the methods by which they climbed there. Sometimes they get the big head. Mr. Gonzales became so impressed with the idea that he was absolutely necessary to the welfare of Mexico that as his term approached its end he made a desperate effort to succeed himself. He failed. As a result of the canvass Mr. Diaz was triumphantly elected by the independent voters of the Republic of Mexico, while Mr. Gonzales went down to well-merited oblivion. Even his wife got a divorce from him, and all Mexico was regaled with the sight of a sign board on a milliner's shop, "Senora Gonzales, Milliner, wife of the Former President of Mexico."

Political quidnuncs now do not hesitate to say that Mr. Roosevelt is anxious to bring about the election of Mr. Taft in order that Mr. Taft, at the expiration of four years, may bring about the election of Mr. Roosevelt.

Well, why not? They are both good men.

We are glad to chronicle, from day to day, additions to the number of committees black-listing the defaulting insurance companies. C. H. Luling, Superintendent of Insurance for the State of Kansas, is in Los Angeles and says: "The report of the California Insurance Commission on the course of insurance companies toward their policy holders in the recent San Francisco fire will be accepted by myself as a final judgment as to whether any particular company can continue to transact business in the State of Kansas. If the report is unfavorable to any company, that company must close its offices in the State of Kansas."

The Oakland Board of Education has directed that the policies held on public buildings by them with companies not acting honorably by their California policy-holders shall be cancelled at once and given to companies that are meeting the issues fairly. When asked by an insurance man what that means the chairman of the board replied: "A company 'acting fairly' is one that pays its losses dollar for dollar, and does not seek to hide behind an earthquake clause."

The Board of Supervisors of Napa County have ordered the cancellation of policies held by insurance companies who are trying to scale down the face value of their policies on risks in the recent fire; the board has also ordered all their business to be reinsured in the companies which are paying their San Francisco losses dollar for dollar.

A number of large mercantile associations, including the National Retail Cigar Dealers' Association, the National Druggists' Association, and the Eagles (a liquor dealers' association) have been securing data from their allied bodies here in San Francisco concerning the insurance situation. As a result the members of these bodies all over the United States are being advised by their officers to cancel all policies with fire insurance companies which are dealing unfairly with their San Francisco policyholders, likewise they are urged to re-write their insurance with the companies which are meeting their losses dollar for dollar.

The Sacramento Board of Supervisors on July 2d resolved to cancel all its insurance business with the dishonest companies now trying to "welch" in.

California. The Board also resolved to re-write its business with companies that were meeting their obligations fully and squarely.

The Pasadena Merchants' Association have written to the State Grocers' Association and the San Francisco Merchants' Association asking for complete reports concerning the present insurance situation in San Francisco. The president of the Pasadena Association writes that as soon as these data are furnished him the members of his association intend as a body to cancel every policy they have written with any fire insurance company which is not meeting its obligations fairly, and to place their insurance at once with the honest companies.

The Santa Cruz City Council on July 1st ordered its Financial Committee to cancel all policies with insurance companies which are making an arbitrary cut on the face values of San Francisco policies. At the same time the City Council ordered the committee to re-insure all public property with the companies which are paying their losses dollar for dollar.

On the whole this very practical crusade against the dishonest and defaulting companies is working out most encouragingly. We are all of us doing to accomplish two ends. We shall punish some knaves who are trying to defraud us, and we shall help our fellow-citizens in other parts of the country to save themselves from similar defalcations.

The City Clerk of Los Angeles has been instructed to cancel all policies of companies which are not paying dollar for dollar on their San Francisco losses. On July 6th he cancelled one policy in the Eagle Insurance Company of Brooklyn, one in the Trans-Atlantic, and one in the English-American Underwriters.

The Commissioners of Multnomah County, Oregon, on July 6th resolved to cancel their insurance policies on county property in all companies that did not pay dollar for dollar in the losses incurred by the San Francisco fire. The county carries insurance on all the county buildings, on a number of ferry boats, on a number of bridges, the court-house, the poor-house, the county hospital, and the jail. The County Commissioners are also advising private individuals to cancel their policies in these defaulting companies.

The city of Portland, Oregon, is also taking steps to find out which insurance companies may be regarded as safe for the municipal business. A committee has been appointed by the mayor to find out which companies are dodging the payment of their San Francisco losses, as it is the intention of Mayor Lane and the executive board to cancel all policies with companies which are not paying their San Francisco losses in full.

The Board of Supervisors of Napa County, California, have ordered the District Attorney to cancel the county policies in insurance companies which are not paying their San Francisco losses fairly. He has also been empowered to reinsure in companies which are paying their San Francisco losses dollar for dollar.

The National Credit Men's Association last week held a meeting in Baltimore and took steps to inform their members all over the country of the action of the insurance companies in San Francisco. There will be no formal boycott, but the names of companies paying dollar for dollar will be conspicuously bulletined in all wholesale concerns in the United States. Those not mentioned in this Roll of Honor will be the concerns that the National Credit Men advise should be avoided.

The recent revelations made by the Commissioners appointed by President Roosevelt to investigate the meat-packing houses in Chicago have caused profound perturbation in that busy city. Chicago does not so much fear the effect of bad meat on the consumer's stomach as she fears the effect of bad reports on the Chicago bank clearances. Therefore the Chicago Commercial Association and the Illinois Manufacturers at once appointed a committee to investigate the packing industries of Chicago. This committee was accompanied by a board of experts, and the business men and experts made a report which was published on July 6th. The committee says that its experts were "governed by professional standards" and hence did not agree with the public horror of filth in food-production; this the experts characterize as a "desire for vague esthetic ideals;" the experts "found the product wholesome, the yards generally clean, and the inspection efficient." The committee of business men adds to this sweeping endorsement of the experts the following: "We ourselves state that the products at the yards are wholesome and proper food. We find that improvements are constantly being made and will be made and we believe the conditions surrounding the large plants are calculated to add to the quality of the product."

When the quality of the product and the character of the output are so perfect, why should so many improvements be necessary? Why are they "constantly being made?" The committee goes on to say: "Improvements are under way everywhere. These betterments relate in some cases to minor things and in others they mean complete rebuilding of old plants." When these plants produce "only wholesome and proper food," why is it necessary to completely rebuild them? When these plants and their product are so perfect it would seem that rebuilding them or improving them would be like painting the lily.

The committee of prominent Chicago business men gives a list of the preservatives used by the packers, but "does not discuss the question of harmfulness from the preservatives employed;" it "commends these questions for scientific inquiry." Doubtless the Chicago committee can find scientists who will report that the preservatives used are not only perfectly harmless but that they add to the health and strength of those who eat the embalmed meats. They have already secured a letter from Professor Welch of John Hopkins University concerning the danger from diseased meat. This accommodating scientist says:

"In view of the absence of any possible danger to health arising from the use of meat of cattle affected with only localized tuberculosis, or actinomycosis (lumpy jaw) of slight or moderate extent, it would, in my opinion, be extravagant and indeed absurd to condemn the carcasses of such cattle, provided the animals are well nourished and otherwise in good condition. It is of course understood that the diseased parts and organs are completely removed and destroyed and that proper precautions are taken to guard against the accidental contamination of the meat with tuberculosis bacilli during and after slaughtering."

People who eat Chicago canned meats will of course be glad to learn that "Cattle affected with only localized tuberculosis" carry no possible danger to health; likewise that "actinomycosis (lumpy jaw) of slight or moderate extent" is in the opinion of Prof. Welch absolutely harmless. That thrifty scientist considers that it would be "extravagant and indeed absurd to condemn the carcasses of such cattle." The Chicago meat packers, the Chicago manufacturers, and the Illinois Association may follow Prof. Welch's dietic suggestions, but most people will be more than willing to let them feed on the tuberculous beeves and the actinomycosed carcasses the Chicago men know more about that kind of meat than we do. Probably they are used to eating around the lumps. A microscope would be a handy adjunct on a Chicago dinner-table in order to find the bacillus of tuberculosis.

When a great city in a greater State contains commercial bodies which will hire experts and scientists to give forth such reports as this on diseased meat, we think it would be the part of wisdom for plain unscientific people to let such meat products alone. The impenitent thief who brazen out his crime with the stolen goods upon his person has always been held up as the limit of frontery. But meat packers who have been accused of feeding people on diseased meats who not only do not deny it but admit it, and then hire experts to prove that tuberculous and lumpy jaw make delicate tid-bits for the American people—this is indeed the limit.

Several United States Army officers recently declined to accept service under the Relief Commission, stating that they did not at all criticize those officers who did accept service, but that they objected for various reasons. At the time the Argonaut marked that those officers accepting might soon come to wish they had declined. This would be coming to pass sooner than might have been expected. Captain Kilian, U. S. A., came to San Francisco many weeks ago from Washington, a fine reputation as a handler of supplies. He speedily showed that his reputation was not served. While the refugees were under army control Captain Kilian amazed even his fellow officers by the way in which he handled vast quantities of food-stuffs and kept the refugees constantly supplied. If there were any complaints they did not reach the press. It is not probable, however, that there were complaints under the army regime.

When matters passed into civilian control they changed completely. Six days after Captain Kilian had been detached from service in the army he was detailed for service under the Relief Commission. Some five or six women appeared at the Moulter warehouse, the headquarters of Captain Kilian. They requested that each should be given a sack of flour, and the captain gave them several sacks. They were accompanied by a newspaper photographer, and a picture of the incident appeared the next day. The following day, July 6th, there appeared a large delegation of women. They did not ask for flour; they demanded it. Captain Kilian advised them to go to Dr. Devine, head of the Relief Commission, and make a requisition, whereupon he would furnish them with the flour. They repaired to headquarters but Dr. Devine was out. Commissioner Kilian then wrote a requisition on Captain Kilian asking him to give to each of the women a two-pound sack of flour. Captain Kilian returned to the Moulter warehouse with his orders, but in the absence the women had decided not to wait. They made a rush for the flour, tore the coat off the back of the storekeeper, and gave his face a good scratching. The number of women gradually increased until by afternoon there were hundreds of women around the warehouse. Captain Kilian was obliged to apply to the Chief of Police to protect the warehouse, but in the meantime the crowd had grown so threatening that Captain Kilian was forced to seize hold of one woman who was trying to force her way in through the door. She made haste toward a police station where she swore out a warrant for Captain Kilian on a charge of battery, and at five o'clock he was taken to police headquarters.

On the whole, perhaps Captain Kilian's time thinks that if military service has its dangers, civil life has its terrors.

For a time it looked as if the influence of the special East would be against San Francisco and on the side of the insurance companies in the present complication. The Eastern insurance companies made the specious argument that they were to jump insurance rates to a high figure all over the United States in order to meet enormous San Francisco earthquake damage. The Argonaut did not say that the earthquake damage was significant, and in most buildings no heyhnted that if Eastern financial circles support them in their struggle to make a horizontal line in San Francisco they would lower the current surce rates which they had raised. For a time located as if the financial East would side with em.

But a new aspect is now given to the case. The steel manufacturers, publishers, shippers, merchants and jobbers find that they are receiving no one from their San Francisco customers. In the nature of things it is impossible, for the San Francisco business men cannot pay unless their losses are paid. These the insurance companies practically refuse to settle. Therefore the San Francisco business men do not settle with their creditors. They do not refuse to settle, they cannot. It is gradually being borne in the minds of the Eastern business world that the millions due them from San Francisco will not be paid until the hundreds of millions due San Francisco from the insurance companies are paid. It is quite evident, therefore, that already the influence of the financial Eastern world will be on the side of our San Francisco business men—on their own sake, if for no other reason.

like of the Seamen's Union still continues in San Francisco. Most of the big passenger liners are going to sea without passengers and in ballast. Most of the steamers likewise are sailing without passengers, although carrying some freight. Steamers do not carry passengers, and are apparently succeeding in getting to sea with extemporized crews and with a certain amount of freight.

The strike is gradually growing more bitter. Collisions have resulted, in each case disastrous to the union men. In one affair a union man was shot and instantly killed, and three others injured; these were "pickets," endeavoring to "make a parade" of non-union men to leave their ship. In another case a union "picket," who was endeavoring to "persuade" a non-union man to quit his job, incidentally shot him in the eye; the non-union man drew a pistol and shot the union man in the arm. This is probably the beginning of a long series of shootings, stabbings, and killings.

The plumbers of San Francisco are receiving $10 a day. Last week they struck for six dollars a day.

This strike interfered with the arrangements of the Building Trades Council, as it threw out of employment a certain number of craftsmen in the trades. Therefore the Building Trades Council rebuked the striking plumbers, and ordered them to return to work. This the striking plumbers not only refused to do, but they refused to let union plumbers from other cities near at hand secure union cards empowering them to work in San Francisco. Thereupon the Building Trades Council determined to furnish union five-dollar tickets to the employing plumbers. As yet, the result is doubtful. When mechanics are getting high wages that their strike for higher wages is met with unsympathetic measures by fellow mechanics there can be little doubt that they are in without warrant.

The United Railroads, which was a very unpopular corporation before the fire, has won high praise from San Franciscans for the rapidity and efficiency with which they have set their emergency lines to work. But they have been badly treated by the carlinemen in their employ. As the company has put its utmost to extend its lines, and as it has a long offer of employment for three thousand men it cannot apparently obtain, the electric carmen have seized this time as a favorable one to demand shorter hours and higher wages. The company is now parleying with them, and the result is as yet unsettled.

As we remarked that all this heart-to-heart talk, bouquet-throwing, and labor-leader gush about "building up dear old San Francisco without enforcing union rules" would turn out to be slobber and drool. The lying down of the employer lion with the labor lamb, that we heard so much of two months ago, is a pipe-dream. The labor union men are out for all they can get. As for the employers, they are rapidly adopting the double-cross Golden Rule—"Do the other fellow or he will do you." The employers can hardly keep on tossing bouquets to the labor union men when the labor union men are throwing brick-bats at them. Besides there are more brick-bats than bouquets now in San Francisco—the bouquets would hardly go round. So that the love-feast of a few weeks ago may now be admitted to have degenerated into a good old hammer-and-tongs scrap.

In the recent disaster the ones who have suffered and are suffering the most in San Francisco are the great middle class. Our rich men were very hard hit, it is true. A great many of them lost all of their incomes, and to-day have absolutely nothing left but hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of unproductive land. This is bad, but they at least have enough to eat, roofs over their heads, and beds to sleep on, which is not the case with some forty or fifty thousand of their fellow citizens.

At the other end of the ladder is the working man. A common laborer in San Francisco to-day gets from $2.50 a day up. As for mechanics, they get fancy wages. Any man who can saw well enough to saw a limb off a tree without sitting on the wrong side of the saw and saving himself off, is called a "carpenter," and gets $4.00 to $5.00 a day. Bricklayers were getting $7.00, and are now getting $8.00. In between these plutocrats, the hard-hit rich men and the eight-dollar-a-day mechanics, is the great middle class, the clerks, book-keepers, stenographers, small shop-keepers, salesmen, floor-walkers and cashiers of stores, janitors, commercial travelers, florists, caterers, etc. These are the people who are suffering. The clerk who had a little house which he had built has lost his house and his employment. His employer, who also had a house, a place of business, and a lucrative trade, has lost all three, and the power to employ his clerk. These people to-day are eating the bitter bread of charity. These are the ones to whom it is vital that the city should be built up speedily again. But if the crippled rich man is going to be gouged by a purse-proud mechanic the rich man will not build—for that matter he cannot. If prices continue to soar for labor as they are doing now, it will put an effectual stop to the building of a new San Francisco. The rich man can stand the stoppage, even if he has no income. He can eat up his land. But the impoverished middle-class man cannot. There is a shade of self-inflicted retribution in the condition of these middle-class voters. Hitherto they have persistently sided with and voted for the Labor Union men. Instinctively they have allied themselves with the Labor Union men and against the rich. Now they are seeing what the gratitude, the consideration of labor unions is like.

Perhaps the method about to be used by the policy-holders against the defaulting insurance companies would also be useful in this labor crisis, to wit, publicity. No more spectacular disaster than the destruction of San Francisco has ever occurred in the history of the world. It will loom as large in the minds of men as the great explosion of Krakatoa or the burning of Moscow. There is a peg on which to hang your advertisement so it will stick in men's minds. If it be known throughout the world that bricklayers are getting $8.00 a day in San Francisco, plumbers $6.00 and common laborers $2.50 to $3.00, the working-men of the world will believe it. And why? Because they will have heard that San Francisco was destroyed and hence they will believe that she is to be built up again; that therefore there is a great demand for labor; that therefore there is a scarcity of laborers; that wages hitherto unknown in the history of the world are being paid. All these things they will believe. There would then be such a mighty pilgrimage of workmen to San Francisco that it would resemble the crusades of the early Middle Ages.

We have already commented on the vain hope of San Francisco policy holders that the German Imperial Government would intervene on their behalf with the German insurance companies. A vain hope? It is an illusion, a delusion, an ignis fatuus!

Since writing that paragraph we note a statement attributed to F. Bopp, who is said to be German Consul, and who is reported as recently returned from Germany; "there," we are told, "he investigated the standing of companies doing business on this coast." Consul Bopp is reported as saying: "I am in a position to know that the German insurance companies will pay dollar for dollar, and I advise all persons doing business with a German company not to accept a compromise." To give a pinker tinge to this rose-colored picture, the article in which Mr. Bopp is interviewed adds: "The Consul has just concluded an exhaustive investigation of the conditions in San Francisco, the results of which he has sent off to his government. The tenor of his report is unmistakably in favor of compelling the German companies to carry out their obligations." The Consul was further interviewed by the guileless reporter as to "the attitude of Emperor William toward those companies that showed a tendency to shave their claims. The general implication of his remarks was that the Emperor had practically ordered those companies to settle on a dollar-for-dollar basis."

All this is interesting, if true. We sincerely hope that Mr. Bopp is right and that our local policy holders will be paid their insurance losses. Although, like Thomas Didymus, we doubt, we can not help but admire the guarded attitude of the Consul when he refused to commit himself as to the attitude of Emperor William toward the companies. If the present Kaiser were Frederick Barbarossa; if Redbeard were still seated on the German Imperial throne; or if the first Hohenzollern still occupied his Brandenburg castle whence he could sally forth and hang up rich burghers by the thumbs until they revealed their hidden treasure; if fire insurance companies had existed in the early Middle Ages; if San Francisco had burned down before Martin Luther nailed up his defiance at Wittenberg; if the then Hohenzollern was suzerain of San Francisco, and wished to aid its impoverished burghers; if the directors of the fire insurance companies did not learn of this in time to reach the frontier; if the Hohenzollern war-lord got hold of the fleeing directors, brought them back, and nailed them by the ears to the door of his Imperial barn; if all these hypotheses were true, we would agree with Consul Bopp. We believe that the remaining fire insurance directors who got across the frontier in time, and who reflected on their fellow directors nailed up by their ears, would at once rescue them and pay the San Francisco fire losses. But we know of no way in which the present Kaiser can work upon the corporations except through the courts. He is not "Emperor of Germany;" he is "German Emperor." He is King of Prussia, it is true, but he is not King of Saxony or of Bavaria. Even if he were, he would be a constitutional monarch as he is in Prussia. If there is any way in which he can order corporations to change their methods of business except the courts, we do not know what it is. Take, for example, a German company doing business in San Francisco, like the Hamburg-Bremen, which has reinsured with a German company not doing business in San Francisco, the Rauber-und-Dieb-Feuer-und-Wasser-Nicht-Erbeben-Versicherung-Gesellschaft. If the Kaiser should order the Rauber-und-Dieb-Feuer-und-Wasser-Nicht-Erbeben-Versicherung-Gesellschaft

THE KAISER
AND THE COMPANIES

Ischaft to pay to the Hamburg-Bremen in San Francisco its fire losses, and if the Rauber-und-Dieb-Feuer-und-Wasser-Nicht-Erdbeben-Versicherung-Gesellschaft should refuse, what would he do? Would he lock the Rauber-und-Dieb-Feuer-und-Wasser-Nicht-Erdbeben-Versicherung-Gesellschaft up in the deepest dungeon beneath the castle moat at Bidlelsdorf, or at Pottsdam? Or would he take the Rauber-und-Dieb-Feuer-und-Wasser-Nicht-Erdbeben-Versicherung-Gesellschaft and chop off its head?

Counsel Bopp, we pause for a reply.

The final verdict of Congress on the Panama Canal was for the lock type. It is evident that the Senate voted this way with reluctance. Many Senators expressed themselves as not competent to form an opinion on the subject. Others stated that they considered it a subject distinctly for engineers and not for laymen. Others explained that they preferred a sea level canal, but voted for a lock canal because it was the choice of the president. The general opinion of the senate seemed to be that two serried hosts of engineers had expressed themselves as being in favor of both types; that therefore it was evident there was no grave danger in laymen voting for either type. Senator Foraker probably expressed the feeling of the Senate when he said that he would vote for the lock canal "with misgivings," but believed that the judgment of those charged with the actual work of construction inclined toward the lock canal, and that therefore he would follow their lead.

When so many engineers have indorsed the lock type it is probable that it is safe. Another matter in its favor is that if the actual work of construction should develop the fact that a sea-level canal is superior to a lock canal, it would be comparatively easy to change to the sea-level system. As it is now, the type favored by the president has been endorsed by both House and Senate, which is well.

In digging the big ditch the president will have a free hand and Congress has been liberal. The president has a canal commission and an engineer force who have his entire confidence, and Congress has voted him practically unlimited funds. We hope that the incessant changes and blunders which have characterized the operations of the canal commission up to a recent period will be replaced by substantial and enduring achievements, and that the great enterprise may be rapidly brought to a successful ending.

For many years the Argonaut has been urging the authorities in San Francisco to prohibit the sale of fireworks on and prior to the Fourth of July. It is absurd to pass ordinances prohibiting the use of such engines of the devil so long as their sale is freely permitted. But despite the inflammable nature of much of the city, no such attempt has ever before been made. In previous years our admirable fire department has been on duty day and night for from twenty-four to thirty hours over the national holiday. The sound of the fire bell during that holiday has been almost continuous. The list of fires would sometimes fill half a column or a column in the daily newspapers. Prudent householders the day before would take every precaution against fire. Usually such abundant care would result in minimizing—not the number of fires but their destructiveness. The Fourth of July fires have always been numerous but fortunately extinguished soon.

This year, when San Francisco's business district had been almost completely destroyed by fire, the municipal authorities prevented the ruins from being burned by prohibiting fireworks:

In former years the number of youth seriously injured and sometimes even killed by toy cannons and pistols and exploding bombs has been very large. On the Fourth of July, 1905, for example, there were at the San Francisco Emergency Hospital 216 cases of injury, more or less serious, due to firearms and fireworks. In 1906 there were but three. The foresight of the municipal authorities in forbidding the use of fireworks this year, and thereby relieving any possible strain on the emergency hospital, is highly commended, when one reflects that there is no longer an emergency hospital.

Nearly all of the semi-annual insurance statements are made as of June 30th. The crooked companies which in San Francisco are putting on a poor mouth and pretending that they cannot pay their just debts are now being forced to show their hand. If they make statements to the insurance commissioners of the various Eastern States that they are sound and solvent, they can not pretend here that they are unsound and semi-insolvent. In short, they are between the devil and the deep sea. They are being given a little time by the Eastern insurance commissioners, but they will soon have to show down.

In the meantime the people are punishing the bunko companies in their own way. The move we chronicled last week toward cancelling current insurance in the crooked companies is becoming more general. San Diego inaugurated the movement in California, and it has been followed in Washington and Oregon. Sacramento is cancelling her insurance in the bunko companies. Oakland is following suit, and is dividing the cancelled business between the dollar-for-dollar companies. The Santa Cruz City Council has ordered all city policies with "welching" companies to be cancelled. So with several of the lesser municipalities in California. Letters arrive daily from the East at the newspaper offices here, asking information concerning the facts of the insurance situation. In these busy times editors have not much opportunity to write letters in reply, but an abundance of printed matter is going back to these seekers after information. As matters are going now, the bunko companies who are trying to dodge their debts will find that they are not only writing no new business but that all the business they have will soon be cancelled.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Col. Milio Kosterlisky, commanding the rurales at Sonora, Mex., whose presence quelled the riot at Cananea, is a terror to evil doers, both savage and civilized, and is admitted to be the strongest military character on the Mexican frontier. By birth he was a Russian. In 1871, being then a soldier in the United States cavalry, he deserted in Arizona, escaped to Sonora and obtained a commission in the Mexican army. President Grant pardoned him through the intercession of the president of Mexico.

Lady Doyle, wife of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, is dead. It is expected that the President will leave in October, or early in November, for the Isthmus of Panama, to investigate the work being done on the canal. He will be absent about three weeks. The trip, it is believed, will be made on one of the big cruisers of the navy.

The President has been sitting for a portrait bust to be placed in the capitol at Washington, the artist being James Earl Fraser of New York city, a pupil of St. Gaudens. Mr. Roosevelt thinks the model fine. It will presently be cast in bronze.

The portraits of Gov. Pennypacker, the late Senator Quay, Israel W. Durham, and other Pennsylvania political celebrities, are now on the $60,000 bronze doors at the main entrance to the state capitol building at Harrisburg.

William Pinckney Whyte has re-entered the United States Senate, to fill the unexpired term of the late Arthur Poe Gorman, at the age of 81. Gorman was an old political enemy of Whyte, and defeated him for the senatorship 25 years ago.

Captain "Hank" Haff, dean of American yachting skippers, died at Islip, L. I., last week. In the fall of 1881, when the America cup was defended by the sloop Mischief, he sailed as one of the picked crew. In 1886 he was on the Mayflower as adviser to Capt. Stone in the cup races and in 1887 he was given command of the Volunteer, which defended the America cup that year. In 1895 he had command of the Defender, with which he defeated Lord Dunraven's Valkyrie III. In 1898 he resumed command of the Volunteer, then owned by J. Malcolm Forbes, and remained with her until when he was chosen by Thomas W. Lawson to command his ill-starred Independence.

The late Premier Seddon of New Zealand was a remarkable man in many ways. Born of humble parentage in 1841, he emigrated to Australia in the fever of 1863. Turning saloon-keeper he soon became prosperous, and passed to New Zealand, where he became mayor of Kumara. In 1879 he entered the House of Representatives, where his bold and extreme radical principles soon brought him into prominence. He became prime minister in 1893. Practically the New Zealand administration.

Elihu Root's string of LL. D.'s is not to be sneezed at. Hamilton, Yale, Columbia University of New York, Williams and Princeton have contributed to it. Root sailed from New York on July 4th on the cruiser Charleston on a three months' South American tour. From July 25th to August 6th he will represent this country at the third Pan-American Congress in Janeiro, Brazil.

Despite the strongest influence to have the sex evoked Elliot F. Shepard, of New York, grandson of late W. H. Vanderbilt, must serve six weeks' imprisonment imposed upon him October 26th last, with a fine of $120 and $4,000 for running over and killing while driving an automobile at St. Ouen, France, April, 1905.

Mrs. Semple, daughter of President Tyler, or "first lady of the land," is spending her last days in Louise Home in Washington. She is 86 years of age, blind, but is in good health.

Joseph F. Sinnott, a distiller of Philadelphia, who last week leaving an estate of more than $1,000,000 bequeathed $10,000 in trust to the University of Pennsylvania hospital for equipping and maintaining a room for one sick person at a time who shall have been a newspaper writer or a journalist in preference to any other. The endowment is in commemoration of his daughter, Joseph E. Sinnott, who was a reporter in Philadelphia.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who has just passed her 92d birthday, has enjoyed the remarkable experience of seeing her husband returned to Parliament for Westminster on the centenary of her father's first election to that constituency.

Everything is Lovely on the Isthmus.

Down at Panama, friends, the goose honks hi
And everything is lovely in the Zone.
All that talk of grafting was just a blooming
Graft (above a "flea bite") is unknown.
Not a word of truth in that screed of Bigelow!
Bigelow's afflicted with strabismus.
Everybody's glad to know what Everybody's k
That everything is lovely on the Isthmus.
Down with the knackers! A bas P. Bigelow!
Everything is lovely in the Zone.
Fever is a-flying, the mosquito is a-dying.
And the vulture doesn't often pick a bone.
Work is going forward with a Brobdingnagian stride;
Probably they'll finish it by Christmas.
Tennyrate our check's aglow with patriotic
For everything is lovely on the Isthmus.—P

The Old Stand-by.

If simple potted ham be bad,
And devilled chicken worse,
If breakfast bacon's but an ad
To fill some packers' purse,
If meat is doped to add three cents
A pound to canner's cash,
Oh, what are the ingredients
Of good old corned beef hash?
If tinned up tongue is 'phony food,
As is extract of beef;
If mince meat isn't any good
What words shall gauge our grief?
We'll all be vegetarians
And mornings, nights and noons
We'll have no more of things in cans,
Oh, Lizzie, pass the prunes.

Would you your last remaining Thousands spend
About the Secret? Quick about it, Friend!
A Hair perhaps divides This Make from That
And on that Hair, prithee, may life depend!
Now the New Year reviving old Desires,
The thoughtful Soul to Catalogues retires;
He scorns his Last Year's Runabout, and
The Newest, Biggest Touring Car aspires!
Each Year a Hundred Models brings, you say
Yes, but who buys the Car of Yesterday?
And every Mail brings in New Catalogues
That make a Last Year's Model fade away!

Waste not your Hour nor in the Vain pursuit

A CIVILIZED FOURTH OF JULY.

FREAKS OF THE FIRE.

Were Only Apparent--Really Due to Fire-Fighting or to Wide Streets--Isolated Buildings in the Ruins.

first view at close quarters of the burned city will fail to sadden a returning San Franciscan by its aspect of utter ruin and desolation. Yet curiously enough, when wrapped in a familiar San Francisco and viewed from the bay, with the outlines of great clusters of buildings breaking the sky line and the bulk of surviving sky-scrappers looming large, the old city looks a city still.

Between these survivals of the holocaust, however, many blocks burned bare to the brown earth, and in these desolate testimonials to the devouring of the flames, the spectator wonders at the curious chances of chance that spared a few structures from the ravages of such relentless character.

At a little investigation reveals that it was not chance or concerted effort that preserved these few landmarks. Chance, of course played its part. It is, for instance, surprising, considering the upward trend of flames, that the lower stories only of the Kohl Building are left, a number of the upper floors retaining their work and the offices their furniture absolutely unharmed.

At the Montgomery Block, on Montgomery Street between Washington and Merchant, is still standing, in its neighborhood to the Appraiser's Building. The latter structure were stored many valuable documents, and a strong effort was made to save it. Thus times advancing toward its direction were stayed, saving the salvation of the Montgomery Block, and buildings that still stand on the adjoining block to the north.

In manner in which the Latin denizens of Telegraph Avenue have already been described. The residence in these humble homes of wine in sufficient quantities to soak blankets and avert fire is due to practice among Italians of making home-made wine. In the fall of the year, whole wagon-loads of grapes may be seen being carried into the tenements occupied by Italians formerly dwellers in the vine districts of the city. These people have crude wine-presses in their homes, with which they press out a light wine from the grapes and store in kegs for home consumption, the wine being drunk almost before it has begun to ferment. Another expedient was successfully practiced by the holders who dwell down on the level block partly covered by Montgomery Avenue and North Point and Streets. At this point the bay is so near at hand that one who kept his head during the general panic hit on a plan for utilizing its waters. While the men and children were despatched to a place of safety on a tug boat, the husbands and fathers organized a rescue against the flaming horror. Ripping up the carpets they dipped them in the waters of the bay and hanging them over the roofs and walls of the houses, saving them from time to time for newly wetted as they dried in the advancing heat. That the extent was a success is evidenced by a clump of some four or eighteen buildings that still stand in the local neighborhood.

Especially the line of houses on the western side of Market Street was saved by organized effort. A force of two hundred men united in a common cause to fight the fiery destroyer, whose course they stayed by getting wet over the houses blankets and carpets pre-dipped in bath-tubs into which had been drawn the water the pipes would yield.

A house that was saved helped to save others, who joined together to prevent the destruction of Robert Louis Stevenson's house, and that of Frank G. were instrumental in preserving the entire of houses which now remains in isolation in the neighborhood of Larkin and Chestnut Streets.

A householder waged his war single-handed, by old house on the corner of Leavenworth and Market Streets was saved by its owner. At hand, the roof which was of tin. Its incombustibility permitted him to direct his efforts toward the sides of the building, portions of which he chopped down as they began to smoke.

An unprejudiced observer, who is outside of the city and against the widening of streets, cannot but be struck by one fact, noticeable in connection with every one of the saved sections; namely, that they all in every instance. The general conflagration was checked at Van Ness Avenue, the widest street in the city proper.

The mission, Dolores Street, an exceptionally wide street, forms the dividing line between the burned and unburned sections, its width having greatly aided the fire-fighters in the determined efforts mentioned.

Telegraph and Russian Hills the bluffs, the jagged and the precipitous descents interposed further obstacles of space to bar the progress of the fire.

San Francisco, as it is now the fashion to call the fragment of the city, is new indeed, in that it rises the most recently built and improved portion of the peninsula. Very few old houses remain, and a vagrant chance has left standing on the corner of Market and Taylor Streets an old, old structure belonging to the tenement class which had served its time, and was appropriate food for fire. This house, which was forty or fifty years ago, a substantial and comfortable dwelling, occupied by the Gummerts, a well-known family of pioneer days, was, on account of its detached position, overlooked by the greedy flames although the tenant, foreseeing, as he thought, its inevitable end, lost all his household goods by carrying them out to the open hillside where they were speedily consumed in a rain of cinders.

The stimulating effect of the flying colors on the military was exemplified in an interesting incident which took place during the fire. A body of soldiers from the Presidio, while passing along the eastern slope of Russian Hill at the intersection of Taylor and Vallejo Streets were struck by the sight of the flag, which was flying from a flagpole on the residence adjoining that of Eli Shepherd. It was occupied by Edward Dakin, a Grand Army man, who has a penchant for running up the colors on appropriate occasions. When the denizens of that block were warned by the fire fighters to leave, Mr. Dakin dipped his colors three times amidst the cheers of his departing neighbors, and left the flag flying. Later, a group of soldiers detailed to relieve those who were fighting the fire, passed by and noted the presence of the flag.

"Boys," said the young captain to his command. "Let us save that house for the sake of the colors." The proposition was received with cheers and the conflict was begun with youthful enthusiasm. Water had flowed in the pipes on Russian Hill hours after those in other sections were dry, and the bath-tubs in both the Dakin and Shepherd residences were full. The men gathered all the blankets available, and hung them dripping over the roof. A bucket full of lime-water which had been used by the plasterers at work on the Hanford mansion that was being built across the street--and which still stands--was utilized by the soldiers for the making of mud pies, with which they daubed the parts of the roof the blankets failed to cover. When parts of it smoked, they played upon it sprays of Shasta water from a dozen bottles they found in the house, or chopped off the smoking fragments.

The house was saved, although that of William Stadtfeldt, which was separated from it by a space of some twenty-five feet, was burned to the ground, and with it the records, and much valuable music of the Loring Club, of which Mr. Stadtfeldt became the director on the death of David Loring.

A curious accompaniment of the fire was the apathy that possessed many people during its spread. Not only was this noticeable among the illiterate classes, but plenty of people of intelligence made absolutely no effort to save their goods. Thousands of spectators assembled on the nearest heights, and, gazing apathetically at the roaring furnace in the business section, seemed hypnotized into immobility by the terrible spectacle.

Where hundreds buried their silver and household treasures, those of thousands were abandoned either to be melted or consumed. Some dug huge trenches, in which they placed rugs, trunks of clothing, silver and chinaware, books and laces. In many cases, the owners returned after a few days with the intention of recovering their possessions, only to find that they had been carried away by looters. In other cases, they discovered that the pits they dug having been insufficiently covered, the heat of the fire had penetrated the loosely strewn earth and injured the goods beyond redemption.

In the era of reconstruction which is following the calamity the mood of the people varies between that of the optimism so glowing described in the daily press and a stoical acceptance of the inevitable. There are no tears and few bewailings, the calamity being too widespread to offer special opportunity to the constitutional railer against destiny.

The following conversation might well stand for hundreds that take place during the first meeting of friends and acquaintances after the fire:

"Burned out?" with a pleasant smile.
"Burned out. And you?"
"Of course," with an answering smile and a shrug.
"Did you save anything?"
"Nothing but what I have on, and a pair of blankets. Did you?"

"Just that and no more. Were you insured?"
"Yes, for about one-fourth of the value. Were you?"
"Yes, but like you, only for one-fourth or one-fifth of the value."

Truly, a plucky people this, but unless all signs fail, one that will not lay to heart the lesson of the fire. In spite of many solemn warnings San Francisco took its chances before, and the prospect is that the easy optimism which enables it to bear its losses with such philosophy will induce it to take them again, without making proper provision against the future repetition of a general conflagration. SAN FRANCISCO, July, 1906.

Although wiseacres predicted swift political advancement for Congressman Longworth, after he became a member of the President's family, the representative already has a contest on his hands to keep his present office. A Cincinnati lawyer, Theodore Horstman, has openly declared that he aspires to succeed Mr. Longworth in Congress. Mr. Horstman and his friends are planning to make their fight, first at the primaries and then at the convention. Mr. Longworth's self-announced opponent claims that Mr. Longworth does not represent "that spirit of the Republican party which is awakening and the support of which it is necessary to have this time in order to win." Mr. Longworth is yet to be heard from.

LATE VERSE.

The Spirit of '49.

Gray-bearded, rugged, lithe and long,
He stood and gazed upon the spot
Where, proud and beautiful and strong,
A city was that now is not.
Tears, manly tears, coursed down his face;
The thing that was to him was dear,
For he had seen it in its grace--
This California pioneer!

"O city of my sunset seas,"
He murmured, as a voice that dreams,
"Farewell her golden argosies,
Her voyagers of the old triremes;
Far out beyond her ocean gate
I see mirrored the things that were,
The human tide that followed fate
Unto the naked birth of her.

"The long processions o'er the hills,
The cracking whips above the steers,
The lumbering wagons memory fills
With souls who entertained no fears;
The picks on shoulder in that train
That sought a new world in the old,
And left the harvest fields of grain
To till these Western hills of gold.

"Her first rude huts, I see them rise,
Her later avalanche of life,
Building beneath these matchless skies--
To love as one could love a wife--
A city with the spirit fine
That follows rugged manhood's sway;
A portion of the new world's spine,
A measure of the far Cathay.

"But out of it, and through and through,
Mixing the rugged with the fine,
She grew--oh, how my city grew!--
Into conglomerates divine;
Into a hairy-breasted Gath,
A red-blood, tawny-bosomed town.
Good God, what reason for this wrath
That tossed her, sundered, shook her down!

"Down, yet not down, for she shall wake,
Her spirit sends its roots far back
Into the hearts that for her sake
Will bend with courage to the rack.
Her children are the children yet
Of those who left the plains behind,
Who conquered mountains, all they met,
And whistled hardship to the wind.

"Their spirit is the spirit true
That out of all this wailing waste
Will build the framework and the flue,
A finer city, firmer based.
Take courage, brothers of my race;
Hail stricken daughter, splendid mart,
These tears that trickle down my face
Are for the comfort of thy heart!"

Gray-bearded, like a shade he passed,
A halo of his hope arose,
And where the golden waters glassed
The city's desolate repose
A bow of brilliant promise streamed
O'er that dark ruin, burned and sear,
In whose aurelian colors gleamed
The vision of the Pioneer.--Baltimore Sun.

Contentment.

I read dread news of earthquake shocks,
Of buildings tumbling down,
Of roaring seas of flame that sear
And devastate the town;
Of lives by hundreds blotted out,
And thousands forced to flee--
Well,

New England isn't perfect, but
It's good enough for me!

I read how old Vesuvius
Has started up again,
To mock with his tremendous force
The puny will of men;
To drive them from their humble homes,
And show what hell may be--
Well,

New England isn't perfect, but
It's good enough for me!

I read of cyclones, floods, and great Disasters everywhere,
Of natural calamities
That drive men to despair;
And then I think how blest we are,
From all such trials free--
Yes,

New England isn't perfect, but
It's good enough for me!

The Lamp in the West.

Venus has lit her silver lamp
Low in the purple West,
Breathing a soft and mellow light
Upon the sea's full breast;
It is the hour when velvet winds
Tremble the alder's crest.

Far out, far out the restless bar
Starts from a troubled sleep,
Where roaring through the narrow straits
The meeting waters leap;
But still that shining pathway leads
Across the lonely deep.

When I sail out the narrow straits
Where unknown dangers lie,
And cross the troubled, moaning bar
To the mysterious sea--
Dear God, wilt Thou not set a lamp
Low in the West for me?

THE EARTHQUAKE FAULT.

Herman Whittaker Tells of It in "Harper's Weekly"—He Follows It for Many Miles Up and Down the Coast.

"Have you seen the fault?" A friend asked me a couple of weeks ago.

"The fault? What is that?" said I.

"Earthquake fissure," he answered, briefly. "Comes out of the sea at Mussel Rock, four miles below the Cliff House, then runs away down the coast."

I had not seen it, but early next morning I took a car from the Ferry to Ocean View, and then cut across country three miles to the ocean.

"You can't go to Mussel Rock to-day," said a man whom I passed on the way. "Though I have been back and forth once a week for fourteen years, I could hardly find my way this morning. The whole face of the country is changed."

Of course he exaggerated; yet, coming out on the beach I found his statement had a solid foundation in fact. Though at this point the fault passed a full mile out to sea, the sand cliffs, seven or eight hundred feet in height, were torn, riven, and rent all along their front. Where dark chaparral had clothed gentle slopes, vertical surfaces now showed yellow as a gangrened wound, purple-streaked where the friction of sliding masses had actually burned the clay. In one place a big slice had fallen over, forming a miniature range with a valley a hundred yards wide between it and the parent cliff. At another, the slide had gone so far out into the ocean that one might walk, dry-shod, beyond the end of Mussel Rock, which projects a hundred and fifty yards to sea.

Along the face of the cliff, some four hundred feet above the beach, a right of way had been excavated for the Ocean Shore Electric Road. Of this there remained only odd bits. Buried at some points under enormous slides, at others it was shorn away and tossed into the ocean. Half-way up one slide, the steel derrick of a steam shovel projected. Four men were digging it out—one of whom was actually on the shovel—when the quake sloughed off both it and the right of way.

Half a mile or so from the buried shovel, I crossed the line of the fault. Coming out of the Pacific Ocean in the vicinity of Point Arena, one hundred and twenty miles north of San Francisco, it runs south along the coast for two hundred and twenty-five miles to San Juan. There it fades from view, yet pursues its course, doubtless, many other hundreds of miles beneath the Californian desert. Of its kind, it is the most stupendous in history, exceeding by four times the length of the fault in the great Japanese earthquake of 1891. Sometimes a wide crevasse, sometimes a sunken road between parallel fissures, again humped into a line of torn brown sod, it ploughs through green valleys, cleave forests, splits mountains—all with a sublime contempt of topography, and impressing one with a sense of the omnipotent energy behind, of blind force, of power immutable and absolutely indifferent to human hopes and fears.

At the head of Spring Valley it appeared as a fissure, black and irregular, paralleling the road. On the morning of the quake one might, I suppose, have dropped a stone down to where, miles below, the earth's ponderous machinery creaked and groaned; and though the sides had now caved and crumbled, it still yawned with sinister suggestiveness. Stepping down, I had an uncomfortable feeling that the black walls might close in like a door on a fly, or open and let me through. It was impressive. No man may gaze on this, the visible cause of San Francisco's disaster, without a secret feeling of awe, nor can he refrain from speculation as to the mighty causes which produced this great effect—causes which hark back to the very beginnings of geological time.

On the Pacific Coast the oldest rocks are lime-stones and quartzites. Ages ago these were elevated above the sea, were extensively eroded by stream and wave action, and were then submerged and covered by thousands of feet of sediments, which formed the Franciscan or Golden Gate series. This deposition was ended by a second upward movement. Raised high above sea-level, the series was folded, creased and faulted—that is, broken across the strata. Remaining above sufficiently long to be eroded, it sank again to be covered in turn, by eight thousand feet of sediments of the Cretaceous and Eocene periods. Elevated for the third time, the series was crumpled and faulted into a well-defined mountain range, and sank once more in Pliocene times, though this time not completely submerged. Along the California coast was deposited the Merced series, beneath which is found a forest of pines indistinguishable from those now growing at Monterey, and which proves the rapidity of the submergence. Raised for the last time, the series was tilted at angles as high as seventy-five degrees, and dislocated by a heavy fault which formed Spring Valley and the system of ponds and lakes that furnish the San Francisco water-supply. Along the valley run three well-defined faults, the San Andreas and San Bruno, which pass to sea at different angles, and a third which diverges in the direction of the city of Santa Rosa, and accounts for the enormous destruction in that city.

The origin of Spring Valley thus understood, a little additional data enable us to guess what happened on the morning of April 18. Geologists divide earthquakes into two classes, volcanic and tectonic. The former occur at comparatively shallow depths, diffuse their vibrations from a definite center, have a short radius of influence, and are not followed by after-quakes. They may, in fact, be closely imitated by the explosion of large quantities of dynamite at the bottom of deep mines. Tectonic quakes, on the other hand, occur at greater depths, and are caused by the breaking of strata along a line. Their waves are sent forth from this line, whatever its length, and they are always followed by after-quakes. To this class belongs the great Japanese earthquake before mentioned, which killed seven thousand people, wounded seventeen thousand, and destroyed two hundred thousand houses. It was caused by movement along a fissure which appeared on the surface as a fault seventy miles in length, and after an exhaustive study, Professor John Milne concludes that they are more frequent in districts that exhibit evidences of elevation or subsidence, such as our own Pacific Coast.

This understood, let the reader place the palms of the hands together, the left representing the Pacific Ocean and strip of coast line; the right, the remainder of California. For years, perhaps, centuries, the rock strata beneath have been exposed to increasing strain by enormous and unknown forces. It may be caused by the shrinkage of the earth's envelope on a cooling center once molten as some say; by vast masses of sediment that have been carried out by the coast rivers, millions of millions of tons, and have been deposited on the ocean floor till the weight breaks down the strata, as maintained by others. Be this as it may, the limit of elasticity has been reached at 5:15 on the morning of April 18. Here at that hour, at the head of Spring Valley, the air is warm and meadow-larks are singing. Mr. Fay, foreman of the Sneith ranch, is bringing up the cows that will not supply San Francisco's breakfast. Unknown to himself, he is riding along the fault, but beyond the eerie stillness—dubbed "earthquake weather" by Californians—there is nothing to indicate that, miles below, vast subterranean forces are poised on a hair-trigger.

Now snoot the left hand forward, the right back. With a roar, a rumble, a crash, grinding of rocks, the cry of a world in pain, the strata break along the old fault. Zip! it slips eight feet, laterally, along its two hundred and twenty-five miles of land line and nobody knows how many hundreds more of ocean bed. The Pacific slides north eight feet; California comes eight feet south. When the evidence is all in, Professor Lawson and the geologists of the State Commission will doubtless tell us which; but their verdict makes no difference upon the personal problem of Mr. Fay on the Sneith ranch.

To understand what happened to him just up-end a book on the table and snatch the table cloth eight feet. The legs were snapped from beneath the horse, and when, bruised and shaken, Mr. Fay rose, he was thrown again to the ground. Lying there, he saw that his cows were all down, some rolling, others whirling spasmodically in their attempts to get up. Up at the house, Mrs. Fay was thrown from the stove, where she was cooking breakfast, out through the open doorway. Fancy! what if that fault had gone through San Francisco? Though she is in ashes, the unfortunate city may be thankful that it passed six miles outside her borders. Had it clove her center, the foundations borders.

Not far from the Sneith ranch, I came on the first break in the Spring Valley Water Company's twenty-inch main, the pipe that supplied most of San Francisco's water. Broken here and pushed apart till its sides overlap, it was flattened farther on, telescoped or wrenched apart, according to the angle at which it crossed the fault. Imagine the power required to telescope one length of a buried iron pipe upon another of the same gauge! Yet this occurred at a hundred points. For a mile it was pulled apart at every joint; beginning with half-inch apertures, the breaks grew wider and wider between every length, until the maximum eight inches was attained. Crossing Andreas dam, a mammoth structure, it moved one end bodily over, leaving a jog of feet in both dam and fence. Further down it threw, crushed or pulled apart the big main which here is carried on trestles. At Springs it shoved through a brick drain, car halves over so that opposite walls now to all it wrecked the system with a completeness would seem the act of malicious fate to one of the geology of the region.

Viewing the wreck, no unprejudiced man fail to exonerate the water company from charges of contributory negligence so freely against it. Lynching has been mentioned too good for its directors. It has been accused of carrying its main on flimsy trestles; of using piping; of snoring peacefully while San Francisco burned. On the contrary, the company doing thing that was possible in the premises. San Andreas main was hopelessly wrenched, turned all its energies upon other sources for repairing the least damaged first. For Mr. Schussler, the chief engineer, live automobile; ate in it, snatched his sleep; chauffeur whirled him up and down the pipe. Further, the company had made some provision against possible earthquakes.

Passing from Spring Valley, the fault southward, three or four miles to the Redwood City and Palo Alto. Being so line of greatest destruction, both towns, course, badly wrecked. The damage at University alone runs high in the millions. Jose, farther from the line, suffered less; proportion to size, the actual earthquake exceeded that of San Francisco. At V station on the Southern Pacific's South Coast, the fault sliced the Santa Cruz Mountains, the railway tunnel that carries the line of feet below the summit.

Originally I had no intention of writing fault. My visit had been prompted by But the first glance convinced me that, earthquake phenomena, this, its sign-manifest cause, was the most worthy of record other means of conveyance being available I south on foot through a drizzle making twenty-seven miles that first day roughest kind of walking. Two days later a North Shore train to view the fault in its aspects. Though three weeks had elapsed was the first train to run through to Cazadero terminal, and everywhere along the line construction trains were in evidence, strapping track, bracing bridges, reestablishing gradients.

Wherever the line approached the faults of severe shock abounded. It is at Mount Tamalpais has been moved bodily. At Point Reyes, on Tomales Bay, a late ment of fifteen feet has been measured occurs, of course, in marsh-land, and doubles the movement of the underlying rock. It undoubtedly proves the destruction of the surveys. All the surveys on the Pacific will have to be reestablished, and in the broken property lines it will be a pretty settle just which man's land has been moved on to the other fellow's property.

Passing the end of Tomales Bay, the called me out to the rear platform to look of grade that had sunk five feet below while there recounted his personal experience. "When the tremor turned loose," "our train was just ready to pull out. Reyes on the morning trip down. I had my orders and swung aboard, when—being thrown from the track and turned back was the most puzzled man in California looked over at the station. Then I knew frames, glass, were gone from every window; a big frame house had been thrown bodily away."

A few minutes later I saw the house, less, with high-tide washing in and out of windows, it conveyed a peculiar impression of wreck, flood and fire.

From Point Reyes northward, the line a zone of small destruction; partly, perhaps, cause towns are few and small, and partly in its methods the earthquake was kinder to a coquettish woman. Here shaking the earth out of a town, as in the case of Santa Cruz, gliding under another, as with Petaluma, a third, setting with all the fury of a terremoto. So sparing Cazadero, the North terminal, it seized and tore Duocan's main terrible convulsion; worried, shook it, the story frame hotel fell apart like a house

Insurance Man Discusses San Francisco's Situation Touches on Our Nerves, Our Fire Risks, and Our "Six-Bit" Expectations.

He told of the insurance n in San Francisco and of the conditions g generally throughout the city. He talked ngly of his experiences and impressions, st vivid of which was a feeling that San co is "a city of shattered nerves." From , in an almost plasterless room, for which he ay $6 a day, to watching the city teachers school in tents in Golden Gate Park and y of destitute who still draw rations from ernment, to picking his way amid the ruins ening to tales of horror and grim humor, he through the entire range of experience that to the visitor.

agraph that will interest policy holders here t that they will have to suffer a twenty-five t. cut is as follows :

ike two predictions, one that many of the insur- npanies, which are trying to settle with their olders on the basis of 75 per cent of the face f policies, will reverse their program, and the t it will take San Francisco at least 10 years to from the effects of the disaster."

Damon gives some inside history of the s of the Insurance Star Chamber in Oak- He said :

meetings of the insurance officials—officers adquarters and departmental managers—were eed's Hall in Oakland. Even at the first meet- s evident that a distinct line of cleavage existed, the companies represented would be divided camps. One camp believed in adjusting losses rancisco on exactly the same basis as in any onflagration, while the other—comprising a umber of companies, but companies as a rule ential—demanded a sweeping cut on the face all policies. When the question came to a vote, o companies voted to make a cut of 25 per cent icies, and 32 companies recorded their opposi- ny such way of doing business. This meant urds of the companies, that have one-third of , wanted a cut because of the earthquake, when o means of knowing just what damage the ke did, and where or when any of the 32 fires ed within five minutes had their origin, and s no one on the streets at the time who can gived information. Several companies were not ted, and some of the foreign companies were from voting, as instructions had not been re- y their American representatives.

dent Damon points out the fact—very signi- San Francisco policy holders—that as most ured much under the sound value of the , horizontal cuts on the face value are in- e. He says :

total amount of insurance on property in the rea in San Francisco will not exceed one-half f the property destroyed, as under-insurance was l see no reason to modify my estimate that the e in force in the burned area totals $175,000,- that the value of the property destroyed was $300,000,000. The point of difference between es like ours and those who want the cut is this: o you have a building that cost you $20,000 and insurance on it. It was destroyed and you ur claim. We make a certain deduction, say ent, because of depreciation due to age and use, her deduction because of the earthquake, that quake damage occurred. But these deductions e only when the insurance is equal to or exceeds the e property. If the insurance is less, as it always is in rrisco, we pay the full amount of the policy and make dent Damon does not think that the "six- npanies will be able to hold out in the face onest policy of the others. He says :

not know of one case where our company has y deductions at all. But the "six-bit" com- o named by Californians because they pay its on the dollar instead of eight—insist on the nt cut anyway. No one in San Francisco has eption to our stand, and, indeed, there is y no reason to think that we will have to mak- ons. By the way, I might mention he dy two companies, the Insurance Com fan)

North America of Philadelphia, Pa., and the Niagara Insurance Company of New York, have left the 61 and joined our camp. I look for many more defections from the ranks of the cutting companies, for they must realize the impossibility of inducing their policyholders to accept settle- ments on the 75 per cent basis or of making California juries award judgment in their favor when cases are brought to trial."

President Damon goes on to discuss the cases where many companies are interested in a single risk, likewise the two forms of policy, the "fallen building" and the "earthquake clause." He says :

"All the important losses, where several companies are concerned—and there are losses in which as many as 50 different companies are interested—are handled by committees of three or five members, which are appointed by the so-called 'committee of 15,' which has been given full charge of such matters on behalf of all the companies. The authority of these committees, however, is limited to ascertaining the total loss and its apportionment among the different companies interested. Ordinarily the committees would have power to fix the amount to be paid by each company, but as so many companies insisted on the 25 per cent cut regardless of the amount of the loss, this limitation of the powers of the committees was demanded. The companies which pay in full accept the apportionment made by the committees as final and pay accordingly, and, if the loss equals or exceeds the face of the policy, no deduction is made.

"Now the character of the policies has been many times discussed, but I want to go into it again. There are two forms. The one used by most of the companies is the New York standard form, prescribed by the New York State Legislature, and has the 'falling building' clause, under which, if a building or any substantial part thereof falls from any cause other than fire, insurance on the building or contents at once ceases. Rare will be the instances where sufficient proof will be brought out to satisfy a California jury that any building in the burned area collapsed in whole or in part. The other form of policy is issued principally by the English and German companies, which do a worldwide busy ness—especially in the tropics, and has the 'earthquake clause, which provides that, if the loss is caused directly or indirectly by earthquake, the companies are not liable for the loss. The earthquake was clearly indirectly responsible for the entire loss in San Francisco by fire. And yet in a case, probably, intended as a test case before a minor court of California a week ago, in which the Palatine Insurance Company was the defendant, the justice decided that the company must pay, regardless of the earthquake clause. The case will be appealed to the highest court of the state. Its outcome will be watched, as the officials of those companies whose policies have this earthquake clause are anxious lest, if they pay where they are not liable, some of their stockholders bring suit against them."

Concerning the quality of San Francisco buildings and their resistance to earthquake shock Mr. Damon says :

"Above all things the fire exposed the wretched work done by many of the cheaper contractors. Many a fine looking building of cheap construction was tumbled down, while a substantial neighbor was hardly damaged. Poor brick laying and very poor mortar were responsible for much of the destruction of property. Many of the very strongest buildings in sections where there was no fire were damaged, but these generally lost only chimneys, gables, cornices and folderols. The force of the quake seemed to have been greater in some places than in others. In some spots the quake seemed to have wiggled sideways, and in others up and down."

Next to the colossal ruins what most impressed President Damon was the nervous condition of the San Franciscans. This is what he says of us :

"The one thing that most impressed me, outside the ruin wrought by fire, was the nervous condition of all the people who passed through those days of horror. Thousands of families have moved away from the city because at least one member of a family has shattered nerves and cannot stand it to live where there are daily earth-tremors and constant reminders of the times of terror. For instance, a deacon of one of the churches told me that after the experiences of the first few days had shattered his wife's nerves, he managed to steal his own automobile, which the government had appropriated, and took her to Los Angeles. Now he is obliged to sell his San Francisco property and business and go to Los Angeles, as his wife cannot return. I was entering the house of a friend of mine just after a slight tremor, and there in the sitting-room was his daughter, a fine, healthy-looking girl of apparently sound nerves, going into hysterics. On the train coming home was an experienced, surgeon, a man of middle age and good nerve, who had passed through the strenuous days doing a world of good. Seven times in one night he awoke on the train bathed in perspiration, imagining that the noise and motion of the train was another quake. It will be a long, long time before the nerves of the people of San Francisco recover. Just imagine what must be the feelings of those doctors in a hospital, where there was just time to carry out the patients who could be cured, and who were obliged to chloroform those who were doomed to die anyway and could not even be carried from the building. Think what must be their feelings, even though they acted for the best and their action is approved by every one. Think what a state their nerves must be in, and also realize that thousands of other people passed through fully as horrible experiences. Nerves! It's a wonder the people have any left."

The suddenly extemporized retail business quar- ters of the city thus impressed Mr. Damon :

"The retail business of the city is carried on in the "Klondike" district, the residential sections of Fillmore, Polk and Geary Streets, where the sidewalks day and night are as crowded as is Main Street in Springfield on a Saturday evening. Stores in dwelling houses and canvas signs are the order. The section looks like a canvas mining camp thrown together in a day. What little wholesale business there is is being cared for in temporary structures, mostly of one story, that are being built all over the burned area. They are crude build- ings of redwood weatherboards nailed on frames of Oregon fir. The debris is being removed from the streets as fast as possible and the removal will be ex- pedited by the construction of steam railways into the principal sections of the burned area, which will allow of whole trainloads being carried away at one time."

The Eastern Insuranc President spent some considerable time in studying the refugee camps, of which he says :

"In the parks of the city, refugees are still encamped. Many are still living in the small parks, but will soon be transferred to the camps in Golden Gate Park, where some 5000 are living, under the regulations of the regu- lar army. At various points in the city and the parks are places where food is distributed or shelters where meals are served. Those who can afford it are ex- pected to pay for what they get, the charge generally being 10 cents for a meal. As the most prosperous and energetic sufferers are already at work trying to rebuild their fortunes, the campers are either the old and weak or the refuse of the city. I saw some pathetic sights in the bread lines and among the camps. One of the in- teresting sights was the tent schools, where the city teachers instruct children, each tent being occupied by a class of 24 pupils. Grades and districts are, of course, pretty well scattered, but every effort is being made to keep the schools going in some manner. The desks are wooden platforms, but each tent has its blackboard and air of coziness."

President Damoe's long interview closes with a comparison between the views of the boomers and the views of the faint hearts. Whether the rader agrees with him, it must be admitted that his views are those of an unprejudiced person. In speaking of San Francisco's future, he said :

"There are two sets of men—the 'boomers,' wt will prove to you that a certain piece of real estate worth so much more than before the fire; the others, those who are discouraged and intend to move to oil cities and start afresh where there are no earthquak and where they can recover their nervous health. will be many years, I think, before San Francisco re- covers its old-time prosperity. No city can lose $300,- 000,000 worth of property from its very heart and re- trieve the loss in a day. It's a physical impossibility, it seems to me, for the city to recover inside of 10 years."

Waiving the somewhat gloomy prognostication in the last sentence, one can not but be struck by the fair and honest view of the insurers' liabilities as taken by this Springfield insurance president. Would that all our insurance presidents were as fair and as honest as he !

When the great vault of the G. H. Umben Company, located under the sidewalk in front of the firm's recent office at 20 Montgomery street, was opened, everything in it was intact and in per- fect condition. One year ago the Umben Company built the vault under the sidewalk next Mont- gomery street. In this vault were located two large safes and shelves for the reposal of valuable records, documents and papers. The walls of the vault were two feet thick and of brick. When the fire came on April 18 the steel door of the vault was closed and the members of the firm departed reassured, for they had faith in the stability of their vault. When the vault was opened shortly after the fire no evidence of heat was observed, except on the paint of the outside door. Tons of valuable papers were in it. With records of the insurance policies kept by Umben, the fire underwriters were able to proceed in the matter of adjusting. The firm lost not a paper of value and has been able to resume business on its old lines since the fire. Among the contents of the vault were large wooden boxes in which were the card bookkeeping systems. Every night, no matter what the closing hour, the clerks of the firm lugged these heavy boxes into the vault beneath the sidewalk. Evi- dently one of the bosses must have been on hand very eve ning.

STANFORD WHITE.

His Life and His Death—Is He a Distinct Loss to the World?—The Opinion of Many Newspapers.

The killing of Stanford White by Harry Kendall Thaw on the evening of June 25th, in the Madison Square Roof Garden, has attracted more attention than has attached to any social tragedy since the Fisk-Stokes shooting, a third of a century ago. The spectacular way in which the crime was committed, the prominence of the principals, and the aftermath of shameful details of lives unmentionable, have sent the poetesses of passion and the kept moralists of the press into fits of hysteria. There is little choice between the moral characters of the slain man, his slayer, and the woman who was the exciting cause of the tragedy. There were three of them, all bad, and that's all end on't.

"The man now dead was intellectually of brilliant gifts and therefore the less excusable for being the amazing moral pervert he must have been," remarks the Chicago Chronicle. "The man who slew him had not even brain to make any part of the world feel his loss had the killing been the other way, and he had lived the idle, useless, profligate life of a vulgar spendthrift and rounder, a perpetual disgrace and torment to an otherwise reputable family. The woman, so far as appears, must have been worthy of the worst of both."

"By all accounts Stanford White was as near to genius as any man in New York," says a writer in the New York World. "He has been compared to an artist of the Italian Renaissance. He would have shone at the court of the Medici, apt alike with the brush, the chisel and the rapier." As junior member of the firm of McKim, Mead & White, the leading firm of American architects, he designed a number of masterpieces. Of these may be mentioned the Madison Square Garden, the buildings of the Century and Metropolitan clubs, the Washington Arch, the new buildings of the University of Virginia and those of New York University, and the pedestals for the principal statues by Augustus Saint-Gaudens. As an architect, Mr. White's claim to recognition was based on work of a highly decorative style. But he could work with more reserve, as he did in the Boston Public Library, in the design for the Rhode Island State House, in the art schemes for Prospect Park, Brooklyn, for the Greater Washington improvement, and in many notable club-houses and private mansions.

"He was, as a matter of fact, artist rather than architect, and had he followed painting with the same energy that he brought to the sister profession, there can be little doubt that he would have achieved recognition and probably something of fame," remarks the New York Evening Post.

Speaking of this side of Stanford White's talent, a brother architect said: "You may think I am exaggerating when I say that he was really a great painter in water colors, but I am not. I feel confident that, were you to take some of the water colors that he painted, transport them to London, and cause them to be hung here and there among the Turners in the National Gallery, it would be impossible, later on, to tell which was Turner and which was White."

White had something of the medieval artist's prodigal versatility; he could turn his hand to many things. "He was the most-talked-of collector of art of our time," says the Post. "His own aesthetic standards were exquisite; but insensibly, as he sold his taste to a wealthy but half-trained society, his taste condescended to their ignorance and vanity. The time that he should have given to creative design, he spent in despoiling French and Italian country houses of their fittings and furnishings, and he adorned many an American mansion with irrelevant plunder of this sort."

The New York World says that when the body of White was brought to his home it "almost at the feet of the statue, 'Venus Genetrix,' which was found in the Tiber; this Mr. White purchased and placed in the great drawing-room of his Gramercy Park home, famous for its collection of ancient marbles and old tapestries. Living, he placed a chaste Diana atop his great work—Madison Square Garden; dead, he was stretched in the shadow of a Venus; she who brought him to the shadow of death. Stanford White's love of the beautiful produced two sides in his nature; he loved the chaste and beautiful in his work; he loved only the gay and beautiful in his pleasures. Besides engaging Mr. White to build their dwellings, the fashionables consulted him when they doubted their own good taste; he advised how drawing rooms should be decorated for elaborate functions. He was not above telling a fashionable woman what would most become her at a fancy dress ball or of dictating to a millionaire, on a like occasion, how the colors of the velvets in his costume should contrast."

This is typical of the New York Journal's comments on the tragedy. "Either Stanford White is the most dreadfully maligned and slandered man in the world's history, or his life was prolonged infinitely beyond its proper limits and the hand that destroyed him was as much a benefactor of the human race as any hand ever raised in a righteous battle." To animadversions of this character, the Globe and Advertiser says: "Why not a demand that Madison Square Garden and the Washington Arch be instantly torn down as corrupting to all who behold them? Both structures, flowing from the brain and taste of the late Stanford White, stand as monuments to him. If it is our business to look closely to sources, and we may not accept a rich man's wealth because he was a bad man, can we consistently accept the product of a bad artist—bad in his personal morals—no matter how beautiful and uplifting it may seem to be. If tainted money, why not tainted architecture?"

The New York Tribune believes that the White-Thaw incident "should serve to reconcile the mass of toiling Americans with their lot. In the light of this bloody episode, we may grasp the full meaning of Andrew Carnegie's now classic phrase, 'The blessed heritage of poverty.' There are millions among us who are no whit better than the slayer or the slain, but who are kept 'true to the kindred points of heaven and home' by the overmastering need for strenuous effort. It must be borne in mind that our aristocracy of wealth has none of the splendid distractions which save Britain's noblesse from the twin curses of sloth and self-indulgence; for the American plutocrat's son is usually brought up with the keenest sense of his rights and almost no sense of his duties, whereas the scions of England's historic houses are taught to believe that the nation's claim overrides all others." And the New York World moralizes thus: "The offenses with which Stanford White is charged were no different from Belshazzar's. Every nation where the expenditure of wealth was an occupation has had the same orgies. The combination of inherited wealth without inherited responsibilities has always created Harry Thaws. It is as inevitable as the growth of rank weeds on rich, untilled soil."

The Journal describes Thaw as a "weak young man, with good impulses," but the bulk of the comments is highly unfavorable to him. He is shown to be an idle spendthrift who had never done one moment's honest work, but spent his time in dissipating, in profligacy and debauchery, a large fortune which he had inherited. A correspondent to one of the New York papers makes the following contrast:

"White left many undying monuments to carry his name down a few generations. But, pray—and the question is asked with all sincerity—who is this idiotic fop, this dangerous, brainless, moneyed monstrosity, who dared kill a whole man? What has he done that will carry his name into posterity? Nothing. Ah, yes, he has—it will endure in the criminal list and his face will forever emblazon the Rogues' Gallery. But what a contrast! And then this half man and half savage has the audacity to laugh at his deed and say he has avenged his wife's honor. Having accepted a woman as wife whose name was on the tongues of vulgar men and women, Thaw had a right to keep his tongue quiet and his pistol in the closet."

"We shall have to agree with the very large number of out-of-town newspapers that regard the Thaw-White affair as 'typical of New York,' says the World. "It was. Almost anything or everything may be typical of New York. Only four States of the Union number more inhabitants than are crowded into the five boroughs that constitute the city of New York. These 4,000,000 inhabitants are drawn from every quarter of the globe. They represent all the gradations of poverty and wealth, ignorance and culture, vice and virtue, known to civilized society. Thaw's shooting of White was typical of New York, and White's relations with the chorus girls of the Tenderloin were typical of New York. So were the demonstrations made by the Jewish women of the east side over the insane rumors that their children were being murdered in the public schools by the physicians sent by the Department of Health to examine them. So was Josephine Teranova's action in killing her uncle and aunt. So was New York's subscription of $3,000,000 to the San Francisco sufferers."

The Tenderloin is typical of New York, and so are the tens of thousands of homes of virtuous, industrious, law-abiding citizens who have no exposures to dread and no skeletons to conceal. Anything that is likely to happen in a city of 4,000,000 inhabitants, whether moral or immoral, virtuous or vicious, generous or greedy, or good or bad or indifferent, is typical of New York. It is even typical that only one of the three principals in this Madison Square tragedy should have been born here or should have claimed New York for a residence when the murder was committed."

In the recent war the advantage of the Japanese was inversely as the cubes of their height and breadth. The average targets offered by each to the enemy are as the cubes of 1.585 and 1.642, or as 106 to 118, an advantage in favor of the Japanese of about 12 per cent.

A vegetarian contends that if it were intended that we should live on meat we would doubtless have had strongly set ivory fangs instead of flat topped, shell-like teeth that loosen and break usually before the meridian of life is reached. He says that he has worn out two sets of natural and three of "store teeth," but his stomach is still doing a satisfactory business after nearly seventy-five years of service.

It was stated recently in the reichstag, with reference to German New Guinea, that out of a total European population of 466 there was 174 missionaries, and that for every two farmers there was a German officer. This meant that every farmer there cost Germany $5,500 a year. The speaker remarked that it would be cheaper to bring the farmers home and give them pensions.

A society matron had been reading a newspaper article devoted to criticism of peekaboo waists, elbow sleeves and openwork stockings. "Perhaps," she said, "men would do well to correct untoward incidents in their own apparel. They might, for instance, campaign against the insufficient clothing men wear at the beaches. As one young woman put it, instead of being buffeted by the surf she is surfeited by the buff. Men's bathing suits are scanty enough without then rolling up the trousers legs and cutting down the sleeves so as to expose the scapula and vertebrae. In general, the average masculine bathing suit needs trimming—say, an overskirt to begin with."

THE MEAT-PACKING HORRORS.

Their Disclosures Have Made People Stop Eating Meat—The Packer's Defense—The President's Victory.

Congress has passed the Agricultural bill, the President has signed it, and we may soon approach the breakfast table with a reasonable assurance that our chop is free from the dreadful contamination with which recent disclosures have made us so unappetizingly familiar. Sporadic articles had appeared in the press for years, intimating that the great slaughter-houses of Chicago were unclean, and canned meats have always been under suspicion, but national legislation on the subject is the direct outcome of the publication, several months ago, of a novel, "The Jungle," by Upton Sinclair, a young socialist. President Roosevelt read the book, interviewed the author, and as a result, sent to Chicago two commissioners, Charles P. McNeill, and James B. Reynolds. They reported conditions at the packing-houses as revolting, and that "the stockyards and packing-houses are not kept even reasonably clean, and that the method of handling and preparing food products is uncleanly and dangerous to health." But they add: "The evil seems to be much less in the sale of dressed carcasses than in the sale of canned and other prepared products."

The latter point, for the sake of the national stomach, should have been given stronger emphasis. It appears that the dressed carcasses amount to 92 per cent, and the canned products to but 8 per cent of the total output. This lends verisimilitude to Secretary Wilson's statement that "American livestock are the healthiest in the world. The great ranges of the west produce herds of cattle in which the percentage of disease is remarkably small. The inspection of the animals before and at the time of slaughter has always been thorough. It is true that the department of agriculture has heretofore lacked the power and the money to provide for an efficient supervision of the sanitation and the methods of preparation of canned meat food products."

But even if every animal were scrupulously inspected, the subsequent processes made the meat unfit for food. Carcasses are dragged over the "dirty, blood-soaked, rotting, wooden floors, fruitful culture beds for the disease germs of men and animals." Upon these floors, moreover, the employees, in utter ignorance of cleanliness or danger to health, "expectorated at will. While the carcasses are hung on hooks and do not often come in contact with the floor, the parts that are sent to the rooms where meat products are prepared are in some of the largest establishments thrown in a heap upon the floor, and the workers climb over the carcasses to select the pieces they want, and at times "were seen to climb from the floor and stand, with shoes dirty with the refuse of the floors, on the tables upon which the meat was handled."

The commissioners further told of wooden buildings with "soaked and impenetrable wooden floors, wooden partitions from which one can scrape decaying grease with a knife, wooden receptacles, barrows, and tables showing no signs of any recent attempts at cleansing. "Usually the workers toil with the floors of rotten wood, decayed meats, linking offal and entrails." The trines for the workmen and workwomen usually ventilate into the work-room, and "washing sinks either are not furnished at all or are small and dirty." And so, on, ad nauseam.

In reply to this criticism, the Argonauts, in a full-page advertisement in the Chicago papers, requested the public to visit their plant, and learn that they had been grossly libelled, adding that if conditions were so vile the millions who have visited their abattoirs would have long since informed the people. Mr. Sinclair scouted at this, saying a small place is set aside for the delectation of tourists, but the guides and spies are careful not to let the visitors venture too far. Besides, if everything is as it should be, why have the packers recently set about making improvements, employing an army of carpenters, installing a new plumbing system, posting new regulations for employees, etc. "I have," he continues, "not told one-tenth of the facts in my possession," and then goes on to another detailed description of horrors that makes one hold his nose.

"The wars of the world have been fought on Chicago's canned goods," claims Mr. Armour. Anent this, General Miles has the following to say:

"I believe that three thousand United States soldiers lost their lives in the Spanish-American war because of adulterated, impure, poisonous meat. There is no way of estimating the number of soldiers whose health was ruined by eating impure food."

The publication of the commissioners' reports evoked a storm of criticism and horrified expressions from the London press. One correspondent wrote, more in sorrow than in anger: "It will take more than a paper reorganization of the great life-insurance companies and a cleaning of the Augean stables at Chicago to restore European belief in American honesty and fair dealing. It will be a long time before public opinion on this side of the Atlantic will have any confidence in American corporate reform."

But the Lancet began looking into things at home, and decided that so far as disease and cleanliness are concerned "the meat which England imports from the United States and Argentina is more satisfactory than much of the English meats." And "a sanitary inspector in Camberwell, a part of London, found that there, too, rotten meat is canned; there also tuberculosis carcasses are marketed." Also, he "found in a jam factory a collection of dried raisins filled with ants and other insects, rotten apple pulp, orange-peel, some filthy macaroni, a lot of blown tins of apricots, and other refuse bought from grocers' shops as unfit for food. It amounted to nine hundred-weight in all, and was being treated and made into jam."

The recently passed Meat Inspection law provides for the thorough inspection of all animals before slaughter; thorough inspection of all animals after slaughter; thorough inspection of the sanitary condition of packing-houses; thorough inspection of the products that go to the consumer in forms other than in bulk. The government is to pay the cost of inspection, some $3,000,000 annually; the inspectors are to be appointed under civil service rule; and the packers are to be given an unlimited right of appeal. It was proposed to date the label on canned goods, but this feature was stricken from the bill.

There has been a great deal of criticism of the clause compelling the Government to pay for inspection; "inspection is a necessary incident of the packers' business, let them pay for it, as they do their other expenses." But inspectors in the employ of the Meat Trust might favor them, say other papers. In any event, the vegetarians' millennium has not arrived.

Of the miles of verse that the packing house investigation inspired, the subjoined from the Independent, by Charlotte Perkins Gilman, is the sanest and most pertinent:

A PACKINGTOWN POEM.

The American public is patient,
The American public is slow,
The American public will stand as much

As any public I know.
We submit to be killed by our railroads,

We submit to be fooled by our press,
We can stand as much government scandal

As any folks going, I guess.

We can bear bad air in the subway,
We can bear quick death in the street;

But we are a little particular
About the food we eat.

It is not so much that it kills us—

We are used to being killed;
But we like to know what fills us
When we pay for being filled.

When we pay the Beef Trust prices—
As we must or go without—

It is not that we grudge the money,
But we grudge the horrid doubt.
Is it ham or trichinosis?

Can a label command belief?
Is it pork we have purchased, or poison

Is it tuberculosis or beef?

There is really a choice of diseases

To any one, little or big;
And no man really pleases
To die of a long-dead pig.

We take our risks as we're able,
On elevator and train,

But to sit in peace at the table
And be seized with sudden pain

When we are at home and happy,
Is really against the grain.

And besides—admitting the poison—

Admitting that we all must die—
Accepting the second-hand sickness

From a cholera-smitten sty;
Patiently bearing the murder,
Amiable, meek, inert—

We do rise up and remonstrate
Against the Packingtown dirt!

Let there be death in the dinner,
Subtle and unforeseen,

But O, Mr. Packer, in packing our death.

Won't you please make it clean?

An electric chair for seasickness has been tested in an English Channel steamer and an ocean liner. You sit in a snug armchair. A motor under the seat is connected with the ship's electric current. You sit and take vibratory treatment. Up and down and crosswise you are shaken. Most sitters need but one treatment. Their tendency to seasickness is vibrated out of them. Some need a second sitting. A few are seasick as soon as their treatment ends. It is a preventive, mark you, not a cure. The theory is that seasickness is essentially a nervous malady and that vibration reduces the nervousness.

Spain is enjoying a business boom, and the credit of the country is steadily rising. A year ago the silver peseta was worth only 13 cents. Now it is worth 17. By the end of the year it bids fair to be nearly at par, when it should equal a franc, say 19 cents. In Cadiz alone the receipts of the Custom-House in 1899 doubled those of the preceding year. One hundred thousand men who formerly went to recruit the colonial army have remained in Spain and about $75,000,000 of capital. Employment has been found for both in mining and cotton mills. There is a great increase in the mineral output and manufactures, and the whole peninsula is waking up in Yankee style.

Food, real, pure food, is almost impossible to secure, says a New York World correspondent. Real food costs more money than the ordinary mortal can pay, and as a result the family, the basis of the nation, is rapidly being driven to insanity through worry and poison preservatives, by and with the consent of our political overlords. I have just returned from the West and the South. The freshest and most meaty eggs I ever beheld are selling for from 12 to 14 cents a dozen. In

New York we are paying 30 cents, and do not get very good eggs at that. Chickens in the country retail from six to eight cents a pound, with the entrails out, heads and legs cut off. In New York we are compelled to pay from 18 to 22 cents for chicken, where in the decomposing entrails have flavored the meat throughout.

Chief Buckley of the Digger Indians died recently at Grass Valley at the age of 134 years. Death was the result of sunstroke. The body of the chief was buried by his followers with all the ceremony that is customary at the funeral of a man of his importance among his race. All the males of the Indian village gathered to pay homage to the remains of the leader. His personal possessions were buried with the body and many gifts were placed in the grave. Chief Buckley was probably the oldest inhabitant of California. Buckley was given his name by the early gold-seekers. He was a friend of the white people and to the end held their respect.

The Chicago Tribune has published its ninth annual summary of the deaths and injuries caused throughout the United States by the celebration of the Declaration of Independence. The figures were as follows: Dead, 33. By fireworks, 9; by cannon, 1; by firearms, 11; by explosives, 7; by toy pistols, 4; by runaway, 1; by drowning, 5. Injured, 2789. By fireworks, 1099; by cannon, 261; by firearms, 393; by explosives, 697; by toy pistols, 304; by runaways, 35. Fire loss, $66,450. In Chicago: Dead, 2; injured, 157. Last year 42 persons were killed outright, but when lockjaw and other diseases induced by injuries had completed their work over 400 lives had been sacrificed. The number of injured—2789—is in excess of last year's figures by 353.

VANITY FAIR.

After the Harvard-Yale boatrace at New London, this year, according to custom of long standing, the supporters of the rival universities foregathered at the Pequot House. Joining with them were parties from aboard the yachts at anchor in the stream, but they were all college students for the night, if the number of colored handbands worn was indicative. Yale and Harvard did not quarrel. On the veranda the band played alternately "Fair Harvard," and "Boola Yale," for the benefit of the dancers, while out on the grass groups got together and sang old favorites of the campus, mingled with, "There is a Light Shining Bright," or "Some One Thinks of Some One." And when everything else was exhausted they fell back on the tune of "Auld Lang Syne," sung to the words:

"We're here because we're here, because—
We're here because we're here, because—
We're here because we're here, because—
We're here because we're here, because—

The college men from the yachting fleet, took part in the songs. Some of them were men of years and dignity, but it was put aside while their daughters danced in the parlor with the younger generation. In the front of the hotel, the water, black and unruffled, was dotted with the wavering anchor lights of scores of yachts. Besides the white lights of the vessels lying at their moorings were seen occasional red and green flashes, as tenders traveled about the fleet or came ashore, and now and then the broad, glaring rays of a searchlight directed at this point or that. The silence was broken only half-hourly when the yacht bells tinkled out the time, by the occasional puff, puff of a restless gasoline launch, or by a hail from the pier of the New York Yacht Club: "Endermion ahoy." Back of the hotel to the westward a crescent moon hung in the sky, and looked down amusedly at the college students at play. Tiring finally of the show, she sank down towards the horizon and went to bed. The merry-makers at the hotel watched her out of sight and followed her example—long afterwards.

The Yale-Harvard boat races always bring a fleet of pleasure yachts from New York and elsewhere into the harbor, but this year the number was greater than usual on account of the race of the Indian Harbor Yacht Club from Greenwich to New London.

John Willis, of Glasgow, Mont., blew in to see the President a fortnight ago, (writes the Washington correspondent of the New York World). John was the President's foreman when the President was learning the cattle business, at large expense to himself, in the days long gone by.

"Hello, John!" shouted the President; "glad to see you. You must dine with me tonight."

"Nope," said John—"no siree. Can't do it, Theodore."

The President isn't used to having his invitations to dinner declined and he asked rather sharply, "Why not?"

"Ain't got no dress suit with me," John replied.

"But," insisted the President, "that doesn't make any difference. I would be glad to have you if you came dressed in leather breeches."

Lady Mary Hamilton, only daughter of the late twelfth duke of Hamilton and Brandon and the richest woman in Great Britain, was married a fortnight ago at St. George's Church, Hanover square, London, to the marquis of Graham, eldest son of the duke of Montrose. King Edward was among those present at the ceremony. The display of diamonds and other precious stones was probably seldom equaled. The scene outside the church was quite exciting. At one period the enormous crowd that desired to make a closer inspection of the bride broke through the police cordon and swarmed round her carriage. Heavy reinforcements of police were necessary to clear the way for the king's carriage and open a passage for the bride to enter the church.

Frederick Tudor, a wealthy member of the exclusive Somerset, University, and other clubs of Boston and New York, seriously objects to the use of portraits of his fiancée, the beautiful Miss Amy Isabel Logan, formerly a stenographer, for advertising purposes in street cars. To the amazement of a crowded Back Bay car in Boston recently, Mr. Tudor, who had been carelessly looking at various advertisements in the car, suddenly drew himself erect, and, striding to the other end of the car, stopped before a woman, to whom he said: "Pardon me, madam, for reaching over your head." In a second he had torn an advertisement picture from its frame.

When General Corbin, with questionable taste, complained in addressing the West Point graduates of the low pay they would receive in the army. Secretary Taft promptly countered by speaking of low salaries as "a method of developing character which you ought not to lose." And he added: "I am pretty sure that your salaries for the next five years, low as they are, are pay that the average professional man would be delighted to be sure of in the first five years of his work. The truth is that your pay is not munificent, but you can live on it, and it has the great merit of relieving you from that intense anxiety that troubles so many members of the learned professions—that of keeping the wolf from the door. We are apt in this age of wealth to attach too much importance to money. We ought to have more people who when they have amassed a competence would stop and devote themselves to public affairs."

"Don't doubt that," John said, shifting from one foot to the other, "but I can't eat no dinner with you here tonight."

"Pshaw!" said the President; "come along. I don't care what kind of clothes you wear."

"I guess that's true enough," said John, "but out in my part of the country we know what's what. If you're going riding I'll go along, but as for eatin', why, I guess I'll eat tonight down at the hashery where I'm bunkin'."

And that settled it.

The great charm of the London season for American women is the amount of out of doors. The Park twice a day is an objective point of society, in the morning during the riding hours, and between five and seven during the driving hour. At this time the occupants leave their carriages and sit under the trees chatting with friends until the scene resembles a private lawn party instead of a public park gathering. To go to the opera night after night with the sun still shining is something of a shock at first, but it is consoling not to have the dread of facing the bitter cold after an evening in an overheated auditorium. June affords, usually, the very best of English weather; it is an ideal time for London. The cricket matches between the great universities are important social functions of the open air, with many others.

To the ordinary traveler, to be in London in May and June is the most attractive time of the year. Royalty is on daily view. The royal levees and courts have their attendant interest for a spectator as well as for one who participates in them. The great rush of the regular American summer travel abroad begins as the schools close, for the teachers comprise the great class of workers who have a vacation long enough to make the voyage worth while.

American women travel more extensively than those of any other nation; European travel has been developed and fostered for years past with the object of their comfort and convenience. It is only very lately that the American railroad and steamship companies have thoroughly realized that personally conducted, or suggestive, well-planned independent tours do not depend upon the wealthy winter tourist. Newspapers and other advertising mediums have been used during the winter to exploit our wonderful natural scenery, and this year shows a tremendous increase of travel to the farthest corners of the country—to the wonders of the Colorado Mountains, the Grand Canyon of Arizona, California, Alaska, Yosemite, and the Yellowstone Park. These Far Western tourist points will see more women tourists this summer than ever happened in their experience.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Fourteenth of July.

The fourteenth of July had come,
And round the guillotine
The thieves and beggars, rank by rank,
Moved the red flags between.
A crimson heart, upon a pole—
The long march had begun;
But still the little smiling child
Sat knitting in the sun.
The red caps of those men of France
Shook like a poppy-field;
Three women's heads, with gory hair,
The standard-bearers wield.
Cursing, with song and battle-hymn,
Five butchers dragg'd a gun;
Yet still the little maid sat there,
A-knitting in the sun.

An axe was painted on the flags,
A broken throne and crown,
A ragged coat, upon a lance,
Hung in foul black shreds down.
"More heads!" the seething rabble cry,
And now the drums begun;
But still the little fair-haired child
Sat knitting in the sun.
And every time a head roll'd off,
They roll like winter seas,
And, with a tossing up of caps,
Shouts shook the Tuilleries.
Whizz went the heavy chopper down,
And then the drums begun;
But still the little smiling child
Sat knitting in the sun.

The Jacobins, ten thousand strong,
And every man a sword;
The red caps with the tricolors,
Led on the noisy horde.
"The Sans Culottes to-day are strong,"
The gossips say, and run;
But still the little maid sits there,
A-knitting in the sun.

Then the slow death-cart moved along;
And, singing patriot songs,
A pale, doom'd poet bowing comes
And cheers the swaying throngs.
Oh, when the axe swept shining down,
The mad drums all begun;
But smiling still, the little child
Sat knitting in the sun.

"Le marquis," linen snowy white,
The powder in his hair,
Waving his scented handkerchief,
Looks down with careless stare.
A whirr, a chop—another head—
Hurrah! the work's begun;
But still the little child sat there,
A-knitting in the sun.

A stir, and through the parting crowd
The people's friends are come;
Marat and Robespierre—"Vivat!"
Roll thunder from the drum."
The one a wild beast's hungry eye,
Hair tangled—hark! a gun!
The other kindly kiss'd the child
A-knitting in the sun.
"And why not work all night?" the child
Said to the knitters there.
Oh, how the furies shook their sides,
And toss'd their grizzled hair
Then clapp'd a bonnet rouge on her,
And cried, "'Tis well begun!"
And laugh'd to see the little child
Knit, smiling in the sun.

—George Walter Thornbury

Washington in Flannels.

During the session of Congress just closed there was at Washington an interesting exhibition of styles of dress seasonable for hot weather, says the correspondent of the Springfield Republican. There are of course, more men in Washington than in any other American city who have lived in tropical climates. Here are gathered many individuals who have either served with the army in the Philippines or under the insular government in that part of the world, or who have seen consular service in other hot countries. When a hot spell strikes Washington these men are ready for it. Out come their clothes that have graced the Luneta in Manila, or gay promenades of fashion in the far-away tropics, and they are both comfortably conspicuous and conspicuously comfortable. President Roosevelt himself sets the style. A visitor to the executive offices recently found him clothed comfortably in white linen trousers and loose unbuttoned white linen jacket, no waistcoat, and a white cheviot shirt and a black tie. It looks cool and is not undignified, and a foreign diplomat who appears in the conventional costume has a right to be envious one of these hot mornings.

General Grosvenor's white costume is doubtless the result of the Taft trip to the Philippines last summer. Over in the Senate Senator Scott of West Virginia has clad his portly form in light cream-colored flannels which he also doubtless learned to wear on the Taft trip to the Philippines last year, and Senator Warren of Wyoming, who was another member of the Taft party, has disported himself in a suit of cool linen crash. Aside from these, however, and possibly a few others, the lawmakers stick heroically to conventional costume, and perspire and mop their heads and fan themselves in desperation. Even Vice-President Fairbanks, who is popularly supposed to create a low temperature wherever he goes, seems to find the long black Prince Albert coat and the stiff high collar, which he persists in wearing, pretty oppressive at this time of year.

For more than fifty years, children, from the age of three months to ten years, have been benefited by Steadman's Soothing Powders.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Two Silesians, seated in a music hall, bent to argue about the music of Wagner. The argument, as it progressed, grew heated. He upshot was that the younger challenged the older Silesian to a duel. But the older Silesian declined to fight. "No, no," he said. "I refuse to meet you. he risks are not equal. You, you see, are a cheloh, whereas I am a married man with ree children. I'll tell you what to do. Go t married and wait till you've a family as ge as mine, then, when our risks are alike, me and challenge me again. The younger man complied. He married. hree years passed, and one day three years er, he went, accompanied by a nursemaid, his opponent's home. "Here I am," he said fiercely. "My wife at home. In this coach are my three chil-en. Now for the duel." "But the older man shook his head. "Not yet awhile," he said. "I have five w."

An average man got married. After he had en married several years his wife said to him e night: "You do not speak as affectionately to me you used to. Hal. I fear you have ceased love me." "Ceased to love you!" growled the Avere-man. "There you go again. Ceased to ve you! Why, I love you more than life elf. Now shut up and let me read the per."

The smokers' seats were full. The car was oved. Two men who were smoking were lliged to stand on the rear platform. A man ho was not smoking sat in the rear seat. "Seems to me," said one of the men who ere standing, "that a man who is not smok-g should sit in the forward seats and let ose who want to smoke have these seats. ow that man might just as well be sitting up front. He isn't smoking." "I know it, my friend," said the man, turn-g around, "but I am perfectly willing to be. ou haven't got an extra cigar, have you?"

O. W. Nickerson and J. S. Baker were resi-nts of Harwich. Captain Nickerson, as as called, was a man of means and very rew. Joe was less fortunate. One day e captain took Joe into a room, closed the ors, and said: "Now, Joe, for $25 I will tell u the secret of getting rich. Be saying, of urse, and when you do make a bargain with yone be sure that no one hears you, and en if you get the worst of it or want to ck out you can. Now hand me the $25." Joe thought a second and then said: "Did any one hear us make this bargain, tain?" "Not a soul," replied the captain. "Well, then," Joe said, "I guess I'll begin ou."

At Muncie, Indiana, recently, when Mr. omas Pellan, an Englishman, was arraigned a charge of intoxication, the magistrate iently decided to discharge the prisoner, d said to him "Skidoo." Mr. Pellan though was a terrible sentence that had been im-posed on him and begged for mercy. With isiderable difficulty the meaning of the erican slang word was explained to the glishman, whereupon he thanked the magis-e and "skidooed."

An Irishman entered the New York post-e for the purpose of mailing a letter to a financee. He paused in perplexity before a board con-ing three letter slots bearing the words "ity," "Domestic," "Foreign," "Faith," mumbled, "this is a pretty problem. Mag-s a domestic, she lives in the city, and s a foreigner. What beats me is how I'm et the letter in the three holes at wanst."

The head of a well known theological sem-ry is accustomed to test the ability and self-ession of the students by sending them o the pulpit with a sealed envelope in their hds containing the text of a sermon to be dvered on the spur of the moment. In one such occasion the student, on open-ing his paper, read these instructions: "Apply tory of Zaccheus to your own circum-ces and your call to the ministry." he student, cleverly enough, delivered him-of the following: Brethren, the subject on which I address you is a comparison between Zaccheus and myself, with reference to my qualifications for the pulpit. The first thing we read of Zaccheus is that he was small of stature. I never felt so small as I do now. In the second place, we read that Zaccheus was up a tree, which is very much my position at present. Thirdly, it is related that Zaccheus made haste to come down; and in this I gladly and promptly follow his example."

On June 17, Senator Bacon, of Georgia, was making a speech about the proposed ship canal from Lake Erie to Pittsburg. Senator William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, the successor to the late Senator Gorman, was listening. Presently Bacon began on a line of argument that made Whyte sit up and take notice.

After the speech Whyte went to Bacon and asked: "Senator, where did you get the data for the last half of your speech?" "Oh," said Bacon, "it came from a very able speech on the subject delivered some time ago. I don't know who the speaker was."

"I do," said Senator Whyte. "I made that speech myself in this chamber thirty-eight years ago."

There was a man whose wife had an Aberdeen terrier of extreme ferocity. It bit the man a number of times. He expressed great hatred for it. Finally the terrier bit a large piece out of the calf of the man's leg, and the next day it disappeared. The man advertised widely for the dog's return. He offered a reward of $200 for it. His friends were amazed.

"I thought," said a friend to him, "that you hated that dog?" "I do," the man admitted. "Why, then, do you offer such a large reward for its return?" "To please my wife."

"But you're foolish," said the other. "Such a large reward will be sure to bring it back."

"No, no," said the man, with a smile. "You see, it's dead."

At midnight, in Chicago once, an Irish policeman overhauled a sleep-walker who was promenading a principal thoroughfare clad only in his night robes. When the officer had awakened the unfortunate man, placed him under arrest, and was hustling him off to the station, the sleep walker exclaimed with indignation:

"Surely you are not going to lock me up?" "Surest thing you know!" airily responded the bluecoat.

"Why, man, I can't be held responsible for the predicament you find me in! I am a somnambulist!"

"Sure, it makes no difference what Church ye belong to," sharply returned the officer; "ye can't parade the streets of Chicago in your nighty!"

Admiral Dewey grew reminiscent as the 1st of May rolled around this year. He narrated to a number of friends the manner in which he learned that there were two cables instead of one, as he supposed, in Manila Bay.

"I had found and cut one cable," said the Admiral, "and thought that ended the whole business, as far as communication went, when a captain of a small boat to whom I had given permission to carry out some refugees from Manila, came on board to thank me for the privilege accorded him. He had made several hundred dollars out of the deal. I learned incidentally. While on board he casually remarked:

"'Se dice que usted ha cortado un cable tele-grafo, Almirante?'" "I understand you have cut a cable, Admiral?"

"I informed him that I had, and when he innocently asked, 'Which one?' I began to get busy, and it was not half an hour until I had the other wire located and cut."

A Fort Dodge doctor, Dr. X., once had a grave dug for a patient, supposed to be dying, who afterward recovered, and over this error of judgment the doctor was joked for many years.

Once he attended, in consultation with three confreres, another patient. This patient really died. After the death, as the physicians discussed the case together, one of them said: "Since quick burial is necessary, we might inter the body temporarily. I understand our brother here has a vacant grave on hand." Dr. X. smiled. "Yes," he said, "I believe I am the only physician present whose graves are not all filled."

Apropos of the higher education of women, a lady on a sultry summer afternoon, called on some friends. The talk buzzed along briskly, fans waved, and the daughter of the house kept twitching uncomfortably, frown-ing, and making little, smothered exclama-tions of annoyance. Finally, with an im-patient sigh, she rose and left the room.

"Your daughter," said the visitor, "seems to be suffering from the heat." "No," said the hostess. "She is just back home from college, and she is suffering from family grammar."

Whether a diet of bread and milk taken almost exclusively for forty years is respon-sible for the remarkable preservation from the effects of old age shown in the body of Mrs. Mary Fay, who died in New York City alms house at the age of 105 years a few days ago, is causing interest among physicians. Do spite the extreme age of Mrs. Fay her body is in as perfect physical condition and as well nourished as that of a comparatively young woman, according to Coroner's physician, Dr. Philip O'Hanlon.

"I have performed 4525 autopsies," said Dr. O'Hanlon, "but she was the best pre-served person I ever saw. Were it not for the lines of age in her face she would not have been taken for more than 25 years of age. She weighs approximately 140 pounds, and was little more than five feet in height. The body was exceptionally well nourished and the teeth in both upper and lower jaws were in perfect condition."

Miss Geraldine Bonner's new novel which is to appear next autumn will be a work of unusual interest to San Franciscans. It is a story of San Francisco just before the great disaster. The situation and people are all modern, and at the same time belong to a period and condition of the city's evolution which many old San Franciscans fear was wiped out with the fire. Those who have seen the manu-script of this book say that it has much of the romance and the color of old San Francisco.
